of emblems, they still afford very happy ornament for churches and church windows, especially, perhaps, for painted windows. In the primitive Church pious people sometimes carried them on their persons. Clement of Alexandria has mentioned some which we ought to avoid, and others which we may employ, of which latter we may name the dove, the fish, the ship borne along by a full breeze, and the anchor."

There has often been a tendency, among Jews, heathens, and Christians also, to turn symbols into images or actual fetishes;
thus in the Middle Ages the Cross, from being the emblem of the life and death of God for man, became an object of worship in itself.

Mr. Pugin, in his Glossary, p. 149, gives particulars of some of the symbols used in the vestments of the Roman Catholic clergy:
"For the Pope the usual emblem is a triple cross and cross keys; an archbishop, a crozier; a bishop, a pastoral staff; an emperor, a sword and orb, with a cross; a king,
one or two sceptres and sometimes a sword;
an abbot, a pastoral staff and a book; a pilgrim, a staff and a shield; a monk, a book; a hermit, a book, rosary, and staff;
priest, a chalice with the blessed Sacrament;
deacon, the book of the Holy Gospels; sub-deacon, chalice and cruets; acolyths, a candle;
lectors and exorcists, books; ostiarii, a key;
knights, a sword; all ecclesiastics who have written, with books in their hands."

The following are the emblems of the Apostles:—St. Peter, a gold and silver key, also a book; St. Paul, a sword and a book; St. Andrew, a cross like the letter X; St. James the Great, a sword and book, also a pilgrim's staff and shell; St. John, a chalice, with a small dragon, a caldron, also an eagle; St. Philip, a spear, also a cross; St. Bartholomew, a flaying knife, and skin on his arm; St. Matthew, a spear, also a carpenter's square; St. Thomas, a dart; St. James the Less, a club; St. Matthias, an axe; St. Simon, a saw; St. Jude, a halberd.

The emblems of the Evangelists were not originally those which are now universally adopted, and which do not seem to have been used as Christian emblems before the fifth century. The four rivers of Paradise seem to have been intended to represent the Gospels, and are often so found in very early Christian art. Mrs. Jameson, in her Sacred and Legendary Art, says that the connection between the vision of Ezekiel and that of St. John was noticed as early as the second century, though there is a good deal of difference between the descriptions of the beasts in the records of these visions. The first representations of the four beasts are found in the fifth century, and later still the application was made of each symbol to one of the four writers. St. Matthew is represented with the face of a man, because his Gospel gives Christ's human genealogy; St. Mark is the lion, as showing His royal dignity; St. Luke is the ox, because he dwells on the sacrifice of Christ, "Priest and Victim;" and St. John, the eagle, teaches of our Lord's Divine nature.

Emerson, RALPH WALDO [b. 1803, d. 1882], a philosophical writer of America, born at Boston of an old English stock, who had come thither 170 years before. His second Christian name came from Rebecca Waldo, whose family had fled from the slaughter in the Waldensian valleys, which Milton has so nobly commemorated, and who married one of Emerson's ancestors in the seventeenth century. He was "a Protestant of Protestants," he used to say. His father dying when he was young, Emerson was in straitened means. In 1829 he was ordained a minister of a Unitarian Church at Boston, but its forms, though fewer than in most religious bodies, were more than he could bear. Even the Communion Service, in its least sacramental interpretation, seemed to him to militate against spirituality, and he resigned his charge in 1832, sorely against the wishes of his congregation. He continued to preach, however, for five or six years longer, but doubts on the subject of public prayer came upon him. One man offering prayer vicariously, he thought, was a form likely to deaden the spirit, and in 1838 he finally ceased preaching. He told his friends that henceforth he must find his pulpit only on the lecturer's platform; "it

Eminence.—The title of a card distinction of Eminence is tolerably and is frequently given to the Italian by Gregory the Great; but it has into disuse, and the cardinals were

d as Most Illustrious, or Your Most us Lordship. But in 1630 Pope Urban II., not considering this title proper to the dignity of their office, issued a Bull, ordaining that all persons, being crowned heads, should in future take the title of Eminence to the cardinals, with a strict prohibition of its use towards any person with the exception of the Grand Master of the Knights of Malta.

Enkratites.—Heretics who appeared in the second century, and who are said by some to have been followers of Saturninus of Gaul, and afterwards to have put themselves under the leadership of Tatian. Tatian held a form of Gnosticism, practising severe mortification of the body, and abstaining from marriage. He derived the name Enkratites, "self-restrained." Tatian wrote a book called de Evangelio, in which he represents the Law and marriage as the work of the devil. Epiphanius gives the chief doctrines of the Enkratites as follows:—[1] That the principalities in the heavens, and the angels, are subject to the true God, independent of his arbitrary will in his conduct; [2] that men ought to avoid marriage, eat nothing of the flesh, nor drink any wine; [3] that the body should be used in the Holy Spirit, and for this reason the Enkratites were called Hydroparastatæ. Epiphanius states that in his time they lived in great numbers in Asia Minor, Phrygia, Pisidia, and Enclitic.—A circular letter written by a Pope, and sent round to all the members of his communion, condemning errors, giving instruction, etc. In earlier times the word was used in a fuller sense for a decree passed round among the clergy.

Encyclopædists.—A name given to persons who compiled a work which is properly called L'Encyclopédie, as Rome is called The City, and as the Revolution is called The Revolution. The book has had such a powerful effect on religious opinions that it is necessary to give some account of it here. About 1748, Chambers's Encyclopædia was translated into French and began to make an impression in France. Some bookseller, scenting a profitable business, proposed to Diderot [DIDEROT] to make a French translation; he undertook the work, and soon discovered the incompleteness of the work, and conceived the idea of completing it. He determined to make a survey of all human sciences, to collect and classify in one immense deposit all human knowledge, every result of art and civilisation. But notwithstanding his courage and his prodigious facility, he found he must have a coadjutor in so important a work, and he proposed to his friend D'Alembert to share with him the crushing burden of his wonderful undertaking. Instantly the idea grew in the minds of the two. Diderot put forth the prospectus of the work in Nov., 1750, and meanwhile D'Alembert penned the preface, which was much commended by Voltaire. The two authors then called in the aid of the most learned men of France. Diderot undertook the important part of arts and trades, of the history of ancient philosophy, and of the general coordination of all the materials which must be brought to the common reservoir; D'Alembert, the most noted mathematician of his day, undertook the mathematical sciences. Voltaire sounded the trumpet of the coming Encyclopédie to such purpose that he secured the best men under its banner. Rousseau undertook music; and among the branches which were confided to specialists were natural history, theology, metaphysics, logic, morals, jurisprudence, heraldry, elementary sciences, fortification and military tactics, stone-cutting, gardening, hydraulics, anatomy and psychology; surgery, medicine, architecture, clock-making, and astronomical instruments; painting, sculpture, and engraving; grammar and philology. Diderot himself was a man of astonishing power; his capacity for learning was unbounded; he could in a moment bring his thoughts from the highest metaphysics to the workshop of the joiner. He was extremely generous to other authors: ready to aid whoever came to him for help, whether intimate friends or utter strangers. His energy in working seemed positively inexhaustible; every evening, after a hard day of brain-work, he would repair to the Café Procope, where an assembly of his friends always awaited him and hung on his words, and often stole his ideas to their own profit. Examples of this wonderful power are mentioned abundantly by M. Larousse in the preface to his Grand Dictionnaire Universel du XIX^e Siècle, pp. xxiv. and xxv.

At length the Encyclopédie set sail. In 1751, on the eve of the publication of the first volume, in the midst of much excitement, and whilst encouragements were flowing in from all parts of Europe, low murmurings against the work swelled into a roar. Diderot's well-known religious opinions had given the alarm. The Jesuits had sought admission amongst the theological contributors and had been repulsed; the Jansenists had met with a like fate; such a man as Diderot could not suffer any opinion contrary to his own to shape his work. For once Jesuit and Jansenist were seen under the same flag—proclaiming war against "Impiety and Irreligion." Chaumeix, a Convulsionary, wrote a fierce work against the forthcoming Encyclopédie; Louis XV.'s chaplain thundered against it before him;

Diderot was named Antichrist, and the Encyclopédie the Beast of the Revelation. On Feb. 7th, 1752, a decree of the King's Council was issued for the suppression of the two volumes which had already appeared, on the ground "that they contained principles tending to the destruction of royal authority, to the establishment of the spirit of independence and revolt, and under obscure and equivocal language to lay again the foundations of error, of corrupt morals, of irreligion and of unbelief." For eighteen months the printing was suspended, but the indomitable activity of Diderot overcame all obstacles; five fresh volumes appeared, but on March 8th, 1759, a fresh decree came forth against it. Here is Voltaire's account of these proceedings:—"Several volumes had appeared to the public satisfaction. The articles composed by those who presided over the work had especially the public approval. The book was furnished with all those formalities which would ensure its sale. The subscribers from all parts of Europe, who had paid in advance, considered it secure under the safeguard of the royal seal, and made sure of receiving without difficulty the value of their money; for if, on the part of the authors, this work was a gratuitous service rendered to the human mind, this service was, amongst the subscribers and booksellers, an interested agreement which must be fulfilled. Envy unchained itself and soon armed fanaticism. These two enemies of reason and talent denounced to the Parliament of Paris a dictionary which did not seem to promise to be the object of a law-suit, and which, besides being furnished with the seal of royal approbation, seemed to be out of the reach of attack. The Jesuits were the first to pursue, as much as they could, this great work, because, having asked to contribute theological articles, they had been refused. The Jesuits did not then doubt that they would soon be proscribed by these same Parliaments which they wished secretly to arm against the Encyclopédie. The Jansenists did what the Jesuits wanted to have done; they saw that all those who would give their work to this dictionary, regarding impartiality as their fundamental law, were neither for the Jesuits nor the Jansenists, and that, being solely devoted to the search for truth, they excited horror of fanaticism. Thus two parties at war with each other were, so to say, united, much as thieves suspend their quarrels whilst seizing their spoils. They put on the mask of piety; they denounced several passages, and, by a refinement of wickedness such as had not been met with before in the most furious controversies, not daring to attack in the dictionary of the Encyclopédie certain articles which startled them, they accused the authors not of what they had said, but of what they would say some day; they pretended that the references from one subject to another were put on purpose to spread in the last volumes the poison which not be detected in the earlier ones raised themselves thus against orthodox theological articles, believed to be composed by those whom they ruin. How could Parliament judge folio volumes already printed and those which were not? The accused their memorial in the hands of an General (Omer Joly de Fleury), who less time to examine this marvellous arts and sciences which no one man undertake. This magistrate had the right to believe the calumnious memorials had received, and to form his suit. These memorials attacked in part article Soul, which was thought to be by the moralist philosophers who sought to bring under suspicion. It was denounced as establishing materialism; it happened that it was by a Licentiate of Sorbonne, recognised as very orthodox, who, far from favouring materialism against it so far as to object to the philosophy of Locke with more piety than philosophy. This singular mistake was soon known to the public, but not till after the decree of the Parliament establishing commissaries to examine the work, who meanwhile forbade its sale to the public, nevertheless, hoped yet to enjoy which they yearned for the more it was persecuted."

Voltaire also relates in 1774 an anecdote concerning the Encyclopédie. "I was at supper with a small party at the Palace of Versailles, and the conversation turned on the subject of the component parts of government. Also Mme. de Pompadour wanted to know what rouge was made of. The Comte de Vallière hinted that, if his Majesty deprived them of their Encyclopédie, they would be at no loss for colour on these points. At the end of the evening the King sent for a copy to be brought, and at once the information was given. "Truly," said the King, "I don't believe I have been told so much evil about a book!" Meantime the Count de Caylus, who had been turning over the leaves, claimed aloud, "Sire, you are too ignorant that under your reign have been able to know all the arts and to transmit them to posterity. Everything is here, the way to make a pin to the way of mending, pointing your cannons; from the smallest to the infinitely great. Thank you for having made your kingdom the place of those who have thus done for the whole world. Either other nations buy the Encyclopédie or they make it. Take all my goods, if you will, and give me back my Encyclopédie!"

No doubt there was a great deal of fanaticism in the opposition, and, as one sees in times of religious excitement, what is useful and good is confounded vil, and wheat is called tares. But real ground for alarm. The last volume, being the eighteenth, was published in 1765. A supplement of six volumes was added in 1766-7.

Endowments.—These consist of property, or of the tithe of income, the usufruct of which is appropriated to the maintenance of the clergy, and is secured to them by law. The subject may be most conveniently illustrated by an account of the endowment system of the Church of England.

Land Endowments are traceable in England for about thirteen centuries. At the consecration of Ripon Minster [A.D. 670], Bishop Wilfrid spoke of lands which had been granted to the Church in Yorkshire by the kings of ages preceding the time of the Saxon invasion, but which had been lost when the clergy fled before the swords of the invaders. The laws of King Ethelbert [A.D. 597-604] expressly provide also for the protection of Church lands, by enacting heavy fines on those who despoiled them; Ethelbert himself having followed the example of his predecessors by endowing with lands the Sees and Cathedrals of Canterbury, Rochester, and London. Church endowments of land are also found in A.D. 635-655 at Lindisfarne and in other parts of the kingdom of Northumbria, at Malmesbury in A.D. 675, at Peterborough in A.D. 680, in the Isle of Wight in A.D. 686, at Evesham in A.D. 706, in Kent in A.D. 788, and in a great number of places in all parts of England at the same early period.

It was out of this system of land endowment that the parochial system arose. In the eighth century the historian Bede speaks of the clergy as still being maintained out of the common funds placed in the hands of the bishop of the diocese for the general work of the Church of that diocese. But soon after Bede's time, landowners began the general practice of erecting churches on their estates, and it was laid down as a law that a "manse" should be provided in every such case by the landowner, which was to be appropriated as a freehold for the church and churchyard, and for the residence of the clergyman detailed off from his general staff by the bishop for service of that particular church. At the same time the tithes, which were payable from the landowner's estate, were appropriated to the maintenance of the clergyman thus settled upon it, instead of being sent to the bishop for the general purposes of the diocese, as had been previously done.

Thus gifts of land to the Church went on increasing during the whole time that the parochial divisions of each diocese were being and, as a rule, every parish in the was endowed with its church estate, of larger or smaller dimensions, to the generosity of the landowner as founding the parish and building church for the benefit of himself and dependents. And then to the lands which were given for the foundation and maintenance of bishoprics and cathedrals there added those for the establishment of abbeys and parish churches.

But the land endowments of the Church of England were largely increased during the middle Ages by two systems, which were to some degree auxiliary to the parochial system, though not at all of necessity to the pastoral work of the Church. The first of these was the Monastic system. The second that of Chantry. For the two bodies of clergy connected with monasteries and chantries, large land endowments were provided, such as to diverting the wealth of the laity from the regular pastoral clergy. This became so general, however, that mortmain laws had to be passed for the purpose of restricting the facilities for making bequests of land for religious uses, yet in spite of these laws, the estates of the monasteries grew to such an exorbitant size as to become a public evil, and form a great temptation to those who had it in their power to confiscate them.

The lands which belonged to the Church of England before the Reformation consisted, therefore, of three distinct classes:—[1] Those by which bishoprics, cathedrals, and parish churches were endowed; [2] those by which monasteries were endowed; [3] and those by which chantries were endowed. The second and third classes were entirely alienated from religious uses by Henry VIII and Edward VI, and were mostly bestowed by the Crown on private laymen. What was left for religious use was simply the episcopal, capitular, and parochial lands comprehended in the first class, and of these a large proportion of the parochial lands which had come into the hands of the monks was confiscated as monastic property. Many of the episcopal houses, such as York House—now Whitehall—together with large episcopal estates, were also taken by the Crown in the reigns of the Tudors; and at the end of Edward VI's reign, preparations had been made to confiscate the whole of the endowments of the cathedrals. Since the time of Queen Elizabeth, Church land endowments have, however, suffered little or no diminution at the hands of the Crown, and being let alone, they have, in some places, increased so largely in value that the Ecclesiastical Commissioners have been entrusted with the duty of redistributing them or their revenues, so as to meet the necessities entailed by the great increase of population.

The tithe system was no doubt derived from the Jewish system, the Christian Church from the Jews, whom it was a Divine institution, the tithe paid to the Jewish clergy being regarded as an offering made to God Himself [Lev. x. 30; Numb. xviii. 21; Mal. iii. 8]. It is referred to as an ancient Christian institution by St Augustine of Hippo, who wrote his forty-eighth homily, "Our forefathers abounded in all things, because they gave tithes to God and tribute to Cæsar; but as devotion decreased, exactions are increased. We would not give God His part in the tithe of the tenth, and therefore the whole must be from us. That which Christ receives from the tax-gatherer seizes." St. Boniface (the English missionary bishop), writing to the Archbishop of Canterbury, about 800, speaks of tithes as being then paid in the hands of the bishop of the diocese, a selection of canons known as the Canon of Egbert, Archbishop of York, which probably made in the same century, the and fourth direct the clergy to enforce the minds of the people the duty of tithes, to keep a strict account of them to distribute them in three parts: the use of the cathedral, the second poor and strangers, and the third for own maintenance. The twenty-fourth in the same collection speaks of the ancient date, while the ninety-ninth hundred and third are occupied with tithes, and the third of clerical and laity, probably a mixture was held at Caen, 785 or 787, a mixed and the seventeenth canon then relates to tithes, directing that a be deducted from them by the them, but from the nine parts still remaining. From that constant stream of legislation them, in mixed assemblies of tithes, in councils and in Parliament, in modern times.

After the earlier ages, the of tithes—that of each part of his income for religious gradually corrupted into a particular kind of income on a particular produce. Exemptions of a very unfair nature were introduced in medieval times by the monasteries. From the Reformation, and at the Reformation, arose, and at the Reformation, necessary to pass very strict laws [27 Hen. VIII., c. 20] enforcing their payment, went on increasing, proved cultivation, and tithes-owners were paid to compound, As this voluntary system bound successors, lay tion, and in 1836 a Tithe Commutation Act passed, which has been followed by similar Acts of Parliament. These laws gradually substituted a rent-charge, on calculations of the value of grain, for the old tithe; thus making an arrangement by which the occupier of land pays the value of its annual produce to the tithe-owner.

Since the Reformation, a large proportion of tithe-owners are laymen, whose property once belonged to the monasteries.

It thus be seen that the tithe system existed in the ancient ecclesiastical customs of the Jews and the Patriarchs [Gen. xiv. 20, 22], and that it is at present enforced by Acts of Parliament founded on a compact between the tithe-payer and the tithe-owner; also that tithes are paid by only a small proportion of the population, and that they are often paid to laymen as well as to the clergy.

The inalienable character of Church endowments is a principle only recently questioned, and is certainly recognised by law. Buildings and sites which have been made over to the church by a deed of consecration are never removed from religious use except under the pressure of great public necessity; and when such necessity arises the value of the property is transferred to some other similar use. Thus, if a church is pulled down to widen a street or thoroughfare, another church is built elsewhere. The same principle is also recognised in dealing with property set apart for the maintenance of the clergy; so that when the rich bishoprics, deaneries, canonries, or other benefices have been reduced in value, the property taken away from them has been used to increase the incomes of the clergy whose benefices were too small to provide them with the means of maintenance.

It is generally conceded that the State has a constitutional right to do several things in respect to endowments; as, for example:—
To see that the duties for which endowments were given by their donors are actually performed. [2] To re-assign any endowments which there are no longer such recipients for such purposes as they were provided for. To control the administration of endowments in such a way as to prevent their misapplication and to ensure that mode of their application to the object for which they were provided which may be most for the general benefit of those in whose interest they were bestowed.

Eucharistic.—A name given to the disciples Martin and Zwingli, who taught that the elements in the Eucharist were symbols of the body and blood of Christ, but were not to be understood as the representation of His Body and Blood.

Ergumens [Gr. energoumenos].—Demons, persons possessed by an evil spirit.

The early Church instituted a regular discipline with regard to them, and a special order to minister to them. [EXORCISTS.] Prayers were offered for them in the oblation at the altar, and also at other times by the exorcists, when there was no assembly in the church, and they were employed in some innocent occupations, such as sweeping the church, which it seems was the chief place of their residence. They were not allowed to enter the church during service, but remained at the lower part with such of the catechumens and penitents as were commonly called audientes, hearers, because they were allowed to stand there to hear the Psalms and Scriptures read, and the sermon, after which they were dismissed without any prayers or solemn benediction. Baptism was administered to them only when death seemed imminent; those who had been baptised previous to their possession were allowed to receive the Eucharist occasionally in the intervals of their malady. Naturally they were debarred from ordination.

England, CHURCH OF.—The earliest inhabitants of this country that appear in history, known as the "Britons," were pagans, and the Druids were their ministering priests. [DRUIDS.] They were partially Christianised soon after the Apostolic Age. There are many and various traditions respecting the missionary work here of Apostolic men, such as Joseph of Arimathea, whose name is so closely connected with Glastonbury; but especially a persistent tradition points to a visit of St. Paul to this country, at some time between his liberation from his first imprisonment at Rome, which took place in the year 63, and his martyrdom, which occurred in A.D. 68. The traditions of early Christian times declare it almost certain that when St. Paul was set free he carried out his long-formed plan of going from Rome to Spain. [Rom. xv. 24, 28.] The writer of a very early document [A.D. 150–170], known after its discoverer, the great scholar Muratori, as the "Muratorian Fragment," cites the Acts of the Apostles as the work of an eye-witness, but adds that Luke does not record "the journey of Paul from Rome to Spain," as if the actual performance of that journey was a fact well known to the Christian world, as it may well have been, since the writer may have been a grandson of one who had been contemporary with the Apostle. St. Chrysostom expressly states that "after his residence in Rome the Apostle departed to Spain." It is probable that after spending some time in Spain, the Apostle visited adjacent countries, such as France, where Trophimus, the unintentional cause of his last troubles at Jerusalem [Acts xxi. 29], became Bishop of Arles, in the ecclesiastical province of which patriarchal archbishopric Britain was, in the early Christian days, included; and there is nothing improbable in the supposition that Trophimus may have received a visit from St. Paul before they started on the Apostle's last missionary work [2 Tim. iv. 20], and have carried him over to Britain to lay the foundation of a church there. Less than thirty years [A.D. 96] after St. Paul's martyrdom, St. Clement, his fellow-labourer [Phil. iv. 3] writes that the Apostle preached "both in the east and in the west," and that "having taught righteousness to the whole world, he came to the extreme limit of the west" [Clem., 1 Corinth. v.], that expression being exactly the one which was used to signify Spain, France, and Britain [Theodoret, Philothæus, xxvi. 881]; and the Britons being regarded as inhabitants of the furthest extremity of the world—"ultimos orbis Britannos" [Horace, Odes, I. XXXV., 29]—by generations which little dreamed of the great continents that lay further west.

St. Paul may, however, have found Christianity already known in Britain, for there were doubtless Christians among the Roman army of occupation, and the early Christians were ever desirous of receiving over converts to their religion. As early as A.D. 47, a lady named Pomponia Græcina, the wife of Aulus Plautius, who was Viceroy in Britain to the Emperor Claudius, was accused, on her return to Rome, of practising a "foreign superstition" unauthorised by the Roman law [Tacit., Ann. xiii. 32], and this was almost certainly Christianity. Gildas also [A.D. 560], the earliest historian of England, tells his readers that the sun of Christianity arose in this land about the time when Queen Boadicea was defeated by the Romans, which was in the year 62 or 63.

During the first four centuries, the Christians of Britain are frequently mentioned by the Fathers, as may be seen in the adjoining references:—Tertull. agt. Jews, vii.; Orig. Hom. on Luke vi.; Euseb. Evangel. Demonstr. iii.; Athanas. Apol. agt. Arians; Chrysost. on 2 Tim. iv. 17; Jerome on Amos v. 8; Theodoret on Ps. cxvi.; 2 Tim. iv. 17.

These traditionary records are obviously associated with the fact that Christians were known to exist among the inhabitants of Britain at the time when they were current. And the short records concerning SAINTS ALBAN, AARON, and others, show how far traditions were current in later times of some Christians of this early period having been enrolled among the number of the martyrs.

But if there were Christians in Britain in the earliest ages of Christianity, it is also certain that they were organised into one or more spiritual communities; for there is no record of any converts to Christianity in the Apostolic period or near to it, in which the persons so converted were not formed into a Church, a society aiming to continue in the fellowship and doctrine of the Apostles, and to carry out their system of devotion. [Acts ii. 42.] Hence, as we should expect, early Christian writers refer to the Christianity of Britain in their own time as to an organised system of religion, which had been long enough to be well rooted in the land. Eusebius bears testimony to the existence of an episcopal ministry in Britain. In his time there were three British bishops who appeared among those who assembled at the Council of Arles, in France, in A.D. 314. These are expressly called the bishops of Exeter, London, Caerleon, and York, and are mentioned by name in an almost contemporary record. [ADELPHUS.] St. Athanasius in his Synodal Epistle, tells the Emperor Jovian that there were also British bishops at the Council of Nicæa [A.D. 325]. In short, the evidence for the existence of an early organised Christianity in the first five centuries is so clear and definite that the most trustworthy and critical of modern historical writers, Bishop Stubbs and Mr. Haddan, are obliged to print it, with references and dates, in their original languages, and it extends over many pages of their great work [Haddan and Stubbs, Councils, and Ecclesiastical Documents relating to Great Britain and Ireland]. Such printed evidence—much more abundant than has here been indicated—the reader may gather the following facts respecting Primitive Christianity of this country.

I.—That there were Christians in Britain during its occupation by Roman troops, ending in the fifth century.

II.—That these Christians were organised into a general society or diocesan system, which indicate a national church, or a unity of diocesan churches, presided over by bishops who attended General Councils, and took their part in settling the affairs of the Church throughout the world.

III.—That at the latter end of the fourth century there was a long-settled Christianity in Britain, especially in that part of it now called England and Wales, within which Divine Worship was carried on.

IV.—That there are a few antiquities existing which belong to the period of the early Church of England.

V.—That there are many notices of the Primitive Church of England to be found in more or less obscure sources of information which are not very accessible to the reader.

VI.—That this early Church of ours adhered strictly to the Nicene Creed, the main lines of its belief, and to the Latin version of the Scriptures which, in the first five centuries, was commonly used throughout the Roman Empire.

The existence of this early British Christianity is perhaps in no way brought home so vividly to the mind than by the remains of the churches built during the period, and existing in a more or less perfect state of preservation. Such is the church of the eighth century, which still stands in the town of Dover; the ruins of another at Richborough.

Their Christianity was also Roman in

In confirmation of this latter fact some sculp-

a remarkable amalgamation of the conquer-over such larger surface of the country on mixed population are very bare during the greater part of the sixth century, although authentic and comparatively full details have been handed down respecting the dioceses of Llandaff and St. Davids, and other portions of the Western Highlands where no great change had taken place. We may, however, pass over here the justly venerated names of St. David, St. Asaph, St. Columba, St. Kenti-gern, and St. Patrick, which are all noticed in their respective places, and come shortly to the close of the sixth century. For awhile the power of German heathenism so predominated that the few native or British clergy who were left alive were driven from their churches, and often—perhaps mostly—assumed the hermit life, doing what they could for the few Christians around them, and for the conquerors also, though little was to be done for the conversion of the rough and warlike soldiers, who looked with contempt on those whom they had conquered and enslaved.

The bishops of the British Church retired with the rest of the clergy, hopeless of maintaining their positions. Theonas and Thadiorus, Bishops of London and York, are heard of in their retreats in Wales, whither they had fled in A.D. 587, and others came out of their retirement to meet St. Augustine in conference.

The ancient Church of the land was thus so much depressed by the English conquest that it was all but lost sight of, and the mission which St. Gregory desired to undertake, and which St. Augustine actually did undertake, was a mission to convert Britain anew to Christianity. [AUGUSTINE, ST., OF CANTERBURY.]
It did indeed become so far an independent movement that for a time there was an "Anglo-Saxon" Church of England, as it has been called by later ages, side by side with the old "British" Church of the same country. But the two Churches gradually amalgamated as the two races—the conquered Celtic race and the conquering German race—amalgamated; and although the more ancient of the two Churches maintained and still maintains a kind of partial independence through the differences of race and language in the four dioceses of Wales, yet the Christianity of the whole country south of the Cheviots became henceforth consolidated into the one "Church of England," divided in a short time into the Archbishopric Provinces of Canterbury and of York; these latter being composed of dioceses which followed in their boundaries the political divisions of the seven kingdoms into which England was now parcelled off.

For a time, each of the seven kingdoms of the Saxon Heptarchy had one bishop only.
Thus there was a Bishop of Northumbria, a kingdom which stretched from the Tweed to the Humber, including the north-western as well as the north-eastern counties; a Bishop of Mercia, which included the whole Midland country, from the border of Wales to the eastern coast, and from Chester to Hertfordshire and West London; a Bishop of the kingdom of Kent; a Bishop of Wessex, or the West Saxons, taking in the people of Berks, Hants, Wilts, Dorset, Devon, and Cornwall; a Bishop of Sussex, or the South Saxons, the people of Sussex and Surrey; a Bishop of Essex, or the East Saxons, the people of Essex, Middlesex, and part of Herts; and a Bishop of East Anglia—Norfolk, Suffolk, Cambridgeshire, and the Isle of Ely. Yet this was not a rule without exceptions, for in the kingdom of Kent there was a See at Rochester as well as at Canterbury. This plan of making each kingdom a See was soon found, however, to be unsuitable to the spiritual necessities of the Church. Kingdoms grew too large and populous for dioceses, and then the latter were subdivided; as, for example, the one great diocese of Mercia was divided before the seventh century into the five dioceses of Lindsey, Leicester, Lichfield, Hereford, and Worcester; while that of Northumbria became divided during the same period into the four dioceses of York, Lindisfarne, Hexham, and Whithorn; and, long before the Norman Conquest, the great diocese of Wessex or Winchester became divided into the four dioceses of Winchester, Ramsbury, Wells, and Crediton. Notices of this subdivision of Christian England will be found at the proper references. Although, therefore, there are some historical traces of the modern diocesan system of the Church of England even in the Romano-British period [London; York], yet the system, as it has since existed in the mediæval and the modern periods, may rather be said to have been originated in the Anglo-Saxon period.

The Sees thus established remained substantially the same until the reign of Henry VIII., who added a few more out of the spoils obtained from the suppression of the monasteries. The bishops were nominally elected, as they still are, by the cathedral chapters; but the Crown always influenced, and generally monopolised, the appointment. Parish churches were probably as many in number as at the beginning of the present century, whilst nearly every monarch of the days before the Conquest founded some monastery. Thus, Westminster Abbey was founded by Edward the Confessor, Waltham by Harold, St. Albans by Offa, while King Edgar is said to have founded forty-eight religious houses during his sixteen years' reign.

The old English, generally known as the Anglo-Saxon Church, professed, in a Council held A.D. 680, the tenets taught by the first five General Councils. To these was added, in 787, the sixth Council. Purgatory, prayers for the dead, auricular confession, were all recognised; but not so Transubstantiation. The celibacy of the clergy was the cause of a very severe struggle in the Saxon Church. [CELIBACY; DURNFORD]

THE NORMAN CONQUEST was followed by a large advance in the power of the Church. The Conqueror was far enough from any of his rights or prerogatives, suffered no ecclesiastical interference, his sanction; but some of the Acts of his reign became, in the days of less powerful rulers, instruments in Papal hands to further their purposes. Accordingly, from the reign of Henry I. to John, the Papal steadily grew. Archbishop Anselm refused to render homage to Henry I. in his bishopric, and the investiture struggle virtually in Papal victory. [INVESTITURE] The civil wars of Stephen caused both him and Matilda to seek ecclesiastical aid. Henry in spite of his energy, was worsted in contest with Becket; the Constitution of Clarendon proved inoperative; and the murder of the Primate turned popular submission of King John, when he crowned at the feet of Cardinal Pandulph, declared himself a vassal of the Pope. Papal power began to decline in England during the long reign of Henry II. Papal exactions caused a feeling of hostility. In the reign of Edward I. people looked tranquilly on while the Statute of Præmuner were plundered. In that of Edward II. the exercise of patronage by the King and forbidding appeals to Rome, rising against the doctrinal errors which found eloquent expression in the Wycliffe son of Wycliffe. [WYCLIFFE] His followers, known as Lollards, to half the population of the King, who closed with any bolster up his usurpation of the help of the powerful. The act of Heretics Comb strengthened the growing coming Reformation, which by the great PAPAL augmented. The great head of Reformation, said to have reached England in the reign of Edward VI. All legislation was directed towards innovation in doctrine, to maintain the settlement of the adherents of Rome. With the death of Mary, acceding to the old faith, it was still held to look to the

to enforce compliance with it, at her brother's policy; the acts of her reign touching religion were the doctrine of Transubstantiation, the married clergy were all deprived of their livings, and the reconciliation with the Holy See was proposed by Cardinal Pole at Westminster, and the two Houses of Parliament were unwilling to receive it. Then began the Reformation. The prominent Reformers were the Lollards; but before the end of the sixteenth century a hundred persons had perished in the flames, and thereby England was utterly separated from Rome.

Restored the Reformed Church to its position; 178 clergy only took the oath of the Royal Supremacy, the Act of Uniformity [1559] took the place of the Book of Common Prayer. This marks the close of the first Reformation period. It defined the position of the Church in relation to the religious bodies on which had broken off from that position. In the first place the episcopal system was retained [Parker]. In the second place the Act of Supremacy, in which the Pope is styled "Supreme Governor," was retained, and that clergy and laity alike were bound to Law, passed by Convocation, and enforced by the Crown. The Book of Common Prayer, though substantially agreeing with the second book of Edward VI., yet desired to find a mode of agreement with those who loved the ancient system. [Parker.] And the Thirty-nine Articles, though they bore a provisional character, did not lack the all-round completeness of the Continental Confessions, were the same desire of conciliation. With rehearsing the faith held in Christendom [i.-v.], then defined the faith, and, in contradiction to the ancient position, appealed to Holy Scripture, and set up boldly the fundamental principles of the Reformation, while the ancient position was reasserted [vi.-viii.]. Next, the principles of Justification by Faith alone were considered, the Latin being used, but guarded and appeals to Scripture generally. Next, the nature and authority of the Church, the sacredness of the ministry, the efficacy of the Sacraments are all defined [ix.-xxxvi.]; after which the position of the Crown, the Church, and the people are defined. But now it was that there were two parties within the Church of England. There were those who, having freed themselves from papal tyranny, desired to follow the statesmanlike policy of Cranmer, and the hot zeal of partisans, to make late opponents rather than to have any connexion with the past; and there were those who, in the exercise of private judgment, hated any approximation to the Church of Rome, and craved fuller liberty of action and opinion. These are known as Puritans [q.v.]. Their objections seem to have been at first confined to points of ceremonial and discipline; but Elizabeth, bent on preserving as much as was left of the ancient order, was uniformly opposed to them, and the High Commission Court, in which her supremacy was represented, took stringent measures against them. Hence the practice began of holding separate meetings for religious worship, in which we have the origin of Nonconformity. The essential principle underlying this opposition was Calvinism, the very essence of which was inconsistent with the preservation of the ancient basis of Church doctrine and order. It met the excommunication of Rome with an equally intolerant rejoinder, and substituted individual consciousness for the Sacraments and Ministry. The Puritans were as far removed as the bitterest of their antagonists from any idea of toleration.

The first attack which was made against Calvinism in the Church was the movement known as Arminianism. [ARMINIANS.] But whereas in Holland, its native country, Arminianism took latitudinarian shape in its revolt against the narrow view of "Election," in England those who were called Arminians by their opponents, though they repudiated this title, were those who opposed to the Calvinistic tenet the assertion of the Catholic Church as to sacraments conveying grace to all who accepted them. The greatest writer against the Anti-Catholic view was Hooker, whose name stands in the front rank of Church divines. [HOOKER.] Somewhat in advance of him in view was Andrewes, a better theologian, so far as Patristic learning went, and Laud, a clever and indefatigable administrator. In these men we have the founders of the great Anglo-Catholic school, a school which has lived on, and has created the most permanent Anglican theology. This school included such divines as Jeremy Taylor (a name which such a great critic as Coleridge pronounced to be a rival to Shakespeare), Hall, Patrick, Ken, Bramhall, Wilson, Pearson, Thorndike, Bull, Pusey; poets like George Herbert, Wordsworth, Keble: the greatest of English Church historians, Jeremy Collier; laymen such as Boyle, Evelyn, Robert Nelson, Gladstone, Beresford Hope. It, more than any other influence of that time, prevented the Church of England from becoming a Calvinistic sect, affirming as it did that the sacraments are not mere acts of man, nor empty signs, nor acted prayers, but are verily outward channels conveying inward grace. Unhappily, however, errors of judgment mingled themselves with the holy aspirations, the learning, and the zeal, which marked the rise of this great school. It was learned; it had to defend the position of the Church against the skilful Jesuit controversialists; and a style of writing resulted which was not adapted for popular reading, but suited the learned only. The half-educated liked it probably least of all. The utterly unlearned took a line not unlike that of the "Northern Farmer":—

"I thowt a said whot a owt to 'a said an' I coom'd awaäy."

Those who could read and think for themselves, but yet knew not enough to enter into intricacies and balance conflicting arguments, were at sea with learned disquisitions, and, therefore, were more at home with The Saint's Rest and Pilgrim's Progress. Moreover, the Church suffered heavily for its alliance with the Crown, an alliance to be traced to all the traditions of past ages, which held that the national religion followed the national government, an opinion held as firmly by Presbyterians as by Churchmen. The fulsome dedications, such as Bacon's of The Advancement of Learning, and in Spenser's Faërie Queene, were regarded as right and proper, and the translators' Preface to the Bible of 1611 does not escape the taint, though, as a matter of fact, it was written by a Puritan. The result was that the Catholic view of the Church became inextricably mixed up with an unpopular and decaying political creed, though the present position of this school in England is sufficient to show that it does not rest upon Court favour, and that its doctrine and discipline do not depend upon law courts and arbitrarily wielded civil power. But through the cause we have named, it was regarded then as one with the Stuart State policy, and, in consequence, it shared the Stuart fall. When the Civil War broke out, the bishops were expelled from the House of Lords [1641], and in 1643 Episcopacy itself was abolished. The direction of religion was vested in the WESTMINSTER ASSEMBLY [q.v.], the DIRECTORY was substituted for the Prayer Book, 3,000 clergy were turned out of their churches and homes, and Archbishop Laud was beheaded.

But the triumphant Calvinistic party began to decay in the very hour of its triumph. It broke up into antagonistic schools; the Independents, the strongest of the new "sectaries," put forth a theory, not only of religious toleration, but of recognised religious diversity, a theory legitimately belonging to Congregationalism, but hateful to the Presbyterians. Logical Calvinism, however, never took hold of the average English mind. It had been adopted in the struggle for political liberty; but, that struggle ended, it stood forth in the nakedness of its hard and ruthless dogmatism, and Englishmen turned away shuddering. At the Restoration, the Church at once returned to its former place, to the joy of the nation; so entire was the reaction against the dogmatic yoke of the Puritans. Wonderful to read how quietly this took place. But a change at once visible in the tone of the Church. The formularies and principles remained as before, but the Church was leavened with admixture of new thought. Men like John Locke and John Hyde had been conspicuous supporters of the Parliament against the Church in the early days of this conflict; but they remained firm supporters of the Church when it was their love of the Church which drew them to join the Royal cause. John Tillotson represented a party, who, by joining the cause of Andrewes and Laud, removed its harsh and rigid features, and led it to a larger comprehensiveness. To this was added the Cambridge Platonists [q.v.], whose endeavour to reconcile reason and faith was another blow struck against Calvinistic dogmatism. That dogmatism provoked a reaction utterly unexpected [HOBBS.] Whichcote stands as the representative of a school not numerous, but influential, which held firmly to a supernatural religion, but recognised human intellect and its rightful place. Consequently the tone of the later Stuart days is more moderate than that of the earlier.

Church Jeremy Taylor wrote the Prophesying; Bramhall, the friend and favourite of Strafford, declared in vain the nullity of Presbyterianism; Sanderson, the author of the Preface to the Prayer Book of 1662, professed himself a disciple of the moderate Hooker.

Another attempt to conciliate the Puritans [SAVOY CONFERENCE] failed, but not owing to the rigidity of the Church. The Act of Uniformity of 1662 was the result of the Parliament, which in its Royalist zeal was not without its evil in the recent Calvinistic reaction. But it must be remembered that many holders of the Act had been intruded into the parishes of the true possessors. But the expulsion of the Puritan ministers on St. Bartholomew's Day, 1662, for refusing to assent to everything in the Book of Common Prayer, deprived the Church of many of its ablest and earnest preachers. The CORPORALED, FIVE-MILE, and TEST ACTS [each under its head], were all passed at Nonconformity. In 1678, in the case of Oates's plot, Roman Catholics were excluded from Parliament. Charles II. made several endeavours after Toleration, but Parliament defeated them, in fear that the Puritans were intended to favour Romanism. True, indeed, that towards the end of his reign a more generous spirit towards the dissenting diversities was beginning to show itself. This feeling was plainly seen when the nonconformists made common cause with the Church against James II.'s ill-starred attempt to force Popery on the nation.

expulsion of James, however, was led without some loss to the Church religion. The former separation of jurors was now followed by the Whigs on the episcopal thrones, thus placed in a position of hostility to the parochial clergy, who, whilst—like Samuel Ken—they had no sympathy with the Puritans, could not forego their conscientious adherence to the principles of the ancient Church. This difference boded ill for the future of comprehension which was once brought forward. The Prayer Book was revised under a commission appointed by the Crown, the Puritans being led by Baxter; alterations made were perfectly moderate, some of the additions were much to be regretted. But the Lower House of Convocation rejected this proposed book, and it was abandoned, and the proposal for revision has never since been authoritatively renewed. Nor was this the whole trouble which came upon the Church in the Nonjuring division. The seceders, men of deep piety, and the Church, even in the eighteenth century, could ill afford to lose them. The eighteenth century was not unnaturally marked by an increase of worldliness, of dissipation and sloth. There was less learning, less spiritual earnestness; and in consequence the people were left almost in ignorance. The preaching of Wesley and others did much to remedy this evil. It led to new life; and whilst it led to a large separation, it more than made up for that by reviving religious life in the Church. The successive rise of the High Church Party, of the Oxford School, and the Evangelical Party will be told under respective titles.

As an outline of the history of the Church of England. It now only remains to survey it as it at present exists. It is the clergy and laity of the two provinces of Canterbury and York; those containing thirty-four dioceses, and continuous with the fifty-two counties of England and Wales, supplemented by the Channel Islands. It is essentially an ancient body, the theory of its constitution and its corporate continuance and its life are both dependent upon the office of bishop. The corporate continuance of the Church is thus identified with an unbroken line of bishops. Great care has always been taken to keep up this succession, and also to preserve the records upon which the proof rests. Every bishop is consecrated by three who are already bishops, the lines of succession by which he is connected with the bishops of former ages are innumerable. So well, too, have the records of his spiritual genealogy been preserved that every bishop is able to trace his own immediate episcopal line back to the Reformation without a break: from the Reformation back to the Norman Conquest with similar certainty: from the Conquest to the time of St. Augustine's mission [A.D. 600] with almost equal accuracy: and from the sixth century to the Apostolic age with an amount of certainty such as can be shown in few recent periods. Thus Anglican bishops, like the bishops of other Catholic Churches, claim to be "successors of the Apostles," in an historical as well as in a spiritual sense.

The spiritual life of the Church is also considered to be dependent upon the episcopate, because it is maintained by ministerial acts, and no ministry is recognised but one in which the ministers are ordained by bishops. Every bishop is also regarded as the centre of spiritual authority within the range of his diocese, he being the chief pastor, and the parochial clergy his deputy pastors. The principle of the Episcopal ministry is thus assumed to be [1] that a bishop alone can give that authority and power to a person which will make him a minister of the Church, and [2] that a minister so ordained can only exercise his office lawfully within a certain sphere or "cure of souls" committed to him by the chief pastor of the diocese. This principle is carefully provided for and guarded by the Ordination Services of the Prayer Book, and by the issue of formal documents, such as "Letters of Orders," and of "Institution," and by acts and ceremonies connected with admission to a benefice.

Statistics.—The clergy of the Church of England number about 23,000, consisting of 2 archbishops, 32 bishops, 30 deans, 80 archdeacons, 130 canons of cathedral and collegiate churches, 14,000 parochial clergy with benefices, rectors and vicars, 6,000 parochial clergy without benefices, stipendiary curates, and about 3,000 other clergy, many of whom engage voluntarily in parochial work. The exact proportion of the laity to the gross population cannot be ascertained, but cannot differ very greatly either way from one-half of the whole.

Income and Expenditure.—The pecuniary resources of the Church of England are partly derived from ancient and modern endowments, and partly from a constantly kept up voluntary system: they are expended chiefly on the maintenance of the clergy, the education of children, the charitable relief of the poor, the building and maintenance of churches, and foreign missions. Both income and expenditure must necessarily vary from year to year, and it is a work of considerable difficulty to arrive at a trustworthy estimate. A few years ago however, the present writer made wide inquiries on the subject, and after much calculation, correspondence, and tabulation, was able to draw up the following "Balance Sheet of the Church of England," which has been often reprinted in books and newspapers, but may be usefully appended here. During ten years, however, a considerable increase will have been made in the number of clergy and in the general expenditure of the Church.

The Anglican Communion.—The preceding notice refers to the Church of England alone: that is, to the Anglican communion comprised within the counties of England and Wales. But the Anglican communion—with a similar form of episcopal government, professing the same doctrines, and using the same system of devotion—extends to every part of the world, comprising the sister Churches of Ireland, Scotland, America, and of numerous British dependencies. The bishops of this extensive communion number nearly two hundred: namely, thirty-four in England and Wales, twelve in Ireland, seven in the colonies and missionary districts, and fifty-six of the American Episcopal Church and its missionary districts. All these bishops, except of Ireland, derive their ministerial authority from the Archbishops and Bishops of England and Wales, and especially from the bishops of Canterbury.

The solar year contains 365 days than the lunar, from whence that the moon being new on the 1st of December, or when the sun is in his annual course. At the end of 1 year, adding these 11 days, the moon is 22 days before the sun, and at the end of the third year 33; then, by taking 1 day for an intercalary month, there remains 1 day for the Epact. In the following year, 11 days will again be added, making 14 days, and so on to the end of the 19th year, rejecting 30, by counting it as an intercalary month. But in the Bissextile, or leap year, the Epact contains 12 days, because the leap year is a day longer than ordinary, goes from 3 to 15 for the Epact, and so to 26, and so on. The Epact is upon the age of the moon on the 1st of a given year, and so on any other year, and therefore on the calculation of the Paschal full moon.

COUNCIL OF. [COUNCILS; HERESY.]

ROBBER COUNCIL OF.—So called for its violent and overbearing proceedings. It was assembled by the Emperor Theodosius in 449, under the presidency of the Patriarch of Alexandria. He was assisted by two Imperial Commissioners, a great body of monks, headed by Eusebius, and a troop of soldiers, who were introduced into the assembly for the purpose of intimidating any refractory members. The Council was overawed by the violence without. Dioscorus procured the death of Eutyches [EUTYCHIAN], and the Patriarch of Constantinople, who was a heretic, died of the wounds he received at the Council. Eusebius of Nicomedia was deposed and imprisoned, but found means of escaping to Rome. The Emperor confirmed the decisions of the Council, but he died soon after, and a Council was summoned at Chalcedon in 451 which reversed them.

Ephrem, St., born at Nisibis, in Mesopotamia, and deacon of the Church of Edessa, in Syria, was born in the fourth century, at the commencement of the reign of Constantine the Great. St. Ephrem states in his works that he was born of Christian parents, who suffered as confessors for the faith of Christ. "Yea," he adds, "I am the kindred of martyrs." He studied in early life as a catechumen under St. James, Bishop of Nisibis, whom he may have accompanied to the Council of Nicea in 325. Upon the death of this bishop, Ephrem seems to have migrated to Edessa, where at first he devoted himself to teaching the natives, but afterwards he embraced the monastic life, and began to write his numerous works. He travelled to Caesarea, in Cappadocia, and was well received by St. Basil, who had a particular regard for him, and by whom he was made a deacon. From Caesarea Ephrem returned to Edessa to refute numerous heresies that had sprung up there. He succeeded in destroying the influence of the heretical songs which were becoming popular, by composing Christian hymns, and training choirs to sing them. Sozomen relates that when Basil of Caesarea would have made Ephrem a bishop, the saint pretended madness to avoid the honour of consecration. He retired again to his monastic life, only issuing forth from time to time to combat the heretics. His last recorded act was to prevail upon the rich in Edessa to distribute their stores of food to the poor during the severe famine that raged in that city. He probably died in 373. He wrote several tracts in Syriac, which, according to St. Jerome, were so well received that they were read publicly in churches after the Holy Scriptures. They were translated into Greek, and are cited by St. Basil and St. Gregory of Nyssa. Photius had seen forty-nine homilies by this Father, and made extracts from them. St. Ephrem wrote many hymns in Syriac, which were sung in the churches. Also he is said to be the author of a commentary on all the Bible, of controversial tracts against a great many heretics, and of a book on the subject of the Holy Ghost. His commentaries and controversial tracts are lost, but Gerard Vossius has published a considerable number of his moral discourses and hymns. Some have questioned their authenticity, but on slender grounds. Ambrosius Camaldulus published some of St. Ephrem's works in 1490, but Vossius's edition, printed at Rome, in three volumes, in a single volume at Cologne in 1603, and at Antwerp in 1619, is much more complete. The Syrians profess to have a great many manuscripts in Syriac and Arabic written by St. Ephrem, whom they call the Syrian Prophet. Bellarmine describes Ephrem's works as "pious rather than learned." As a commentator his object is rather to edify than to instruct; as a poet he possesses considerable talent, but his style is marred by too great diffuseness. His personal character, his great humility, his deep piety, his gentleness and self-sacrifice, stamp him as a saint of God.

Epictetus, a native of Hierapolis, was in his youth a slave to Epaphroditus, captain of Nero's Guard. He was a Stoic philosopher, and during his captivity gave many instances of his capability of carrying out the motto of his sect, "Bear and forbear." A story is told of him that one day his master, in a rage, gave him a blow on his shin, and Epictetus begged him not to break his leg. Whereupon Epaphroditus dealt a still heavier blow, and succeeded in breaking his slave's leg, and the only remark he vouchsafed was, "Look ye, sir: did I not tell you you would never leave until you had broken my leg?" After his death his discourses were published, which contain many passages more like the ideas of a Christian than those of a heathen, and St. Augustine quotes him several times, and frequently adds words of commendation. In the reign of Domitian an edict was issued for the banishment of all philosophers, and Epictetus was naturally included in the list; but on the death of the Emperor he was enabled to return.

Epicurus [b. 342 B.C., d. 270].—An Athenian, the founder of one of the two main systems of heathen philosophy and morality with which early Christianity was brought into contact [Acts xvii. 18]. In morals, as based upon philosophy, Epicurus taught and accepted happiness as the greatest object in life, and placed this happiness in the sensations of the individual; hence he exhorted to moderation, on the ground that excess diminished enjoyment by injuring health. The weakness of such a system obviously rests in the fact that it does not condemn moderate indulgence in what is called vice; and there can be no doubt that in many of the followers of Epicurus his system led to abandonment of all moral restraint. He himself, however, appears to have been moral and decorous in life. Lucretius speaks of him in terms that imply real moral elevation, and it is possible that his real meaning was in the sense of that utilitarian system of morality which was in the last generation elaborated by Bentham and his school, and which is subject to similar weakness. Epicurus at least made an effort after some sort of moral system, which he failed to find in the decaying religion around him, and so far was probably better than his fellows. His philosophy of the universe attributed it to the concourse and combination of atoms, one of the products being even the soul of man. Such teaching necessarily negated all ideas of future immortality in the individual, and so came into direct conflict with Christian doctrine. But here, too, it almost appears from Lucretius that the idea of the philosopher was to deliver man from the fear of constant interference on the part of the gods—who, according to the belief of the heathen, were not moral, but acted capriciously and tyrannically from mere personal feelings. From this point of view his physical philosophy also may have been a real moral advance upon popular belief. It is remarkable how many of its ideas are adopted by modern scientific materialism.] It is to be feared that much of the morality of our own day rises at all, above that of this ancient heathenism.

Epigonation.—A square piece of cloth which hangs from the girdle on the left side. It is worn by both bishops and priests in the Greek Church, and is intended to represent the napkin with which Christ washed Himself when washing the disciples' feet.

Epiphanius, Bishop of Pavia [b. c. 310]. He was prepared for holy orders, and was ordained by St. Crispinus, Bishop of Pavia, at the age of twenty. St. Crispinus nominated him his successor, and on his death St. Epiphanius was elected by the clergy and people. He was instrumental in effecting a reconciliation between the Emperor Anthemius and his son-in-law, Ricimer, in 469, and, in 475, was despatched to Euric, King of the Goths, at Toulouse, to conclude a treaty between him and the Emperor. On the expulsion of the Emperor Eucherius by Odoacer, King of the Goths, in 476, when Pavia was sacked by Odoacer, St. Epiphanius saved his sister, St. Juliana, and many others, from being taken captive, and so far prevailed with Odoacer as to obtain for the town an exemption from taxes for five years. When Odoacer was defeated by Theodoric, the Ostrogoth, in 489, Epiphanius was again employed to use his influence on behalf of the prisoners, and was so successful that Theodoric sent him to Gundobald, King of the Burgundians, to redeem the prisoners who had been carried away into Italy. He succeeded in effecting the redemption of six thousand captives, some of whom he set free without a ransom. In 491 he went to Theodoric's court at Ravenna to request a discharge of the taxes levied on Liguria, and two-thirds of what he asked was granted. He died in 495, a few days after his return to Pavia from this expedition.

Epiphanius, Bishop of Salamis, Island of Cyprus, was born probably between 310 and 320, at Besanduke, in Palestine. Much of his youth was spent in Egypt among the monks, who instilled in him a strong religious devotion and a desire for an ascetic life. He was at one time in great danger through the temptations ic women who endeavoured to join their sect. On his rdians, the monks, of the was made, which resulted in of about eighty Gnostica. of destroying the Origenism which still remained there. He was welcomed by some of the citizens who had become discontented with St. Chrysostom's administration, and his first act on arriving in the city was to ordain a deacon in the monastic church. He requested that the Patriarch would subscribe to a document condemning Origen and his monks, and on his refusal Epiphanius held a council, and was urged by his supporters to preach against St. Chrysostom openly. Beginning to feel that he had gone too far, Epiphanius made up his mind to return to Salamis, but died on his way in the spring of 403. He is celebrated in the calendar on May 12th. His works, of which the most important are the Ancoratus and the Panarion, are entirely composed of expositions of doctrine and attacks upon heresies, particularly upon Origenism.

Epiphany, or Manifestation of Christ to the Gentiles.—The word Epiphany being Greek, points out to us that this festival, observed on Jan. 6th, is of Eastern origin. In the early days of the Greek Church this festival was considered the most important after Easter, and the celebration of our Saviour's birth was always associated with it. Probably their name Epiphaneia originally had reference to the "shining forth" of the Divine Light when Christ was born. They also sometimes called it Theophaneia, "shining forth of God." The first time we hear of it is in the year 200, when it is mentioned in the writings of Clement of Alexandria, and in the fourth century we find that in Gaul it was kept as a separate festival from Christmas. The incident of the visit of the Wise Men was probably taken as typical of the extension of the Gospel to the Gentile world. There is no doubt that in the early days of the keeping of this festival the story of the Wise Men did not receive the prominence, in the different instances in which Christ manifested Himself to the world, that it has now. This prominence arose from the fact that the story of their visit was read in the Gospel for the day. The story that there were three of them, that they were kings, and that their names were Melchior, Gaspar, and Balthazar, are all purely romantic additions of the twelfth century. The festival of the Epiphany commemorates, not only the visit of the Magi, but the Manifestation of Christ at His Baptism [morning second lesson], and in His first miracle [evening second lesson]. Although not now regarded as part of the Christmas festival, its name of 'Twelfth Day' shows the close connexion in which it stood to that day in the early days of the Church.

Episcopacy.—This institution of the Church has been discussed under the head BISHOP, and to it, therefore, we would refer the reader. A few words may be added here on the history of the distinctive theory, that the threefold ministry is of Divine institution. That "bishop" and "presbyter" are convertible terms in the New Testament seems clear, and upon this fact the Congregationalists rest their contention that Episcopacy was a later development of the Church. We shall consider this theory more at length under the head PRESBYTERIAN, but it is clear that Episcopacy was the practice of the Church in the age succeeding that of the Apostles, and one opinion is that it was instituted by the Apostles after the fall of Jerusalem. But so important a change would hardly have been wrought in silence; we should have had some hint of it in the later writings of the New Testament. That the Church of Jerusalem was under the rule of St. James seems clear, and this was the form of government likely to have been adopted in the other Eastern Churches. In the West and in Asia Minor, St. Paul evidently kept his Churches under his own hand, and when this was no longer possible to him he sent representatives, like Timothy and Titus, to ordain elders; the inference being that the ordinary elders could not do so. He sent them to Ephesus and Crete for this purpose, and thus it is argued, that though these Churches had been in existence several years, their resident ministers had no powers to ordain. Whether the angels of the Seven Churches in Rev. i.-iii. were bishops, it is impossible to say with absolute confidence, though the probability is great. Bishop Lightfoot, of Durham, the most learned prelate on the bench, and second to none in candour and breadth of view, in his Commentary on the Epistle to the Philippians expressed the opinion that Episcopacy, though valuable as a form of Church government, was post-Apostolic. In his recently published edition, however, of the Apostolic Fathers, he has withdrawn this opinion, and tells us that a close examination of the Epistles of Ignatius has convinced him that Episcopacy was an earlier institution of the Church, and therefore Apostolic, though he is still of opinion that "sacerdotalism" finds no countenance.

Episcopal Register.—The volume containing the official acts of the Bishop of a See. Such a volume is always kept by each bishop. It generally has at the beginning the record of his consecration, or appointment, then in former times followed Bulls and other privileges which he received from the Popes, then the records of the diocese. The fulness of these varies much in different dioceses. Those of Canterbury and York contain accounts of visitations, convocations, councils, as well as a vast number of letters. Some contain transcripts of older documents, which were in bad condition, and therefore in imminent danger of perishing. From the Bishop of Chester's invaluable work, Regis-

They defended him the pen, Episcopus being their leader. The Synod deprived them of their offices, and banished them from the office of the commonwealth. Upon this he went into the Spanish Low Countries, stayed there during the truce, he not only defended his own cause against the Church of Rome, but between the Spaniards and the French, he went to France, until he was allowed to return to Holland, where he took the care of a church of the city of Rotterdam. In 1634 he went to Amsterdam as preacher, and became the head of the Arminian party. Episcopus was the author of the Remonstrance, which are looked on as the Arminian theology.

and Gospels, as part of the service of the Church, are of continuity, as appears from the testimony of the Fathers. St. Chrysostom, in Acts. cap. ix., "The Deacon with a loud voice pronounces, Then the lessons are begun;" as appears from his liturgy, are the Gospels, which follow immediately after the deacon has put the people in attention. To this testimony we refer St. Augustine, in the preface of the Mass on the Epistle of St. John, in his sermon de Verb. Apost.:—"We read the apostolical lesson, then we sing the Gospel, after that the Gospel was read." Scripture appointed for the service to be taken from the New Testament, chiefly from the Epistles of St. Paul, and Joel are also read as of special dignity has always been the reading of the Gospel in the service: the people stand to show "throughout all the Churches." St. Jerome says, "when the Gospel is to be read, tapers are lighted, to show the road daylight, not to scatter light as a sign of joy, . . . that, as of bodily light, that light is shed forth of which we read in the Holy word, O Lord, is a lantern and a light unto my paths'" [Psalm.].

Epistle Side.—The side of the altar at which the Epistle is read—supposing the altar to be at the east, it is the south side.

Epistolarium.—A book containing the Epistles for Sundays and Holy Days.

Epistoler or Epistler.—The priest appointed to read the Epistle. The 24th Canon of the Church of England contains these words: "In all cathedrals and collegiate churches, the Holy Communion shall be administered on principal feast-days, sometimes by the bishop (if he be present), and sometimes by the dean, and sometimes by a canon or prebendary; the principal minister using a decent cope, and being assisted with the gospeller and epistler, agreeably according to the advertisements published in the seventh year of Queen Elizabeth." Jebb says: "Epistolers are still statutable officers in several cathedrals of the new foundation, though in most it has fallen into desuetude. It is retained at Durham. The epistoler and gospeller are sometimes called deacon and sub-deacon in the cathedral statutes. The epistoler, according to our present rubric, strictly interpreted, must be a priest. In the Roman Church he is a sub-deacon. But by Archbishop Grindal's Injunctions in 1571, it was required that parish clerks should be able to read the first Lesson and Epistle."

Epitaphs.—A name originally given to verses sung in honour of the dead at their funerals, though it soon came to be used, as at present, for inscriptions on their monuments. The Greeks inscribed only the name of the dead person, with the words, "Good man, happiness to you!" The Athenians wrote the person's name, with the name of his father and of his tribe. The Romans prefixed "D. M.," or "Diis Manibus," to their epitaphs, and in addition often used the opportunity to threaten anyone who should disturb the dead man's ashes. It was also customary to adorn the monuments with representations of the famous deeds of the dead. The earliest Christian epitaphs existing are those in the Roman catacombs, dating from the times of the early persecutions, and they one and all breathe the language of hope and faith, in contrast to those of pagan origin. [CATACOMBS.] In England epitaphs are subject to the control of the clergyman of the parish in case of any unorthodox doctrine being expressed in them. But his discretion is limited by the legal courts.

Era or Æra.—A word which Spanish authors introduced into chronology, to express the beginning of some extraordinary change, as of reigns, etc. It comes from Æra, a tribute imposed on Spaniards by the Emperor Augustus, 39 B.C., under the consulship of L. Marcus Censorius and C. Calvisius Sabinus, about the year 715 of Rome. It was used in Spain till about 1383, and in Portugal till 1415, when the years of Jesus Christ were substituted in its place. Other famous eras in chronology are the Roman era, A.U.C., dating from the building of the city, corresponding to 753 B.C.; that of Nabonassar, corresponding to 747 B.C., used by the ancient Persians and astronomers; that of the Greek Seleucidæ, 312 B.C., when Seleucus Nicanor settled in Syria, twelve years after the death of Alexander the Great; the Christian, dating approximately from the birth of Christ; the Diocletian, and the Jewish. The date of an era is fixed upon by the general consent of a nation or community. The Greeks were the first to adopt the system of eras: their Olympiads were periods of four years, the first Olympiad dating 776 B.C. The Jews did not use an era until the time of the Maccabees; and then they adopted that of the Seleucidæ, dating from 312 B.C. But the Jews now use an era of their own, dating from the Creation, which they place in 3761 B.C.

The Christian era begins upon the 1st of January, after the birth of our blessed Saviour, which is commonly fixed to Dec. 25th, and 754 years after the building of Rome, in the consulship of Lentulus and Calpurnius Piso. This is probably not the exact year of our Lord's birth. But for practical purposes this date has been generally accepted throughout Christendom. The Venerable Bede uses it in his history. This era has sometimes been called the Dionysian, from the fact that Dionysius Exiguus was the first advocate and proposer of it. Research has made it probable that our Lord's birth really took place four years earlier than the received era, therefore in our Reference Bibles the birth of Christ is marked "B.C. 4."

The Diocletian era is called the key of Christian chronology; this period begins at the first year of Diocletian's reign, which falls in with Aug. 29th, A.D. 284. This computation is made good by the authorities of Theophilus and St. Cyril, Archbishops of Alexandria, of St. Ambrose, of Dionysius Exiguus, and others. This era is still used by the Copts in Egypt, and was in general use throughout the West of Europe, until the introduction of the Christian era.

The Era of Constantinople, called also the Byzantine era; it reckons from the Creation, which it places in 5508 B.C. It was formerly in use in the Eastern Empire, and is still used by the Albanians.

The Hegira, the Mussulman era, dating from Mohammed's flight from Mecca in 622.

In the sixteenth century it was found that the calendar founded by Dionysius Exiguus upon that of Augustus was defective, owing to the solar year consisting of 365 days, five hours, forty-nine minutes, instead of 365 days, six hours, as had been reckoned. Consequently, the calendar had fallen ten days wrong, and the vernal equinox fell on the 11th instead of the 21st of March. Consequently, Pope Gregory XIII 1582 should consist of 355 days a year ending a century should be a sextile, with the exception of the fourth century. Thus 1700 is not a leap-year, nor will 1900 or 2,000 will. All the West countries gradually adopted it before the end of the sixteenth century except Great Britain, which did not do so until 1751. The dislike which the rural population to the change entirely passed away but the writer has heard old people averring on the authority of their fathers that Old Christmas Day was the evidence being that their bees were on Old Christmas Eve. In classical literature, he gained that one of the masters prophesied "he would one day prove the glory of all Germany." While at the misfortune to lose his father, the latter died of the plague at Delft on a visit to her son, and he did not long survive her. The plague was from school when he was a boy upon which his guardians, who treated him very badly, resolved to get what little fortune he had in his hands, to force him to enter a convent. Accordingly he passed several years from one convent to another, while, to hate much that system, and gaining that insight into the corruption of the Order, afterwards showed in the book on the subject. Although greatly opposed to the ignorance, superstition, and corruption which existed in the Romish Church, he never really joined the Reformation, for he had no grand enthusiasm as Luther had. Consequently he cut himself adrift from the Reformers by degrees. In a letter to Leo in 1520 he disclaimed fellowship with Luther, and in 1524 he wrote against him, and Luther sorrowfully declared that he was no better than a sceptic and Epicurean. One of his publications was dedicated to Pope Adrian VI., and Paul III. is said to have designed for him a cardinal's hat, with the intention of keeping him quiet. But his arduous study and roaming life had undermined his constitution, and he declined the honour. In the last ten years of his life he published his editions of the Fathers. He died at Basel in 1536, and was buried in the cathedral.

Erastians.—The followers of the opinions of Thomas Erastus, a celebrated physician and theologian. He was born at Baden Dourlach, in Switzerland, in 1524; died 1583. His family name was Lieber, or Beloved, which he Latinised into Erastus. He studied at Basel, then went to Italy, and took his M.D. at Bologna; he became physician and councillor to the Elector Palatine, Frederic III., who made him Professor of Physic in the University of Heidelberg. He wrote some celebrated medical works, but his fame as an author rests chiefly on his ecclesiastical controversies. In his book de Cœnâ Domini he upheld the figurative meaning of the words "This is My Body," etc., and defended it at the conference of Maulbronn [1564] against Dr. Johann Marbach, a Lutheran minister of Strasburg. His chief work, however, was his Explicatio Questionis Gravissimæ de Excommunicatione, written in the form of Theses directed against Caspar Olevianus, the head of a strong Calvinist party, who wanted to confer on ecclesiastical tribunals the power of excommunicating and punishing heretics. Erastus denied the power of any but civil magistrates to inflict these penalties. Beza wrote a treatise in opposition to Erastus, which was considered as conclusive by his party. Church discipline was established, and Erastus was its first victim, being excommunicated on a charge of Unitarianism. Many eminent men have held the same views of Church Government; among them, Cranmer, Selden, Lightfoot, Hobbes, etc. The term Erastian has long been a favourite term of reproach in Scotland, and Erastianism is now held to mean the doctrine of State supremacy in ecclesiastical matters, or denying the power of the Church to alter any of her own laws without the consent of the State.

Erastus's work on Ecclesiastical Excommunication was not published till six years after his death. It was translated into English in 1669, and again in 1845 by Dr. Robert Lee, of Edinburgh.

Erkenwald, Sr., is allowed by all to be the son of a king of the East Angles, but it is not certain whether Offa or Annas was his father. His early history is obscure; he is said to have been born at Stallington in Lindsey, and his early education was committed to Mellitus, who was Bishop of London from 604 to 619. After leaving him, he led a holy and retired life at home. His sister was St. Ethelburga, who, following his example, devoted herself to the service of God. Erkenwald was above fifty years old when he built, in conjunction with Frithewald, a monastery at Chertsey, and retired thither with a number of monks. The foundation of this house is said to be about 666, in the reign of Egbert, and three years later, he built a convent for his sister at Barking in Essex. On the death of Wina, Bishop of London, Erkenwald was chosen to succeed him, and he was consecrated by Theodore, Archbishop of Canterbury, about 675, under whose guidance he did very much for his diocese. The history of this period is so obscure, that very little detail is left of his life, but the great honour and reverence shown to his memory prove that he was no ordinary benefactor to his city. The Venerable Bede tells us in general terms that he lived a holy and laborious life, and that many miracles were done in favour of such as honoured his memory; it is said that the sick were cured by being placed in the carriage he used in his illness. The exact year of his death is not known, but it seems clear that he was alive in 692 from a charta of King Ina dated in that year, in which that prince says he had advised with Erkenwald, one of his bishops, about making such laws as were conducive to the peace of his kingdom and the salvation of his own soul. He died at Barking, and there was a quarrel between that monastery and the one at Chertsey as to which should have the honour of receiving his remains; but he was buried in his own cathedral of St. Paul. In 1148 his relics were removed to a new shrine, at which offerings were made and miracles recorded till the time of the Reformation. Until that time the Church kept two days in his honour, April 30th, as the probable day of his death, and Nov. 14th, the day of his translation.

Erskine, EBENEZER, an eminent Scottish divine, was born at Dryburgh, June 22nd, 1680. His father, the Rev. Henry Erskine, formerly a Presbyterian minister in the north of England, had been expelled in 1662, and had retired to Dryburgh, where he had suffered much religious persecution. After the Revolution of 1688, he became minister of Chirnside, and here Ebenezer was educated until he was fourteen, when he entered the University of Edinburgh, taking his degree of M.A. in 1697. In 1702 he was licensed to preach at Kirkcaldy, and in the following year was ordained minister. For some time his nervousness was a serious drawback to his work, but about two years this wore off, and he became the most eloquent and most popular preacher in the neighbourhood, not only his own parishioners, but neighbouring parishes, came in to hear him. We are told that at Comrie people travelled sixty miles to attend his Portmoak services, and at one time there were 2,067 communicants. In 1711 he became concerned in the controversy that arose with regard to a book of broad views by Edward Fisher, Marrow of Modern Divinity, the admirers of which were known as "Marrow Men." The book was condemned by the General Assembly as containing doctrinal errors, whereupon Erskine presented a representation on the subject signed by twelve ministers, and the doctrinal errors were defended. The brethren received a rebuke from the Assembly, and the matter was dropped, but immediately afterwards a controversy arose, respecting parishioners to choose their own ministers. In 1731, after long discussion the Assembly decided that when a parish was vacant parishes devolved upon one or more of their number to choose with the heritors and elders as to the choice of their minister. The decision caused dissatisfaction, and in 1732 a petition was presented, signed by forty-two ministers, but was not allowed. Erskine was one of the petitioners, and his anger against the Assembly, which he expressed in a somewhat violent sermon against the Assembly the following Sunday. This was followed by another sermon, some months later, in which he again alluded to the Synod of Perth and Stirling, and made some abusive reference to the Assembly who had passed the Act. The Synod held a Council on the subject, and condemned the expressions which he used, but could not induce Erskine to accept of a formal rebuke was administered, the effect of which was that he resigned his office against the Act of Assembly, but this by three friends. The friends petitioned to appear before the Assembly, but he refused to obey, and on being refused to perform their ministerial functions, they took notice of the sentence. He then declared to be no longer a member of the Church, but Erskine announced that he still held office, and continued in communion with other members of the Covenanted Church of Scotland. He celebrated SECESSION, the date being November, 1742. Immediately after the four friends met near Kinnaird, and they formed themselves into the Associate Ministers, Erskine being made first Moderator.

In a very short time this spirit of rturned in upon itself; dissensions sprang mong them, and their quarrels grew so s that, in 1750, some of them attacked opinions of Erskine and some of his r, and the matter was brought before Associate Synod, who pronounced a nce of excommunication on Erskine. sion.] It was a great grief to him, and ollowed shortly after by the death of his and brother. His brother, Ralph Erskine [d. 1752], joined him in the secession, was a popular her, and author of Gospel Sonnets, and other religious works.

Erskine, THOMAS, of Linlathen, a lay- who exercised a remarkable influence on Scottish Church, and on English-spoken ogy generally, was born in 1788, the son avid Erskine, Writer to the Signet in burgh, and was a descendant of the Earl ar, the Regent in the days of James VI. as educated at Edinburgh and Durham, studied for the Bar. During that time as the intimate friend of Cockburn, and Jeffrey. In 1816 his elder brother nd left him a family estate, whereupon ired from the Bar and gave himself to ydy of those great questions which to man's highest welfare. His essays ery beautifully written, and full of spiritual insight, but they gave great offence to the popular prejudices of his day, and on account of the opinions expressed in them, he was expelled from the Scottish Kirk. He belonged in the main to the same school of theology as the Rev. F. D. Maurice, caring little for historical criticism or the external evidences of Christianity, and attaching deep importance to spiritual intuition. The Incarnation of Christ, he said, was the manifestation to man of an eternal sonship in the Divine nature, and without that sonship, earthly relationships would lose their sanction. His principal works are:—Remarks on the Internal Evidence for the Truth of Revealed Religion [1820], an Essay on Faith [1822], The Unconditional Freeness of the Gospel [1828], The Brazen Serpent [1831], and The Doctrine of Election [1837], etc. He did not write any books during the last thirty-three years of his life, but enjoyed a close and affectionate correspondence with Maurice, Stanley, Carlyle, Bishop Ewing, etc. He died at Edinburgh in 1870. His letters, edited by Hanna, with reminiscences by Dean Stanley, have been published in 2 vols.

Eschatology.—The study of the doctrine of the Future State. The opinions which have been held in the Christian Church may be classified thus:—There are some who hold that the state of the soul is irrevocably fixed at death. This may be said to be, on the whole, the avowed doctrine of most of the Protestant bodies, though there are, as might have been expected, many shades of opinion on a question so confessedly mysterious. [CONDITIONAL IMMORTALITY, DESTRUCTIONISM.] The Church of Rome holds that there are three states—Heaven, Hell, and Purgatory; that the latter state is that into which those who have died in faith pass, before reaching the blessedness of heaven. [PURGATORY.] There have been, again, others, from the beginning of Christianity, who have held that there is universal hope, and that even the wicked may be converted in the unseen world, and so be saved. [UNIVERSALISM.] As regards children, idiots, and the ignorant, it will only be in accordance with our intuitive convictions, with the teaching of Scripture, and with the analogy of God's moral government in this life, to believe that the change at death admits of discipline, change, and purification, and the proclamation of the tidings of reconciliation. In Barclay's Apology, the Quaker, expressing his belief in the Atonement, also holds a state of grace for every man who does not resist it. The Church of England, in 1662, when the Prayer Book was last revised, made a bold advance. Then, for the first time, appeared the rubric that baptised children, dying before they commit actual sin, are undoubtedly saved. Jeremy Taylor went much further when he taunted the Church of Rome with teaching that unbaptised children should not see the face of God. The Church of England, he says, "teaches no such fierce and uncharitable doctrine." Milton, Isaac Barrow, and Bishop Ken are on the same side. In Ken's Vision of Hades, he sees "infants numberless" in the "region of the happy dead," not because they have been baptised, but as being "pure from wilful sin," and "numerous souls" of Gentiles, "trophies of universal grace, who ne'er beheld the evangelic light." Essays and Reviews.—The title of a book published in 1860, which created an immense excitement at the time, but is now almost forgotten. It consisted of seven articles, the authors of which, as the preface stated, "wrote in entire independence of each other, and without concert or comparison." The fact was that the publisher, the late J. W. Parker, had been in the habit, year by year, of publishing "Oxford" and "Cambridge" essays. They had that year fallen through, and he applied to seven writers of his own thought to supply him with material for a substitute volume. This material was as follows:—The Education of the World, by Frederick Temple, D.D., head-master of Rugby; Bunsen's Biblical Researches, by Rowland Williams, D.D.; On the Study of the Evidences of Christianity, by Baden-Powell; The National Church, by H. B. Wilson; On the Mosaic Cosmogony, by C. W. Goodwin; Tendencies of Religious Thought in England [1688–1750], by Mark Pattison; On the Interpretation of Scripture, by B. Jowett. Two of these writers—the second and last—were already known as writers of what was called the "Advanced Broad School," and some alarm was expressed at the very outset by the religious world; an alarm which was considerably increased by a review which appeared in the Guardian by a well-known authority in ecclesiastical matters. He began by drawing a line of demarcation between two of the essays and the other five. "The first essay contains little or nothing which need give pain or occasion surprise. . . . Mr. Pattison's essay . . . is almost entirely of an historical character." And he spoke of its "solid and durable truth." The rest were severely handled. Probably little more would have been thought of the book, but, unfortunately, two other notices came out which changed the situation. The Westminster Review taunted the writers with holding ultra-Rationalistic views and yet remaining in the Church; and the Quarterly, by the forcible but rash pen of Dr. Wilberforce, took the same line from an opposite standpoint. Then the storm began. The newspapers were crowded with letters of dismay; the Lower House of Convocation condemned the book as heretical; and half the clergy of England, not one in twenty of whom had probably read the book, sign against it on the ground of extra-

being the religion of any not recognised, and by some of the emperors was persecuted of its illegality. When Constantine the Great became emperor, he was a Christian, and made the State what it had adopted the State religion, and endowed churches, and giving free permission to all to leave their fortunes to the State as assigned in each city and a share of corn for the sustenance of the poor [Gibbon, c. xx.]. Afterwards Christianity became recognised by every State which was the ruin of the ancient Empire, and new kingdoms which were the dominions of Charles the

the Papal power thus made more or less subject to the State more or less, because the State dominion which were put under Gregory VII. and Innocent III. fully admitted, and conflicts between ecclesiastical and civil powers [CONCORDAT.] In England the mission of John, and the State later on, show the extent of the Roman Church over the State, the power it possessed; while, in France, and, the legislation of the State against Papal and clerical power were a marked protest on behalf of national independence and of State policy. [See Green's History of France, vol. i., pp. 331-2.] At the

Roman authority was re-established, and the king was declared secular matters, civil and ecclesiastical. [CHURCH OF.] But the identity of the Church of England before and after the Reformation is the question; the clergy or the older form of government and their benefices; the endowment of churches remained as bishops received their orders had been ordained under the [PARKER.] It would therefore say that the establishment of the Church of England dates from the reign of Henry VIII., unless the words be taken in the sense that the State was to be supreme in its affairs, and that it was the Church which claimed to be supreme. The Church of England claims to be the same Church that has been established in this country from the beginning; all her members are taught to believe in "the holy Catholic Church," or, as it is expressed in the Nicene Creed, "one Catholic and Apostolic Church." In a manifesto put forth in March, 1851, by the two archbishops and twenty bishops of England, "the undoubted identity of the Church before and after the Reformation" is declared, and again mention is made of "one uniform ritual" decreed, but "without in any degree severing her connection with the ancient Catholic Church." The defenders of the Church thus assert that at the Reformation she asserted her independence of Rome, rejected Roman innovations and errors, and returned as far as possible to the pattern of the primitive Church: "the face has been washed, but the features are the same" [Sir R. Phillimore].

The Revolution resulted in the overthrow of the time being of the Episcopal Church, and the establishment of Independency in its place. The restoration of the monarchy was followed by that of Episcopacy. But in Scotland, Presbyterianism was established as the national religion by an Act of the Legislature in the reign of William III. [SCOTLAND, CHURCH OF.] In 1801, on the Union of the English and Irish Legislatures, the Episcopal Church became the established religion of Ireland, and the two State Churches were united under the title of the Established Church of England and Ireland. But as the great bulk of the people were Roman Catholic, a feeling of hostility grew steadily, in company with disaffection arising from other causes, and in 1869 the Irish Church was disestablished [IRELAND, CHURCH OF], and there is in that country no religion in union with the State.

The arguments respecting the establishment of a State religion turn upon two main questions: the one is of principle, the other of expediency. Its defenders hold that the State is bound to maintain a definite religious system, which, in the words of the late Dr. Chalmers, "shall make Christianity so bear upon a population as that it shall reach every door, and be brought into contact with all the families." And the same writer goes on to maintain that as a matter of expediency the only way in which this can be done is by a recognised organisation. The opponents of this view hold that there is political and social injustice involved in giving exclusive privileges to one denomination over another. In the controversies which surround this question, three lines of thought are to be discerned. There are, first, those who would keep the status quo in the belief that the present system, with the needful reforms which are from time to time called for, is the best that can be devised for the religious instruction of the mass of the population.

There are, secondly, those at the opposite pole, who would disestablish the Church, and some of whom would secularise its revenues, though the majority of religious Nonconformists profess a desire to leave it in possession of all that has resulted from private endowments since some fixed date, to be chosen on the supposition that after it a discriminating intention to endow the Church as then known, and distinct from other religious bodies, may be inferred. And there is a third party, which, whilst it would keep the Establishment and its revenues as a State religion, would so widen its basis and remove the distinctive formularies, that it should include those Christian bodies who are now outside it. But probably this method would settle nothing. The first-named class object to such a scheme on the ground that the position of the Church is that of a religious teacher, and that the body proposed to be substituted would be without any definite religious teaching at all; while the second maintain that a grievance would still remain in the minds of those who would object to the Liturgy and ceremonial still left, as not representing the religious sentiments of some portions, at any rate, of the community.

With respect to the advantages to a Church itself of establishment, opinions differ widely. There are those who hold that the Church loses her liberty through her union with the State, and would be stronger if freed from State control. In answer to that the defenders of the Establishment maintain that by 24 Henry VIII., c. 12, the Crown is supreme over all manner of persons in the realm, both of the spirituality and temporality, and in all causes spiritual or temporal, and that therefore State control is unavoidable, and that not only the Establishment, but all religious bodies in the kingdom, are subject to it. Moreover, it is necessary for the well-being of the kingdom that religious bodies be subject to the Crown, for the tendencies and doctrines of religious bodies may possibly be prejudicial to the general welfare of the people. Again, Article 37 of the Church of England defines this State control to be "that only prerogative which we see to have been given always to all godly princes in Holy Scripture by God Himself." It is, however, true that the State control over established Churches does extend further in practice than is felt by unestablished bodies. Against this, on the other hand, is to be set the practical dependence of an unestablished ministry upon the goodwill of the congregations, which is well known to have often caused lamentable results. The truth appears to be that, as regards mere advantage to a religious body, there is something in each system. Neither can a conclusive argument be drawn from experience. Amongst nearly all the Continental nations establishment is the rule; the Lutheran Church in one of its forms being adopted in by the more northerly free races, the Roman Catholic by the southern, R adhering to the Eastern communion. In cases the control of the State is cons greater than in England, except as the Roman Catholic Church, relations the State and which, where establish usually defined by a formal ins called a CONCORDAT [q.v.]. In the States, on the other hand, there is Establishment, though it is remark the Puritans of New England mad the most definite attempts on recor to establish a Church, at least to a State itself synonymous with the and to govern the whole communi "godly" principles. In most, if no free British Colonies there is also no E ment. These facts prove, at least, tablishment is no necessary part Church system, and that whenever so between a Church and the State is d any really spiritual mission and aut the Church cannot be altered thereby only such countenance, or favour, or ment, as is bestowed by man, that take away.

Eternal Punishment.—The word aiōnios, from aiōn, "age," is in our Bibles sometimes "eternal," and "everlasting." By the majority of people these two words were until h to mean the same thing, and " would have been received as a perfect lent. But a fuller examination of will show that this does not of follow. Between "eternal" and " lies this broad distinction, that the

a region which is out of time, while "endless" lies within conditions. When we speak of God as eternal conscious that we are accepting a truth we can indeed believe, though it is about our comprehension. Now the word aiōnios may mean as future state, it is certainly used with meaning as regards visible things, which the end does not appear." It is used for the beginning of the times for the end of it. [See Greek Concordance, s.v. aiōn.] And there have been always some who have maintained that, seeing the word is used with a limit in reference to visible things, the possibility of things unseen cannot logically be deduced from texts which have been adduced, on the one hand by those who hold that eternal punishment is endless, and on the other by those who hold that the poet calls the larger hope [see Isa. i. 24; Mark ix. 41-48; 1 Cor. xv. 26; 1 Tim. ii. 4, iv. 10], might convince us that there is an absence of systematic teaching in Scripture. Isolated texts can be cited in one view, and it will probably be felt by those who study the Scripture most closely that they do not express the sense of it when we take the intended impression of the whole on the subject seems to be one of solemnity with more or less of uncertainty.

The popular doctrine on this subject is to be traced to mediæval theories and pictures which have come to be accepted as the doctrine, but which were in fact not in it. Much of the language of the writers was derived from heathen mythology, notably the terrible pictures in inferno. Still, such language unrepresented more or less a popular belief to the extent to which it passed into the theology is shown not only in the writings of many Roman Catholic writers, but of Calvinist theologians, our Puritans, and others. It cannot be denied that such representations were common at a time when there was an almost unconsciousness to human suffering, and that the picture was actually inflicted to an extent now almost defies belief. They are the result of "Divine justice" drawn from the arbitrary and cruel doings of human tyrants, and transferred to the Eternal; the belief in the Fatherhood of God was almost while obscured. It was probably a reaction from this which gave rise to the doctrine of purgatory, as actually the lurid light shed upon the doctrine by the fierceness of a dark age. In our day it is notable that, on the one side, language is used which is in marked contrast to that which has prevailed. In all ages of Christianity there have been some theologians, such as Gregory of Nyssa, and St. Chry-

ostom (in some of his writings), who have expressed what Tennyson calls "the larger hope," whilst they also felt that on such a subject it does not become man to dogmatise rashly. But besides these, there are others who, maintaining that the Scriptural language precludes belief in universal salvation, yet modify, if they do not reject, the doctrine of endless pain. Recent treatises have displayed a larger approximation than heretofore, even between universalists and those who accept the doctrine of endless punishment. Most Christian universalists admit, that while punishment may be received as deserved chastisement, and lead to repentance and salvation, this is not necessarily the result of it, but that on the contrary it may harden men into the resistance of a rebellious slave. Recognising this, the terrible evil of sin, and the too evident fact that there appear around us, even now, examples of apparent personal antagonism to good and to God, they will admit that there must be for such an appalling loss both in blessedness and spiritual growth, which, relatively to others, may never be recovered, and in that sense may be termed eternal, even in the event of final salvation. On the other hand, many who feel bound to believe in punishment as endless, find it rather in moral than in physical suffering; in the awakened consciousness of what he has become, and that he is what he has made himself, on the part of the sinner. Some such have further avowed hope, if not belief, that even then, humble acceptance of due desert may make vast difference in result, and that God may make even of such whatever they are yet capable of. The mutual approach of such views is evident, and it may be that in it rests the real truth. At least the idea of a permanent loss (and it may be noted that the word "damnation" means literally "loss") arising from present ill-conduct, is an idea which we can all recognise as probable. "I have given," says Cardinal Newman, "a full inward assent and belief to the doctrine of eternal punishment, as delivered by our Lord Himself, in as true a sense as I hold that of eternal happiness; though I have tried in various ways to make that truth less terrible to the reason" [Apologia, p. 62].

In 1853 this question came prominently forward in the English religious world, in consequence of the dismissal of Mr. Maurice from his professorship at King's College, London, on the alleged ground that, in his recently published Theological Essays, he had denied the eternity of punishment. He defended himself by disclaiming the charge of Universalism, and contending that "endless" is not a correct translation of aiōnios, and that he entirely adopted the doctrine of the creeds, while he felt "that 'God is love' is the deepest of all theological truths." [MAURICE.] Much information concerning the present state of the controversy on this question will be gained from the following works :—Eternal Hope, by Archdeacon Farrar; What is of Faith concerning Everlasting Punishment? by Dr. Pusey; What is the Truth concerning Everlasting Punishment? by F. N. Oxenham; The Spirits in Prison, by Dean Plumptre.

Ethelard, 14TH ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY, lived in the eighth century. He was brought up as a monk, and had the government of an abbey, and was promoted to the See of Canterbury about 791. He found the church at a very low ebb, and, in consequence of the revolt of the Kentish nobles, he was obliged, in 796, to leave this post, and it is probable that he took refuge in the court of Kenulf, King of Mercia. Alcuin seems to have written him many letters of advice, and to have urged Offa to reinstate the Archbishop; but Offa died shortly afterwards, and for the next three years Canterbury was chiefly ruled by an apostate cleric named Edbert. Offa had, in opposition to Archbishop Lambert, removed the Archiepiscopal See to Lichfield, and procured a confirmation of this translation from Pope Adrian; and, in 801, Kenulf writes to Leo III. and requests his Holiness to gratify the general desire of the English nation so far as to revoke the act of his predecessor, and restore the archbishopric to its proper place. Ethelard went to Rome with this request, and his mission proved successful. On his return home he called a Council at Clovesho, not far from Rochester, and on Oct. 12th, 803, very severe canons were passed against those who should attempt to remove the Metropolitan See from Canterbury. This synod was attended by a large number of bishops, abbots, and clergy, a list of whom is given by Sir Henry Spelman from the Records of Canterbury. Ethelard died in 805.

Ethelbert, St.—Ethelbert came to the crown of Kent about 560; he married Bertha, a Christian, and daughter of Charibert, King of France, on condition that she should be allowed the free exercise of her religion under the care and direction of Bishop Luidard, who came over with her. But this alliance did not procure the conversion either of the king or his subjects; that was reserved for St. Augustine. Ethelbert had granted to Bertha for her worship the little church of St. Martin at Canterbury, which had formerly been used for British Christian services. Augustine landed in the Isle of Thanet, and from thence sent to Ethelbert, who kept court at Canterbury, to tell him that he was come to put him in the way of securing a more valuable and glorious kingdom after death, than that he now enjoyed. The king, with his natural humanity, gave the missionaries leave to stay where they were, until he had considered their proposal, and in the meanwhile he ordered that they should be supplied with all necessaries. Some days after to them and declared his willingness what they had to offer; but, full of tion, he would not meet them in any but only in the open air, where he himself secure from any magical attack on his person or senses. When he had to their discourse with attention for as he expressed himself civilly, but in that seemed to give them but slender of gaining him to the Christian. "These," said Ethelbert, "are idle words and most agreeable promises, are new, distant, and uncertain; and fore, not sufficient to prevail with me on the religion of my ancestors. I journey hither has been long and difficulties, and undertaken to serve communicating to us what you believe most valuable, and take for truth. I therefore, be so far from treating you you shall be kindly received in our domain, allowed to settle there, provided with necessary, and have free liberty to make conquests you can in favour of your religion."

He performed his promise by inviting them into Canterbury, the capital of Kent, then called Dorobernia, and he worshipped at the old church of St. Martin. At length Ethelbert was converted, baptised on Whit Sunday, June 2nd, and the old Saxon temple was made over to Augustine for a regular place of Christian worship dedicated to St. Pancras; both this St. Martin's were outside the city wall. Augustine was consecrated as the first bishop of Canterbury, and Ethelbert promised to give him a dwelling-place within the city; so he retired himself to the old Roman fortress of Reculver and Augustine his own wooden palace in Canterbury. Of this gift Dean Stanley writes: "This grant of house and land to Augustine was a step of immense importance, and in English but European history, he was the first instance in England, or of the countries occupied by the heathen tribes, of an endowment by the State. St. Martin's and St. Pancras' witnessed the beginning of English Christianity, so Canterbury Cathedral is the earliest monument of an English Church Establishment—English constitution of the union of Church and State." St. Gregory was extremely anxious to hear such favourable accounts of the progress of Christianity in England, and he wrote to Ethelbert in 601, exhorting him to persevere, and holding up Constantine the Great to him as an example to imitate. Thus encouraged, he gave the missionaries every assistance in his power, built a church in the city of Canterbury, which was dedicated to the Saviour, and established the Metropolitan See there. Though the cathedral has been several times burnt, it still keeps the name of Christ Church.

It a church and monastery without of the city, and dedicated it to St. Paul, and endowed it very after his death it was known as the of St. Augustine. St. Andrew's at Rochester was also built and by Ethelbert, and by his direction St. built a church at Ely; this was by the barbarity of Penda, King of the . Ethelbert's zeal was not confined to his own dominions; he procured conversion of Sebert, King of the East Angles, by sending Mellitus to preach to him and his subjects, and founded the church of St. Paul, at London, which that made his cathedral. Ethelbert died in 616.

Seaxburga, Sr., was the sister of St. Aldhelm, Bishop of Exeter, and the daughter of a King of the East Angles (probably Erkenwald built for her, about 669, a monastery at Barking, in which she placed her at the head of a religious community of her own sex. so unusual to have monasteries for men in England at that time, that those who used to spend their lives as monks were sent over to France, and either spent their days there, or returned to their country full of experience in monastic life, and brought up others in the same manner. Ethelburga, who was sent for to assist Aldhelm, was probably one of this order, and they together established such a strict discipline that the monastery of Ely became one of the most flourishing in England till the time of the Reformation. It was contemporary with this saint, and miracles said to be performed by St. Ethelburga. The date of her death is uncertain; she is commemorated on Oct. 11th.

Etheldreda, Sr., Queen and Abbess, was daughter of Anna, King of the East Saxons. From a child she wished to lead a religious life, but, greatly to her distress, she was married, in 652, to Tondbert, King of East Angles; he, contrary to her wishes, allowed their marriage to be merely nominal. Tondbert died soon, and Etheldreda was then married to Ecgfrid, King of Northumbria, in 660, he was contrary to her resolution of perpetual virginity; but after a time he repented of his conduct, and at last he begged Wilfrid, Archbishop of York, to use his influence to change Ecgfrid's determination. In this Wilfrid succeeded; indeed, it is said that he advised her to adhere to her resolution, and at last, through his means a divorce was effected, twelve years after their marriage, though much against Ecgfrid's wishes. Etheldreda retired to the monastery of Ely, where she received the veil at the hands of St. Wilfrid. She had an abbey at Ely, left to her by her first husband, and here, according to the custom of the age, she built a double monastery, but the nuns were the more numerous. She became the first abbess of her house, and maintained in it a very strict discipline. After six years she died of the plague, June 23rd, 679. She made it her dying request that she should be buried with the other sisters, without any mark of distinction, and this wish was carried out by her priest, Huna, and she was buried in a wooden coffin. In 695, Sexburga, her sister, who had succeeded her as abbess, ordered her relics to be taken up; this was done, and they were enclosed in a stone monument till 1106, when Robert of Ely had them removed with great solemnity into the cathedral church of Ely. In 1235, Bishop Northwold caused a new shrine to be made for the saint; this perished at the Reformation.

Ethelwald, Sr., Bishop of Winchester, was ordained priest in the reign of Athelstan, by Alphege, Bishop of Winchester, and lived with him for six years; he then went to Glastonbury, and received the monastic habit at the hands of St. Dunstan. In 954 he became Abbot of Abingdon, in Berkshire, and in 963 Bishop of Winchester. He, in conjunction with Dunstan, and Oswald, Bishop of Worcester, set about reforming the manners of the clergy. He ejected some of the secular clergy of his cathedral who were leading dissolute lives, and filled their places with monks from Abingdon. He is said to have repaired or rebuilt many churches in his diocese, and to have founded monasteries in several parts of England, and having obtained a grant of such religious houses as had been plundered or destroyed by the Danes, rebuilt and endowed several of them, particularly that of Ely, where Queen Etheldreda was buried. Ethelwald died Aug. 1st, 984.

Ethelwulf.—A Saxon king, who granted a tithe of his lands to the Church. The following is a translation from the original charter:—"I, Ethelwulf, by the grace of God King of the West Saxons, at the holy solemnity of Easter, for the health of my soul and the prosperity of my kingdom, and the people committed by God Almighty to my charge, have, with the advice of the bishops, earls, and all the persons of condition in my dominions, fixed upon the prudent and serviceable resolution of granting the tenth part of the lands throughout our whole kingdom to the holy churches and ministers of religion, our subjects officiating and settled in them, to be perpetually enjoyed by them with all the advantages of a free tenure and estate: it being likewise our will and pleasure, that this unalterable and indefeasible grant shall for ever remain discharged from all service due to the Crown, and all other incumbrances incident to lay fees. Which grant has been made by us in honour of our Lord Jesus Christ, the blessed Virgin, and all saints, and out of regard to the Paschal solemnity, and that God Almighty might vouchsafe His blessing upon us and our posterity. This charter is engrossed and signed in the year of the Incarnation of our Lord Jesus Christ, DCCCLIV. Dated at Easter, at our palace called WILTUN. Now, whoever shall be disposed to make an augmentation to our grant, may God Almighty reward him in the increase of his posterity. But if any person shall presume to alienate the donation, or make it suffer in any kind, let him give an account of it before the tribunal of Christ, unless he repents of his injustice and makes timely restitution." The charter may be seen in the Latin original. It being so famous a record for settling the tithes in England, some people, anxious to find arguments to weaken its authority, endeavour to limit it in the extent, and object that Ethelwulf was only King of the West Saxons, as appears by his style, Rex Occidentalium Saxonum, and not monarch of England. This law, therefore, they argue, could not oblige any further than Cornwall, Devonshire, Somersetshire, Dorsetshire, Hampshire, Wiltshire, and Berkshire, these counties comprehending the whole of the West Saxon dominions. To this it is replied, that he is styled King of the West Saxons by way of eminence, not exclusively, being most fond of that title upon the score of its being his father Egbert's hereditary kingdom before he became monarch of all England. It is true there were two other petty subordinate kings at the council where this charter was signed—viz. Burhred King of Mercia, and Edmund King of the East Angles, which two princes, according to Ingulphus, consented to the acts of the synod. It is further objected that the King granted only the tithes of his crown lands, not in Dominio, but in Dominico suo—not in all his dominions, but only in his demesnes. To this it is answered that there would have been no necessity to summon so solemn an assembly of the principal clergy and laity for the passing away of a private bounty; besides, it appears by other authors—amongst them Henry of Huntingdon—that the grant reached to the whole kingdom in general.

Eton College was founded Oct. 11th, 1440, by Henry VI., on the model of Wykeham's foundation of Winchester. It was intended that pupils from Eton should proceed to King's College, Cambridge, as the Winchester boys were passed on to New College, Oxford. It had originally endowments for a provost, ten "sad" priests, four lay clerks, six choristers, twenty-five poor grammar scholars, and twenty-five poor men, whose duty it was to pray for the King. Great changes were introduced in 1872 by the Public Schools Parliamentary Commission. Attached to the foundation are several scholarships at

Eucharist.—One of the names of the Holy Communion, being derived from the Pauline word eucharistia, "thanksgiving." [1 Cor. xiv. 16; 2 Cor. iv. 15, Eph. v. 4; Phil. iv. 6; Col. ii. 16; 1 Thess. iii. 9; 1 Tim. ii. 1, iv. 15.] Some of these passages, it has been said, are certain divines (e.g. Bishop Wordsworth, Hook, etc.) that there is special reference to the Holy Communion, but this is not admitted to be a question of opinion; the reason of the application of it to the Holy Communion is clear. It is taken from the institution as given by St. Paul [1 Cor. xi. 23-26], and St. Paul [1 Cor. xi. 23]. (It is said to have given thanks [Gr. eucharisteo], and there is no question that from the beginning Christians have regarded the Holy Communion as the highest act of Christian worship and therefore of thanksgiving. Therefore, emphatically "the Eucharist" Christian writers from the first ages (Clement, Origen, etc.) have used it in this sense, and it was Latinised by the Church of Rome as soon as the Church of Rome came into the Latin-speaking lands. The first I know of Tertullian, uses it. The controversies have arisen concerning the Holy Communion are manifold. That which specially relates to the name Eucharist is whether it is to be regarded as a sacrifice. The doctrine of the Church of Rome is explicit in answer, for it calls this "the Sacrifice of the Mass." The Church of England calls it "this our sacrifice of thanksgiving." But such definition is short of the Roman doctrine, as given by the Roman definition of sacrifice, as oblation of a sensible thing made through a lawful minister by a real offering of the thing offered, to testify God's authority over us, and our entire dependence on Him." Thus theologians hold that the thing offered must be visible, because it pertains to external worship, that is, offered to God alone, because He is Lord of life and death, and the sacrifice must take place in the thing offered, and must convey it directly to God, and that it must be a substitution of the victim for the life of those for the behalf it is offered. It is clear that the Church of England, by rejecting the doctrine of Transubstantiation, does not accept of the sacrifice. But a doctrine of sacrifice is admitted by some of the writers of the Anglican communion (Mede, Archbishop Bramhall, Jeremy Taylor, Bishop Bull, John Wesley, and others). Perhaps we may venture to quote from the words of Dr. Hook the doctrine which the first named would accept as expressed.

'The chief reference to the sacrifice was belongs, according to the right to the sacramental part of the : The sacrifice of the Cross is ex- id represented before God and men, e symbols of the bread and wine; read and wine being duly consecrated, e the worthy communicants, to all nd purposes, virtually and interpre- he Body and Blood of that precious God, who was once, and once for d upon the Cross ; and by partaking we become partakers of the atoning

The grand Sacrifice, once offered, ed and communicated to individual in the Eucharist, by and through crated symbols, but it is not repeated. e Eucharist is regarded as a feast t great sacrifice" [The Eucharist a a Sermon preached in 1846]. Some emists have avowed a belief not very ot of the above, except as regards ed efficacy or necessity of "conso-" and very recently the Rev. R. W. a Congregational manual, expressed to an element in the Lord's Supper ere commemoration, which led to ible strictures from others in that on.

the celebration of the Lord's Supper in order that they might be considered members of the Catholic Church. They considered fire as the creative principle of the universe. It was difficult to get any clue to their doc- trines, as they thought it right to conceal from ordinary men, yet enslaved by sin, the higher truths, until their senses were spiritualised to receive them. Flavian, Bishop of Antioch [about 381], managed to enter into a conference with Adelphius, their superior, pretending to agree with him, and thus enticed him to a confession, which he made use of against Adelphius and his whole sect. The first public action taken against them was at the Synod of Sida, in Pamphylia, in 383. They were many times condemned in various dioceses, one important condemnation was issued at Constantinople in 427, which was con- firmed at the Council of Ephesus, in 431. A book called Ascreticon, by one of their body, was produced at this council and condemned; it was almost their only literary production.

In the eleventh century, in the Greek Church, there was a numerous sect under the name of Euchites, or Enthusiasts, who believed in one perfect original Being, from whom they derived two sons, the good and evil principle, the relation between whom seems to have constituted, according as it inclined one way or the other, to an absolute, or to a relative dualism—a main difference, and, indeed, the ground of two several parties in this sect. To this same distinc- tion may be referred the main difference between the Bogomiles and the Catharians [NOVATIANS], of whom the Euchites may be called the precursors.

Euchologion.—The chief book of the liturgy of the Eastern Church. In its simplest form it contains only the liturgies of Chrysostom and Basil, and the so-called liturgy of Gregory the Great. It generally includes also offices for the administration of the sacraments, and other forms of prayer. It has been proved that the Euchologion was in existence about A.D. 800, and it may have been compiled before that date, but this is not known.

Eudoxians.—Heretics of the fourth cen- tury, so called from their founder, Eudoxius, Bishop of Germania, in Syria, who became Bishop of Antioch in 357, and four years later of Constantinople. He was the friend of Arius and Eunomius, and held their views of the inferiority of the Son to the Father, and also denied the Trinity. He was one of the most mischievous of the Arians, and his doc- trines were condemned by the Councils of Seleucia [359] and Lampascus [366]. He was banished for a short time by Constantine, but held the See of Constantinople until his death in 370.

Churches concerning Monothelitism. Pope Martin I. had been deposed in 653 because he had denounced the Emperor Constans' declaration called "The Type," and had also excommunicated the Bishop of Constantinople. Eugenius was, in 654, chosen in his place, but was not lawfully Pope till Martin's death in the next year. The messengers who were sent to Constantinople to announce his election to the Emperor, returned to Rome with a rather unorthodox confession of faith, acknowledging one will in Christ and also two. Eugenius was rather disposed to sign it, but the clergy and people would not allow it. Another evidence of his want of zeal is, that he neglected Martin during his last years, leaving him almost to starve. Eugenius was said to be very good to the poor, and it is probably this that has gained for him the name of saint. He died in 657, and is commemorated on June 2nd.

Eunomians.—An Arian sect of the fourth century, who took their name from Eunomius. He was born at Dacora, in Cappadocia, and came to Alexandria in 356, where he became the pupil and secretary of Aëtius, from whom he imbibed his extreme Arian views. He accompanied Aëtius to the Arian Council at Antioch, in 358, and was there ordained deacon by Eudoxius, the Patriarch of Constantinople, through whose influence he was made Bishop of Cyzicus, in 360, but in the same year was deposed and banished in consequence of his Arian views. He put himself at the head of the Anomœans, who were henceforth called Eunomians. He died about 394. His doctrine concerning Christ was that He was a created Being, of a nature unlike that of God, and that the Son of God did not substantially unite Himself to the human nature, but only by virtue of His operations. The Holy Spirit, he said, was the first among the created natures, formed according to the command of the Father, by the agency of the Son; which Spirit, as being the first after the Son, has received, indeed, the power to sanctify and to teach, but wants the divine and creative power. Eunomius was the first who discontinued baptism in the name of the Trinity, substituting words which made it a baptism in the Name of the Creator and into the death of Christ. He had a great literary reputation; he wrote a commentary on the Romans, forty epistles, an Apology for his doctrines, and an Exposition of Faith. The latter work alone is extant.

Euphemia, St., Virgin and Martyr of Chalcedon, in the fourth century. She suffered in the persecution by Galerius [307]. A church was built over her tomb, in which the Council of Chalcedon was held in 451, and the success of that assembly was largely attributed by the Fathers to her prayers. Her relics were removed in the seventh century to the Church of St. Sophia, in Constantinople, and four churches were built in that city to her memory. Constantine Copronymus threw her relics into the sea, but it is said that they were rescued and deposited in a small island, whence Constantine and Irene had them removed to Constantinople in 796. She was regarded as the patroness of Chalcedon.

Eusebius, Bishop of Cæsarea, in Palestine, and one of the most learned men of his age, was born in Palestine about A.D. 260, towards the end of the reign of Galerius, and during the bishopric of Dionysius. Having been ordained presbyter by Agapius, Bishop of Cæsarea, Eusebius set up a school in that town; he also assisted his friend Pamphilus in the copying of the Scriptures and of the works of Origen. In 309, the last persecution of Diocletian broke out, and Eusebius suffered the sorrow of seeing many of his friends and of his flock destroyed by it, notably the "holy and blessed Pamphilus," as Eusebius calls him, who suffered martyrdom after two years' imprisonment. Probably Eusebius shared the imprisonment with him, for they were engaged together in a defence of Origen, which must have necessitated constant intercourse, and it would be difficult otherwise to explain his escape from martyrdom. In 313, peace was restored, and soon after Eusebius was appointed to the bishopric of Cæsarea. At the beginning of the Arian controversy his sympathies were on the side of Arius, thinking, with some other bishops of Palestine, that he was persecuted too harshly by Alexander, Bishop of Alexandria. Eusebius wrote to Alexander in favour of Arius, and not having interest enough to procure his being restored, allowed him and his partisans the privilege of meeting in their churches, on the condition that they submitted to the jurisdiction of their bishop, and made humble application to be restored to his communion. When the Council of Nicæa assembled, in 325, Eusebius took a leading part in it, probably for the reason that he stood high in the favour of the Emperor Constantine. After much discussion he agreed with the rest in condemning the Arian heresy, and subscribed to the doctrines of the Nicene Creed, though objecting at first to the words "of the same substance," to which he afterwards consented for the sake of peace, and also because the words had formerly been in use in his own Church of Cæsarea. One work in which the Council was engaged was the settlement of the dispute concerning the time of keeping Easter, and it has been asserted that the cycle of nineteen years, or Golden Number, was determined at this time, and that Eusebius, being the most learned member, was entrusted with the arrangement; but in the documents containing accounts of the proceedings, there is no mention of the method of calculating Easter, and it is more probable that the Council only the old Metonic cycle which had been used for this purpose by Anatolius, a, about A.D. 284. Eusebius was at the Council of Antioch, in 330, when Meletius, Bishop of Antioch, against whom had been brought charges of Sabellianism, was elected, and the See offered to Eusebius. The wishes of the people were too strong for him to admit of his accepting the office. He attended the Councils of Cæsarea and Nice, which were held to examine the charges against St. Athanasius; but the proceedings were stopped by the flight of the accused to Constantinople to appeal to the Emperor. The Emperor therefore gave sentence of condemnation against St. Athanasius. Immediately afterwards the Emperor Constantine issued summons to the bishops to appear at Constantinople, on the occasion of the thirtieth anniversary of his accession, when the dedication was to take place of a basilica built on the site of Calvary. A synod was held for the purpose of bringing about a reconciliation between the various disputants, which had been desired by the Emperor and by the bishops. The event is marked by the recantation of Arius to communion. Eusebius, at the same time, selected to justify the charges against St. Athanasius to the Emperor, and he made a panegyrical oration on the occasion, which was afterwards added to his Life of Constantine. The Emperor only survived this festival by a few months. He died in 337, and it is said that Eusebius died two years afterwards, so that he was not living in 341, when Acacius was in possession of the See of Antioch in that year. Eusebius was a volutary writer; he is known chiefly by his Life of Constantine and Ecclesiastical History, both of which are said to have been published in 325. In his other historical works he wrote a Chronicle and the Life of Constantine. He wrote innumerable Letters, Defences, Sermons, and various doctrinal works.

Meletius, Bishop of Samosata, makes a notable figure in ecclesiastical history as an improved one of the greatest supports of orthodox faith against the Arians. He was Bishop of Samosata, in Syria, on the banks of the Euphrates, of which city he was Bishop in the reign of Constantius. He was not heard of till Meletius was elected to the See of Antioch, in 361. Constantius assembled a council at Antioch with the purpose of condemning the terms Consubstantial and different in substance, and thus to come to a medium between the Catholics and the Arians. The bishops who met at Antioch, among whom was Eusebius, decided that the Church of Antioch might be divided with a bishop, for Eustathius had been elected by the Arian party, and Eudoxius, who had been chosen in his room, had been elected to Constantinople. Meletius was elected by both Catholics and heretics, and the writing which contained the free act of both sides for his election, and was subscribed by all the bishops, was lodged in the hands of Eusebius. The first discourse the new bishop made sufficed to show the Arians that they were mistaken in their man, and when he had only been in possession of the See for a month, they prevailed on the Emperor to banish him, and, further, to demand from Eusebius the writing which confirmed Meletius's election. This he firmly refused to give up without the express consent of all concerned in it, and on the Emperor threatening, if he refused, to cut off his right hand, he calmly extended both hands, and declared he would lose them both rather than part with so flagrant a proof of Arian injustice. Thenceforth the Arians looked on him as a dangerous enemy. On the accession of Julian the Apostate, the exiled bishops, both Catholic and heretic, were reinstated in their Sees, and in 363 his successor Jovian restored peace to the Church, and gave Meletius the liberty of convening a council at Antioch, at which Eusebius and twenty-five other bishops all declared for the doctrine of the Church as established by the Council of Nice.

In 370 the Metropolitan See of Cæsarea in Cappadocia was vacant, and Eusebius, being urged thereto by St. Gregory Nazianzen, went thither, and was instrumental in securing the election of St. Basil, who became one of his most ardent friends. It is said that for a time he travelled disguised as a soldier, in Syria, Phœnicia, and Palestine, in order to fortify the orthodox Churches, and to ordain presbyters and deacons wherever they were wanting. It is very probable that he was the Eusebius who presided at the Council of Gangra [372 or 373], which condemned the heresy of Eustathius [q.v.], but it is not absolutely certain. From a letter of St. Basil, in 373, we learn that Eusebius had successfully interfered to secure the election of an orthodox bishop at Tarsus, and, indeed, he worked so untiringly against the Arians that it was impossible to conceal the hand which every day gave some stroke to their party, and sank their interest wherever it was employed; and at length they prevailed with Valens, who was devoted to their sect, and who had hitherto for some unaccountable reason left him unmolested during his bitter persecutions of the orthodox, to order his banishment into Thrace. Eusebius was at Samosata when the messenger came, late in the evening; he begged him to conceal his business, for, knowing the affection of his people, he said, "If it takes air, the people will fall on you, throw you into the river, and then I shall be charged with your death." He then went calmly through his usual devotions, and late at night he left his house on foot, attended only by one trusty servant, who carried after him a pillow and a book. With this slight provision he took a boat to Zeugma, about seventy miles down the river. This event is generally fixed at 373. At break of day the whole town was in an uproar, and many of his friends followed him to Zeugma, urging his return, but he refused, urging the authority of St. Paul for submitting to the powers in being. They then besought him to let them supply him with money and comforts for his journey, but he would only accept a trifling sum, and having prayed with his flock, and exhorted them to uphold the apostolical doctrine, he pursued his journey into Thrace. Both St. Gregory Nazianzen and St. Basil wrote to him, commending his courage and constancy. His flock left his successor, Eunomius, a man of gentle temper, in complete isolation, and he retired, and in his place Lucius was appointed, a rough and oppressive man. In 378 Valens died, and his successor, Gratian, permitted Eusebius to return. Thus restored to his post, he began to consider the distressed condition of the Churches in Mesopotamia and Syria, which were deprived of their pastors. Historians tell us (though it would be out of the jurisdiction of his See) that he consecrated bishops for Berea, Hierapolis, Cyrus, and other Sees. He was about to ordain Maris at Dolica, a small town in Syria, when an Arian woman threw a tile from the top of her house, which broke his head, and he died in a few days. Anxious to imitate his Divine Master, he made his attendants promise that the woman should not be prosecuted. He is venerated as a martyr in the Latin Church on June 21st, and in the Eastern Church on June 22nd, but both agree that he died in 380.

Eustathians.—A sect resembling the Euchites. They took their name from Eustathius, a monk living in the fourth century, who, under pretence of a more perfect way of living, introduced several erroneous opinions and practices contrary to the usages of the Church. He was formerly Bishop of Sebaste, in Armenia, and was deposed by the Council of Gangra, the date of which is uncertain. The bishops who met there, in their synodical epistle charge him and his partisans with these errors:—[1] With condemning marriage and parting women from their husbands. [2] With quitting the public congregations and setting up private meetings. [3] With encouraging servants to leave their masters, and children their parents, under a pretence of living in a more self-denying way. [4] With allowing women to wear men's clothes. [5] With rejecting the fasts appointed by the Church, and practising other days of abstinence according to their own fancy, not excepting Sunday. [6] With forbidding to eat flesh at any time. [7] With rejecting the ministrations of married priests. [8] With paying no regard to consecrated places and the tombs of martyrs. [9] With maintaining that nobody could be saved without parting with all his estate. These doctrines stand condemned in twenty canons inserted in the Code of Canons of the Universal Church.

Eustathius, Patriarch of Antioch, was born at Side, in Pamphylia, in the fourth century. He was translated against his will from Berea to Antioch on the death of Philogonus [323]. Two years later he assisted at the General Council of Nice, where he made a considerable figure, and opened the synod with a speech to the Emperor Constantine. His zeal against the Arians caused them, in 330, to calumniate him, and they charged him with Sabellianism and immorality. These false charges gaining credit, he was uncanonically deposed, notwithstanding the opposition of several bishops; but the people of Antioch mutinied to keep him with them. The Eusebians applied to the Emperor, and charged Eustathius with maltreating the Emperor's mother and being the cause of the insurrection. Constantine, believing this information, banished Eustathius to Trajanopolis, in Thrace, where he died about 337. According to St. Jerome, this bishop was the first who wrote against Arianism. He was the author of many tracts and homilies, and of a treatise against Origen. The last is the only work of his extant.

Euthymius, Sr., the Archimandrite, was born at Melitene, in Armenia, in 377. He was at an early age placed under the care of Otreius, bishop of his native town, and on his ordination as presbyter he had charge of all the monasteries in the neighbourhood. At the age of twenty-nine he went to Jerusalem to visit the holy places, and settled for the next five years in a community of monks at Pharan, about six miles from Jerusalem. Here he formed a great friendship with a hermit named Theoctistus, and after a time they determined to live apart from the world in a cave in the wilderness. This they afterwards turned into a church, and built a monastery close by. A story is told of a wonderful cure effected by the prayers of Euthymius on Terebon, the son of Aspebetus, prince of the Saracens. In consequence of this the whole party became Christians. He was visited by Peter, Bishop of the Saracens, on his way to the Council of Ephesus in 431. Euthymius was very zealous in his defence of the orthodox faith against the Nestorians and Eutychians, and is said to have been instrumental in persuading the Empress Eudoxia to renounce Eutychianism. He died in 473, and received saintly honours in the East, which were also recognised in the Roman Calendar.

Eutropius.—A reader in the Church of Constantinople in St. Chrysostom's time. After the banishment of this Father the cathedral was set on fire, and Eutropius was tortured to make him confess that St. Chrysostom's clergy were concerned in this but he resolutely declared the and died under tortures of the most barbarity.

Flavian.—The follower of Eutyches, a Presbyter of Constantinople in the 4th century. The first notice we have of him is that he left his cloister to raise his infant Nestorius at the Council of 431. He fell into a fresh heresy concerning the nature of Christ, saying that one nature only existed in reality, that of the Incarnate Word, and his argument so far as to annihilate the humanity of Christ. Domnus, archbishop of Antioch, is said to have summoned Eutyches before the Emperor Theodosius of reviving the Apollinarian heresy. Notice was taken of it till, in 448, the Synod of Constantinople, he was summoned by Flavian, Patriarch of that city, by Eusebius of Dorylaeum, in Phrygia.

At first he haughtily refused to be summoned before the Synod. The third summons, and just as the were about to proceed with him according to ecclesiastical law, as one who, by his appearance, had confessed that he was a heretic; not alone, however, accompanied by a large train of soldiers, and notables of State, who accompanied him till the Synod gave him leave that he should be permitted to return safely to his cloister. Neander (p. 307) thus speaks of his trial:—"as professed to be unwilling to hold except what he found expressly in the Holy Scriptures. He reverently said, the sayings of the older teachers, but they could not possess, in his authority of a rule of faith; for they were from error, and they sometimes condemn another." To all questions proposed him concerning Christ, he had always the same reply. 'I confess him to be the Lord of heaven and earth. His do not allow myself to comprehend.' On being pressed, he declared that he could suppose there were two natures in Incarnation, but that after it he knew but one nature. By this, he questioned, Eutyches intended to say, which was meant by the adherents of the Alexandrian system of doctrine, that two should be distinguished in conception, actual manifestation only the one; if the Logos became flesh must be recognised. But, by his rude form of expression, he furnished occasion, it must be acknowledged, for many suspicions of heresy, to those who fastened only on the letter of the expression, as though he believed in a pre-existence of Christ's humanity, and the like. Furthermore, Eutyches was wont to call the body of Christ the body of God; and though he did not deny that Christ possessed a human body, yet it seemed to him derogatory to its dignity, as the body of God, to call it the same in essence with other human bodies. A certain mistaken and undefined feeling of reverence kept him from this. True, he would have found no difficulty in expressing himself precisely as the Synod required that he should, although he had never hitherto expressed himself thus, but yet he would not consent to condemn the opposite form of expression, which in truth appeared to him the better one. Since, then, he could not make up his mind to recognise the two natures in Christ, nor to join in the formula of condemnation, the Synod gave sentence against him that he should be divested of all his spiritual titles, and excommunicated from the Church." Eutyches, with the aid of the Patriarch of Alexandria, Dioscurus, and Chrysaphius, one of the most powerful men of the court, applied to the Emperor for a new trial. He declared that the proceedings against him were illegal, that his sentence of condemnation had been prepared even before his trial, and that many false statements had been made. The Emperor ordered a revision of the earlier proceedings, but Flavian would not be influenced in his judicial actions by fear of the Imperial power, and the revision only resulted in a confirmation of the sentence. Eutyches had said at the Synod of Constantinople that he would consent to profess his belief in the two natures of Christ, if the Bishops of Alexandria and Rome would also approve of it. He well knew the feeling of Dioscurus, and he trusted to be upheld by Leo the Great, from the manner in which the Bishop of Rome had espoused the cause of the monkish party in the contest with Nestorius. What he aimed at was an appeal to a General Council, to be attended by both the other Patriarchs. Flavian was desirous of preventing such a meeting, as he said that the doctrine of the Church was sufficiently decided against Eutyches. Leo also thought the council inadvisable, and proposed to be arbiter between the other parties, but the Emperor had already summoned the new council. It opened at Ephesus, 449; Dioscurus was named by the Emperor president of the council, and the judges of Eutyches—Flavian and Eusebius, for example—were to attend the Council, not as judges, nor even as voters, but to learn the decision of the council. Of course, Eutyches was reinstated, but the unorthodox proceedings of this council have caused it to be justly branded in Church history with the name of the Robber Synod. [EPHESUS, ROBBER COUNCIL OF.]

The sudden death of Theodosius II., in 450, changed the state of affairs; Marcian, who succeeded him, was orthodox. He convened a General Council to meet at Nice, in 451; 630 bishops had already assembled there, but some fanatical ecclesiastics, monks and laymen, probably belonging to the party of Dioscurus, created such a disturbance there that it was transferred to Chalcedon, where it was decided to draw up a profession of faith on the disputed question. Neander describes this council at length, and after speaking of the various controversies between the different branches of the Church says [vol. iv., p. 228]:—"The commissioners declared, though doubtless after many other things had transpired which have not been reported to us, 'Dioscurus had avowed it as his doctrine that Christ consists of two natures, but could not allow that two natures subsisted in Christ. Leo teaches that two natures are united without confusion, without change, and without separation, in one and the same Christ. With which of these two do you agree?' The bishops—who could hardly all of them have been the same as had opposed every change in the ancient creed—now exclaimed, 'We all have the same faith with Leo; whoever contradicts this faith is a Eutychian.' Upon this the commissioners suggested, that nothing more was needed than to receive into the creed that article from the letter of Leo. After this proposal had been generally received, they held with the select committee a secret meeting, in which the new symbol of faith was drawn up accordingly. In this it was defined that the one Christ, Son, Lord, Only-begotten, should be recognised in two natures, so that all confusion, change, and division of the natures is excluded. No one should be allowed to profess any other creed than this, to teach or to think otherwise."

Eutyches, who had already been banished by the Emperor, was condemned, and Dioscurus shared the same fate. Of the last days of Eutyches nothing is known. Eutychianism was afterwards merged in Monophysitism. [MONOPHYSITES.]

Eutychius, St., was born in Phrygia, about 512. His father, Alexander, was an officer in the guards under Justin I., a great favourite with that Emperor, and his successor, Justinian, and served under the celebrated Belisarius. The education of Eutychius was confided to his maternal grandfather, Hesy-chius, a man of remarkable sanctity as—some say, treasurer of the Church of Augustopolis, and, according to others, a bishop. He afterwards pursued his studies at Constantinople, and formed a design of becoming a monk, but was diverted from it by the Bishop of Amasea, Metropolitan of Pontus, who designed him to fill a vacant See in that province. With this view he received the tonsure, and at the age of thirty was ordained priest. But the Metropolitan changed his mind, and gave another to the bishopric, so Eutychius was free to carry out his original wish. He entered the monastery at Amasea, and lived for ten years in retirement, when the Emperor Justinian had called a Council to meet at Constantinople. The Council issued Three Chapters, i.e. three documents, each by three different authors, which were expected to contain or favour the error of Eutychius. The Bishop of Amasea being Eutychius, he represented him at the Council. Mennas, then Patriarch of Constantinople, received him at his own house, and he had previously predicted to his clergy that "he would be his successor." This prophecy was fulfilled, for Mennas died on Aug. 25th, 552, and Eutychius was proposed by the Emperor to the patriarchate. The council was opened in 553, and Eutychius presided at it, although Vigilius, although then at Constantinople, did not think fit to appear at the synod. The Patriarchs of Alexandria and Antioch were there with one hundred and forty prelates of their jurisdictions. Eutychius opposed the errors in question, and set forth the doctrine of the Catholic Church. The Three Chapters were condemned. Five years later, on his refusing to assent to the doctrine that the Body of Christ is incorruptible, he was deposed by Justinian, who had him arrested by soldiers while celebrating the Holy Eucharist. They seized him and took him to a monastery, called Choracudis, and the next day removed him to that of St. Euphrosyne near Chalcedon. He was then tried by an assembly of bishops, and many ridiculous charges were brought forward against him, and a sentence of banishment was pronounced against him, and he was banished to one of the islands in the Propontis, and then removed to the monastery of St. Euphrosyne. Here he remained for twelve years, when St. Eutychius, a priest of Constantinople, with him in his exile, and wrote records several miracles said to be wrought by him. On the death of Justinian, Scholasticus, who had been made Patriarch of his room, the people demanded of Justinian's successor, Justin II., that he should be reinstated in his dignity. Justin II. recalled, and received with acclamation at Constantinople, Oct. 3rd, 577. He fell into what was deemed heresy of the Resurrection. He affirmed that the Resurrection of men at the general Resurrection was "subtle and fine as air, and consequently palpable." St. Gregory argued the point with him in the presence of the Emperor, and the opinion being held erroneous, the Patriarch submitted to have his name on the subject burnt. Shortly after this, on Low Sunday, April 5th, 582, in the sixtieth year of his age.

We pass on to consider the disciples of these men, the carriers-on of their principles into the next generation. With the name of Newton will always be associated that of the poet Cowper, who, as the principal religious poet of his day, had a vast influence in shaping its religious sentiment, as Keble afterwards had when the High Church movement came.
Richard Cecil, "the one clerical genius of his party," as Bishop Wilberforce called him, was appointed to his living in London the year after Newton became rector of St.
Mary Woolnoth [1780]. If the latter spoke correctly, Cecil made the third Evangelical clergyman in London, for Newton declared on his appointment that himself and Romaine were the only two. But prominent among the second generation of the Evangelical fathers was a layman, "a man who, by paths till then untrodden, reached a social and political eminence never before attained by any man unaided by place, by party, or by the sword." Such is Sir James Stephen's eulogy upon William Wilberforce. [WILBERFORCE.] Born within a month of him, and surviving him for three years, Charles Simeon was the chief representative of the party at the moment when it had risen to its highest point of influence. Among their most prominent followers we may name Henry Martyn (one of the most heroic names which adorn the annals of the English Church), Josiah Pratt, Charles Bradley, Henry Melvill, and Archbishop Sumner.

By the beginning of the present century
the Church was divided into two great parties, the old High Church, or Orthodox, and the Evangelical. The former were the more numerous, no doubt, but they were lifeless, conforming very carefully to the directions of the Book of Common Prayer, but resting their action, not upon the spiritual character of the Church, but upon the fact that it was "by law established." They disliked the Evangelicals because they were following new practices, using extempore prayers and preaching extempore sermons. Had the Church found no better defenders of her historic position than these, she might have sunk into the poorest Erastianism; for the Evangelical party did not possess either the historical learning or the historical enthusiasm needed to preserve it. At this critical period, however, two new influences arose, which profoundly modified the position of both. The one was a new band of independent thinkers, of which we cannot say that they owed their origin to any one leader. The greatest of them was Coleridge, but we have to place among them Whately, who was certainly no disciple of his.
[WHATELY; BROAD CHURCH.] These writers were endeavouring to find room in the Church system for German divinity, and for the disciples of natural science, which had suddenly taken a great stride in the progress of knowledge. The other influence to which we have adverted, and the most powerful of all, was that represented by the Tracts for the Times, begun in 1833. Towards the Tract movement, before long, the Evangelical party placed itself in uncompromising antagonism, and many years passed before the Tractarians gained the ascendancy. Popular opinion was on the side of the Evangelicals, until it became evident that they had no answer to give to the great problems which scientific discovery and historical criticism brought to the front, and which clamoured for a solution. They could only bring piety of life in their hands. Their divinity had sunk into poor and unfruitful Calvinism, and was ready to die. The Tract writers pleaded antiquity and history, and claimed unity with the great past from the beginning. The literature of the other side was experimental, which in colder minds became Rationalism.

But though the Evangelical party, as a party, has almost ceased to be, that which was good and noble within it has probably never been more effective and powerful than now. The need of personal piety, the personal responsibility of each soul to God, the necessity of the work of Christ in the salvation of man, the power of the Spirit to sanctify; all these truths were brought to the front by the Evangelical clergy at a time when dry morality and mere expediency were the staple of pulpit teaching. Among those who so touch now, are men who also hold the need of the visible Church, of the Sacraments, of the ordained ministry; and who do not disdain the use of external symbols as suggestive of spiritual truths.

Taking a broader view of these questions, as presented hitherto in the history of the Anglican Church, it will be seen that Evangelicalism was the embodiment of a pole in religious thought and feeling which has been represented in all communions, the history of Nonconformity presenting in different manner the same differences. So also in the Roman Church, the Jansenists of France are examples of Evangelical thought and feeling even under its severe limits; and in our own day, amongst English Nonconformists, Mr. Spurgeon is as widely apart from the late Mr. Baldwin Brown as Bishop Ryle of Liverpool from the late Rev. F. D. Maurice. Evangelicalism is essentially the theology of the inner life of the individual soul. As such it must ever have a permanent place in all true religion, and whenever unduly ignored, or even thrust into the background, it may be expected, by the great law of reaction, sooner or later to reassert itself, perhaps at first in more or less extreme and narrow forms, as it is in the tendency of all systems based upon individual experience to do.

a habit encourages the proneness, so great, to desecrate the beginning of the Lord's Day, and that devotion would be less if the earlier portion of it were devoted to the holiest purpose, whereas now the danger of weariness, of perturbed mind, of distraction of mind. The late Mr. Wilberforce spoke strongly against the practice, and Archbishop Tait also spoke of it, and the practice is less frequent in the Anglican Church than it was a few years ago.

Song.—The same as Evening Song, which is appointed to be sung or recited, refers more especially to the Psalms and Canticles which are sung. It is also used with Vespers. The term Evening appears in the Prayer Book in the Proper Lessons and Proper Psalms.

Trees.—The practice of decorating churches and houses with evergreens at Christmas may be traced back to ancient times, and is a custom expressive of the glory and the everlasting freshness and verdure of the Church triumphant. Isaiah lx. 13 promises to sanction the use: "The glory shall come unto thee, the fir-tree, the pine-tree, and the box together, to the place of My sanctuary, and I will be the place of my feet glorious." In the old Christmas carols allude to holly and bay at this season.

Proofs of Religion.—The old Christian apologists put miracles on a firm ground, and looked upon internal evidence as auxiliary only. The more modern apologists chiefly rely on the character of Christianity itself, and the unique excellence of the religion, while miracles are regarded as evidences rather than as component parts of the religion. Both sorts of proof, however, support one another, and each adds to the other's wants. Our Lord's exhortation, "If men would not believe His words, neither should they believe Him for His miracles," is an appeal for evidence both to the facts He taught, and to the miracles which He performed. In addition, it may be observed that the Apostolic teaching was based on facts, on miraculous facts, which were constantly attested as the basis of the doctrine delivered. All that can be said, however, on the present occasion, is to give a cursory glance at the two methods or sorts of evidence—the external and the internal, as they have been called. Internal evidence is what the first converts chiefly rely upon, for while paganism was established by tradition, Christianity was established at once with authority; and while the pagans believed their miracles because of the tradition, Christians received their creed because of the miracles. Hence it seems that the external evidence afforded by miracles had preponderating weight with the earliest followers of the Christian religion.

Briefly, it may be stated here that the old pagans exhibited credulity; the first Christians, faith. Faith requires evidence; credulity dispenses with evidence. Faith often goes against natural inclination; credulity generally falls in with existing prepossessions. For instance, the Ephesian worshippers of Diana were credulous, when, for the sake of gain, they accepted as genuine "the image that fell down from Jupiter;" but a direct appeal was made to faith grounded on the evidence of miracles when our Lord said, "The works that I do in My Father's name, they bear witness of Me."

The real question seems to be, not whether miracles are incapable of proof because they are contrary to experience—for the experience of the race, as a whole, may be quite opposite to the experience of certain individuals that compose it—but as to the capacity and honesty of the witnesses who have borne their testimony to the miracles in question. On this latter point Paley, in his well-known work, has enlarged with emphasis and clearness, and has made out the case he undertook. But besides the honesty and capacity of the first witnesses of the miracles, the character and attendant circumstances of the miracles can be cited in proof of their reality, and, in consequence, of the truth of the religion they advocated. Now, these miracles were wrought in public, and in the presence of enemies; their actual occurrence was not denied at the time, but was attributed to the exercise of magic or the influence of demons, which was a charge that in its very nature proved their veritable performance. The unique character, also, of the miracles has to be taken into account. They were not tentative; no failures are recorded; they appealed directly to the senses, and left no room for doubt; their object, too, was always moral or beneficent; the means, too, employed in each case, if unusual in their selection, were instantaneous in their operation, and the results have been lasting. In this respect ancient miracles occupy quite another position from modern miracles, which begin and end in themselves; which teach us nothing, which effect nothing, and pass away like smoke along with the aimless curiosity they satisfy.

If it be asked, on the other hand, why, since our Lord's miracles were of such a character, the Jews, who witnessed them, did not at once acknowledge Him, two reasons may be given—first, our Lord's mean appearance and unambitious programme disappointed their carnal expectations; and, next, the evidence they had was in some respects inferior to the evidence we possess, who have seen the fulfilment of prophecy in the wide establishment of Christianity. It is true, indeed, that they saw some very remarkable details of ancient prophecy fulfilled in Christ's own Person; but, as it has been said already, their eyes were blinded by their prejudices.

To suppose that Christianity, being such as it is—overturning as it did the national hopes of the Jews, running counter as it does to the natural inclinations of mankind—could have been propagated without miracles, by mere peasants, like its Founder and first preachers, is much more difficult of belief than to suppose that Christ employed miracles in proof of His divine claims, and gave specimens in His own Person of the superhuman power He possessed. Of the two difficulties, it is most philosophical to prefer the least.

A word may be introduced here on the Lord's Resurrection, a fact unique in itself, inasmuch as He alone rose from the grave, to die no more; and also a fundamental fact, as the historical basis on which the Apostles relied, and Christianity itself rested. The evidence, therefore, that proves the reality of the fact, proves also the truth of the religion it supports.

Now, the unanimous testimony borne by the Apostles to the Resurrection of their Lord was either an imposture or a delusion. If it was an imposture, they knowingly propagated a falsehood, to their own hurt, and without any adequate motive. Again, had they hidden the Lord's body, the task would have been perilous, and discovery ruinous. Moreover, had the whole story been a fiction, how could it have caused such a sudden and complete revolution, as it did, in the character and conduct of those who were consciously guilty of the deception practised? The change from despair to joy, from timidity to boldness, is easily and naturally accounted for on the supposition of Christ's Resurrection and their own persuasion of the fact, but is altogether unlikely, had they started on a career of hypocrisy with a gigantic lie upon their lips.

If, on the other hand, the Apostles' belief in their Lord's Resurrection was a delusion, how was it that the risen Saviour showed Himself to those especially who were most familiar with His Person, and therefore the best judges of His identity? How was it, again, that He was visible at various places and times, and to a considerable number of persons? A few might be deceived, but not the many. How came it about also that after His visible Ascension all such appearances of His Person ceased on earth altogether, which was but natural, if His previous Resurrection had been a reality? So far, again, from the disciples being easily credulous, it is expressly recorded that they considered the first news of the Resurrection of their Lord as idle tales—a piece of behaviour that gives to their after testimony all the greater weight.

As for what is called "the vision theory," by which mental impressions were received for actual occurrences, it would make the Lord a deceiver, and His followers foolish, a supposition altogether out of harm what is known elsewhere both of Him and their conduct.

Our Lord's Resurrection, therefore, is neither an imposture nor a delusion; a fact unique in itself, potent influences, a visible proof of the true Divine claims, and a grand moving which, from that time to the present Christian religion is the world-wide

On the whole, then, it may be concluded the old method of resting on the evidence afforded by miracles to the Christianity, as a main support, as with the claims to belief put forward by the Lord and His Apostles, and with the and circumstances of the miracles themselves.

When what are called the intentions are examined, only a bird's eye can be taken of them here. One thing, however, may be stated at starting: The human mind cannot decide what ought to come from God, or not, it may inquire whether the Christian religion in itself is likely to be the work of God, or man. For instance, it may ask such questions: Was the religion of Christ invented by a Jew who would have invented for his own purposes, when it contradicted the national religion altogether, and supplanted the Mosaic law by another system and called the national pride to the quiver? Would our Lord, again, been a mere impostor, offering out inducements to gather round him, would He have so planned that the result of adhesion to His cause would be success and worldly prosperity on the contrary, persecution, ridicule, and death? Where, too, on the supposition, would He discover that unique evidence extending to the motives as well as the facts, which shone in His own example and was re-echoed in the teaching of His Apostles? Why, too, if He was an impostor, would He tell a lie to inculcate truth of the highest kind?

Besides these questions and their answers, the style of the New Testament, especially of the Four Gospels, is a fact that demands explanation. It is about that four men, some of the learned men, should have been found in the same country, and that country, which was not conspicuous for its culture; and not only so, but should have been found at one and the same period in the history, writing on the same subject of one extraordinary man; and yet, in such an artless manner, so unostentatious, so realistic in its graphic touches, as to produce an effect equalled amongst men? All this, together, looks as if the coincidence was not the unaided work of chance, but the effect of Divine superintendence. Should it be objected, however, that

Testament is still an open question, the genuineness and authenticity of the gospels may be disputed, it is sufficient for present purposes to reply that there is evidence that these books were written by the end of the second century and come down from the times of the apostles.

In the case of the Jews be altogether taken into notice in speaking of the proofs of the Christian religion. Their rejection of Christ; the fall of the temple and the destruction of their worship, especially the cessation of the temple to this day; their consequent dispersion and preservation in dispersion; all beyond human foresight, yet were foretold, and have also visibly come to pass and they form together a living and convincing proof of the truth of that Revelation which predicted their occurrence.

As an objection is advanced on the ground that the slow progress Christianity has made in the world only shows the great obstacles in human nature to be overcome, and therefore indirectly proves that the Christian religion was not invented by man.

In the relationship between modern Science and Revelation has been a prolific source of objection. But their provinces are distinct. The aim of Revelation is religious, and when it speaks of the future language is popular, not scientific.

In the last, is to "multiply essential facts which Baxter says is "the life of the Church." The true question is not whether Science and Scripture are in hopeless contradiction, but rather what Scripture really means, and what Science truly knows. The "Reign of Science" has not destroyed one essential doctrine of the Christian faith.

Conclusion.—The theory called by this name which professes to indicate the origin of the universe and its inhabitants arrived at their present condition. Theory of Evolution. We know as a matter of fact that every living being comes from a matter in which no trace of the present form is discernible. This particle of matter is known to biologists as the germ. It is developed according to certain laws until it assumes the completed form and character. This is the evolution of the individual. The observations brought to light by the study of nature upon evolution, and the new discoveries afforded by the microscope, and other helps formerly unknown, led to a further generalisation, that "all kinds of animals may have originated by the growth and modification of primordial germs." One of the first to formulate this theory was Lamarck who laid it down that the universe is a mechanism, and as such explicable on physical principles. But this was more of a guess than the result of inductive reasoning; the arguments on which the theory rests have been stated by subsequent writers, who have demonstrated the gradations of structure from the simplest to the most highly organised creatures, presenting close analogies among groups, some of the most widely different habits. The organs which are found complete in one class are found to exist in others, but in the most rudimentary and apparently useless condition, and seem to have been developed by the conditions and circumstances of the creature. The theory of development through the continuous action of natural causes was applied to the Solar System and the earth by Kant and Laplace, then to the crust of the earth by Sir Charles Lyell. The wonderful geological discoveries of later times brought forth into light the evidence that existing plants and animals are formed with differences upon the model of extinct kinds, and lead to the probability that the later have been developed from the extinct, and hence the further probability that the extinct races of animals have been evolved from a yet earlier group of ancestors, simpler as they recede into the past. So far the case was stated by Lamarck, by Goethe, by Erasmus Darwin, by St. Hilaire—the doctrine of descent, but not the process by which the changes were wrought. Facts were brought forward, and marshalled with skill and convincing power, but the causes were still in great measure hidden. The theory of Law was set forth and elaborated with wonderful skill and patience by Charles Darwin, who died in 1882 at the age of seventy-three. In his Origin of Species, published in 1859, we have a Theory of Evolution, which professes to account for the facts which previous scientists had adduced. He observed how breeders produced new forms of pigeons, cattle, vegetables, most widely different from the original form; that they do so by making use of the natural occurrence of variations, and of the hereditary transmission of variations. A pigeon breeder wants to intensify some particular characteristic of a bird: he selects those birds which have this characteristic in a slight degree, and allows only these selected specimens to breed, and in the course of long time, by watchfulness and patience, he produces the greatest possible variation from the original parent germ. The horticulturist does the same with flowers. This being so, the question arises, is there any agency in Nature which thus takes the place of the breeder, and persistently selects favoured varieties for breeding whilst destroying the others? His answer to this question was, There is such an agency, and it is the struggle for existence, or competition for food and for place. If all elephants that were born survived, a single pair in 750 years would have 19,000,000 of progeny living. If an annual plant produced two seeds a year, and these all survived to reproduce, in twenty years that single plant would have a progeny of a million. Hence the conclusion that as all which are born do not survive, only the varieties best suited do so, and the rest perish. This Spencer called the survival of the fittest, and the theory is known as "The Theory of Natural Selection." Of course such a growth and development required vast ages to complete itself. But the slow process thus indicated had been already shown to be also needful to explain geological facts.

A vast number of questions gathered round this theory, and many difficulties, some of which Mr. Darwin himself lived to solve, some of which still remain for his followers to attempt. Thus, the strange shapes and colours of flowers, and the formation of honey by plants, were shown by him to be the result of insect fertilisation; the shape of the pitcher plants, of the carnivorous habit of the plants; the rudimentary and apparently useless organs of some plants and animals, he explained to be the survival of structures inherited from ancestors to whom they were useful, though now, through want of being needed, they have dwindled away. It followed as a consequence that living plants and animals have reached their present position on the earth's surface by natural means of transport—flying, walking, swimming. They were not specially created each for their several elements; natural causes brought the Polar bear to the Arctic Ocean and the tapir to Brazil.

As regards the truth or otherwise of the theory thus briefly sketched, so far as it has been tested it agrees with facts, and probably this is all that can be said with absolute confidence. The writer of these lines asked a very eminent geologist, "Is Evolution absolutely proved?" The reply was, "That would be going too far; but we may say that it is extremely probable. And I do not think we have got at the whole truth yet. There are probably other agencies to be discovered, and other facts yet to come out, of which as yet we know nothing." Mr. Darwin's first work rested the whole process upon Natural Selection; but he himself, in his later writings, acknowledged that this factor was insufficient to account for many of the known phenomena, and that the prominence he had given to it was "probably the greatest oversight" to be detected in his works. He latterly largely supplemented this factor by that of Sexual Selection, or the preference by either sex of a certain type in the other; and it is probable this has largely acted. Professor J. D. Dana attributes much to "Cephalization," or the growth of brain-power and co-ordination of structure therewith; and Mr. St. George Mivart, with most other naturalists, believes that we have yet to learn much of the laws which really have operated. Both this eminent naturalist,

Professor Asa Gray (the first botanist in America), Professor J. D. Dana (one of the foremost amongst geologists), and many others have shown that there is sufficient evidence of the action of a co-ordinating Intelligence, and of development along what Gray terms "facial lines." At times Mr. Darwin seems to have been impressed by the probability of this, whilst at others he holds different views.

It is obvious at the outset that the doctrine of Evolution is not in conflict with the first article of the Christian creed, that "God the Almighty is the Maker of heaven and earth." Christian men, holding this as a truth which nothing can shake, are not in conflict with any theory as to the method which the Creator pursued. This is obvious; but it may further be shown how the theory harmonises with the Christian belief in the unity of God, and of His purpose. (See the Charges of the Bishops of London and Carlisle bearing on this subject.) It may further be said, and has been said, that the narrative in Genesis is on its very face a narrative of Evolution, since it gives an account of the world and its inhabitants formed, not only by continuous stages, but by orderly and progressive stages. It has been seen and admitted by such a theologian as Haeckel; while, on the other hand, the 90th Psalm, ascribed for its author to "Moses, the man of God," evidently attributes to these stages vast periods. At most, the Creation narrative is concerned with the broad order of events as narrated; and concerning this point, or not it be insisted upon, it is not that Professor J. D. Dana, who since the death of Sir Charles Lyell stands in the very first rank of geological authorities, has anything as yet to shake his acceptance of the most profound "agreement" in all matters between Genesis and the results of the strata. Mr. Darwin's theory explains the beginning of things, the existence of any powers of modification, and their growth when once started on their course. As to the whence, and the final Object and Aim, science has not yet to tell. The beginning and the end—mystery.

But what shall we say concerning the origin of Man? The theory of Evolution gives an account for the origin of man as a development from the most complex ape. "There is a greater difference between the lowest form of monkey and a gorilla than there is between a gorilla and the lowest form of savage man," says a prominent follower of Mr. Darwin. That this part of the theory came into conflict with the received opinions of religious persons cannot be questioned. And concerning this portion of the theory we must speak with peculiar caution.

does not speak with certainty. which many biologists hold to as line is drawn between the beast and man; that there is it in man, to which there is no equivalent in any other creature. who shares with Mr. Darwin in discovering the law of Natural selection, that the body of man was formed by ordinary natural laws, but that his nature was imparted by a special act. This view is adopted in the evolution of a Catholic as Mr. St. John as well as by Professor Dana. Mr. Dana pointed out that the words which, rightly or wrongly, have been ascribed to direct Divine action are not in man's spiritual nature, the lower part of his nature concerning his body (e.g., "man in His own image;" "the Lord made man of the dust of the earth;" "God has been yet further pointed out on all the occasions for which the word is employed, or other phrases of it of God moved"), implying direct Divine action, are confined, such phrases are found to [1] the origin of matter; [2] the origin of motion, or energy; [3] the origin of life; and [4] the origin of the soul. These are precisely the four points at present confesses inability to deal with.

The coincidence is strangely close. It seems to leave all other methods, if required, for the secondary methods, which in not the least, the phraseology ("let there be light") seems to imply. Without, giving stress on these points, and turning ourselves to a more general view, the words of Bishop Temple furnish an answer to any who would attack evolution on the ground that it is in conflict with modern science. In the first chapter of Genesis the purpose, and adducing from the probabilities that the Lord used symbols in speaking of the origin of the world, goes on thus concerning the origin of man:—"When the writer of Genesis speaks of the origin of man from creation in general to the origin of man, it is still clear that he has not told those to whom he was speaking that the processes man was formed, that these processes lasted. This is far from his purpose as it would tell what every physiologist now knows of the processes by which every man is developed from a small embryo and living infant. He knew that he could not but take men—men, with their sinful nature, with their spiritual capacity, with their relations of family. In the essential supremacy of the features, the subordination in position but equality in nature of woman to man, the original declension of man's will from the Divine path, the dim and distant but sure hope of man's restoration. These are not and cannot be lessons of science. They are worked out into the allegory of the Garden of Eden, but in this allegory there is nothing whatever which crosses the path of science, nor is it for reasons of science that so many great Christian thinkers from the earliest age of the Church downwards have pronounced it an allegory. The spiritual truth contained in it is certainly the purpose for which it is told; and evolution, such as science has rendered probable, had done its work in forming man such as he is before the narrative begins. It may be said that it seems inconsistent with the dignity of man's nature as described in the Bible, to believe that his formation was effected by any process of evolution, still more by any such process of evolution as would represent him to have been an animal before he became a man. But in the first place it is to be observed that science does not yet assert, and there is no reason to believe that it ever will assert, that man became a fully developed animal with the brute instincts and inclinations, appetites and passions, fully formed in animals, such as we see other animals now, before he passed on into a man, such as man is now. His body may have been developed according to the theory of evolution, yet along a parallel but independent line of its own; but at any rate it branched off from other animals at a very early point in the descent of animal life. And further, as science cannot yet assert that life was not introduced into the world when made habitable by a direct creative act, so, too, science cannot yet assert, and it is tolerably certain will never assert, that the higher and added life, the spiritual faculty which is man's characteristic prerogative, was not given to man by a direct creative act as soon as the body which was to be the seat and the instrument of that spiritual faculty had been sufficiently developed to receive it. That the body should have been first prepared, and that when it was prepared the soul should either have been then given or then first made to live in the image of God—this is a supposition which is inconsistent neither with what the Bible tells nor with what science has up to this time proved" [Bampton Lectures, pp. 184-6].

2. Mental and Religious Evolution. The theory of physical life which we have been considering has been applied by analogy to the growth both of mental and religious phenomena. Mr. G. J. Romanes, in his Mental Evolution in Animals, gathers together a great number of facts by way of finding a physical basis of mind, and traces mental growth from consciousness, through the gradations of sensation, pleasure and pain, memory, association of ideas, perception, imagination, lower and higher instinct, to reason. But he expressly leaves the question alone "whether there is any distinction in kind between the whole mental organisation of an animal and the whole mental organisation of a man."

Mr. Herbert Spencer, in his Ecclesiastical Institutions, applies the evolution theory to religion, accounting for all religious belief as generated in men by evolution from early feelings of superstitious awe, leading in the first place to fetish worship. Professor Max Müller has shown, however, that if there be anything demonstrable in the history of religion, it appears to be that fetishism is a later and degraded phase of religious history wherever it can be traced. Professor Huxley [in the Nineteenth Century, March and April, 1886] takes a view similar to Mr. Spencer's of the "Evolution of Theology," urging that in the days of Samuel (as he dates those days) the religious views of the Jews were the same as held at the same time in other countries. This can, however, only be maintained by making vast assumptions, by simply ignoring the moral tone and character of the vast bulk of the narrative, and by fastening attention upon a few isolated fragments. On the other hand, that Revelation was itself progressive, and adapted to the then age of the world, no intelligent Christian doubts; and this is indeed stated in Scripture, and implied in the very advent of Christ at, and not until, the "fulness of time." As has been truly said, the Bible is very largely the "history of a Revelation," and while this may possibly have been given and continued in conformity with some general law, for all we can tell, the fact has to be accounted for that the teaching of this particular line of Revelation alone (supposing there to have been others) has always been in marked advance of contemporary human thought as interpreted by history.

The same system has been applied to morals, and it has been widely taught that marriage, for instance, slowly emerged from mere promiscuous intercourse, followed next by polyandry, and only finally by polygamy and true unions. It seems overlooked that such a history implies a moral "Fall" far beyond any recorded in Genesis, since many even of the lower animals, as well as the anthropoid apes, have risen far above the degradation here implied, which rests for proof solely upon the doubtful meaning of certain ancient customs and terms.

Ewald, GEORG HEINRICH AUGUST VON [b. 1803, d. 1875]. He was born at Göttingen, the son of a linen-weaver; at the age of seventeen he entered the University of his native place, where Eichhorn was then teaching. In 1823 he became a teacher in the Wolfenbüttel Gymnasium, and in 1827 was made Professor of Philosophy at Göttingen, and in 1835 Professor of Oriental languages. On Dec. 12th, 1837, he missed from his post on account of having signed, with six of his colleagues, a protest against the abolition of the old territorial law and liberty in Hanover by the new Sovereign, Ernest Augustus. He then visited England, and was called to be Theological Professor at Tübingen, where he remained for ten years, during which time he had many quarrels with his colleagues, and in 1848 he returned to Göttingen, where he remained till 1866, when his political feelings, and his refusal to take the oath of allegiance to the King of Prussia, caused him once more to lose his post. He was a most indefatigable lecturer and author, and only did he lecture at Tübingen as a guest, on Jewish and Arabic literature, and also Persian, Syriac, Coptic, and Greek. His authorship commenced as early as 1834, when he wrote a work on the composition of Genesis. Among his most important works are a Critical Grammar of Hebrew, a Commentary on the Canticles, a Commentary on the Apocryphal Books of the Old Testament, and a History of the People of Israel. His most important work was published between 1843 and 1854 in 7 vols., History of the People of Israel until the Time of Christ, Antiquities of the People of Israel, History of Christ, and History of the Apostolic Church. He also published many volumes of criticism. It is difficult to say which school of theologians he belongs to, as he is not precluded from being classed with any. He is, however, specially distinguished for his concrete forms of Divine truth, in opposition to the abstraction of over-general minds.

Ewing, ALEXANDER, Bishop of Aberdeen, and a divine of considerable influence in the nineteenth century, was born on March 26th 1803, at Aberdeen, where his father practised as a lawyer. Both parents died soon after his birth, and he was brought up by his mother, who had him educated at Aberdeen University and the University of Edinburgh. He married in 1828, and then went abroad for the sake of his health, which was never strong, and which prevented his taking orders till 1834. He was his strong repulsion to Calvinism, which led him to the Episcopal Church, and his preference for the Presbyterian. The Calvinistic Election, which he called the "Calvinistic doctrine of favouritism," was so odious to him, that he was never weary of repeating the phrase from the Church of England, "Christ has redeemed all mankind." He first ministered in the Episcopal Church in Forres, and was then elected to the Bishopric of Aberdeen. He was a very tall, thin man, with a striking face, wonderfully bright in manner, in the early part of his life, with long black locks, which at the

His theological position will nderstood when we say that a disciple of Macleod Campbell, Erskine of Linlathen, who, not a the usual Scottish conception he Sovereign of the universe, conception, begotten at a period nd confusion, when those who cottish polity clung most of all f a Supreme Governor, required mented, if not superseded, by n as the Father of mankind. was this doctrine which Ewing business to preach in his new was a difficult task that he had to take charge of a wide area in- ly by Presbyterians; there were, fair number of Episcopalians in l north of Argyllshire, and in tricts about Glencoe. physician's prescription," and that it ought to be "consigned to the charter chest as an old and curious heirloom." It is not to be wondered at that some of his brethren partially ostracised him, so that he eagerly sought opportunities of friendly relations with the Presbyterians. There is a glowing account of him, his catholicity of spirit, and earnestness of piety, in Dean Stanley's Lectures on the Church of Scotland. His life, for the reasons we have given, was, though a happy, yet a lonely one. He was often seen in his private chapel, buried in silent thought and prayer. One of his last addresses to his synod was described by a hearer as "a voice crying in the wilderness." His life had many personal sorrows, but he did not lose his cheerfulness, not even when bowed down with bodily pain. He frequently expressed the hope that his name might not be forgotten in Argyllshire, a touching sign of the love which he felt for his scattered flock. He died in 1873, surviving his friend Erskine by three years, and Macleod Campbell but one. An admirable biography has been written of him by his friend Dr. Ross.

Ex cathedrâ.—Lat. Ex, "from"; Gr. Kathedra, "a chair." A phrase used in speaking of authoritative decisions on matters of faith, or other matters, given by prelates in their official capacity. The Pope is held to be infallible when he gives his opinion "ex cathedrâ" concerning any doctrine to be believed by the whole Church of Rome.

Excommunication was in use among the heathens and Jews, as well as in the Christian Church. Among the Greeks and Romans the excommunicated were forbidden to be present at the sacrifices, and consigned to evil spirits with imprecations. But this was regarded as so terrible that it was seldom pronounced. Cæsar tells us that this was the severest punishment among the Gauls. Speaking of the authority of the Druids, he acquaints us, "That when anyone refuses to stand to their award, they bar him the privilege of being present at their religious ceremonies. Those who are thus thunder-struck are looked on as wicked and scandalous wretches; everybody shuns their company. If they have any occasion to commence a suit, they are not allowed the benefit of a court of justice. They are never admitted to posts of profit or honour; and all this infamy and disregard continues for life, and passes on their memory." When the excommunicated person repented, and desired forgiveness of the gods, he applied to the priests to be restored, and then, one of that order having first examined the case and found the delinquent sincere, restored him to his former condition of privilege. And when the excommunicated person happened to die unrestored, the priests offered a sacrifice to the Dii Mares, praying them not to use his soul roughly when he came amongst them.

In the Jewish Church excommunication was threefold in character:—[1] The casting-out of the synagogue for thirty days; [2] the "delivery to Satan"—a severer sentence than the former, being pronounced in the face of the whole congregation, and the minatory sentences of the Law read; [3] the Maranatha (i.e. "the Lord will come"), in which the person excommunicated was threatened with the Divine vengeance. The Samaritans were thus excommunicated. Traces of these forms may be seen in the language of the New Testament [1 Cor. v. 5; 1 Tim. i. 20; 1 Cor. xvi. 22], and those passages will guide us in understanding the purpose of the Church in exercising this solemn function. It was partly remedial, that the souls of the offenders "might be saved in the day of the Lord" [Church of England Communion Service]; partly for the warning of other offenders. In some cases those who were "put to open penance" were excluded from Communion for a time; in the case of apostates and impenitent sinners they were cut off from the Church altogether.

Canonists make two sorts of excommunication, the greater and the lesser. The greater excludes altogether from communion, disqualifies clergy from administering or receiving the sacraments, or performing any ecclesiastical functions whatever. The lesser deprives of receiving the Communion, but not from attending worship. Besides excommunication, the canonists mention two other kinds of censure, Suspension and the Interdict. Suspension bars an ecclesiastical person from the exercise of his office, and sometimes from the profit of his benefice; and that either for a set term or indefinitely. An Interdict is a censure which prohibits a Church the use of the sacraments, divine service, and Christian burial. Lastly, the canonists make several sorts of immoralities or impediments, which either disable persons from receiving holy orders, or exercising them when they have them.

The warrantable grounds for excommunication may be ranged under three heads—Heterodoxy, Immorality, and Disobedience; and according to the maxims and practice of the ancient Church, prelates should be very cautious and backward in launching their excommunications, and not do it without necessity and regret. In the first ages of the Church the spiritual sword was never drawn but upon spiritual occasions. But later Councils have excommunicated those who seize on the estates of the Church; and afterwards this censure has been discharged to force people to a discovery of their knowledge of private injuries. This, called a monitory, was frequently practised in the Middle Ages. It will thus be seen that the main effect of excommunication was to exclude offenders from

Christian society, to deprive them of the rights of divine services and the sacraments, and all other privileges of Church membership. An excommunicated person is looked upon no better than a pagan, or publican. Scripture speaks; but then this cannot make a man incur any civil disabilities. Whatever belongs to him as a man, as a father, a husband, or a king, by nature, of nations, or the Constitution of the country; whatever belongs to him as a member of any capacity or qualification, no reference to these things, remains. However, the Apostles exhorted them to break off correspondence with persons excommunicated, to avoid their company "receive them into their houses, and give them God speed" [2 John 10]. But the preterists interpreted the prohibition as referring only beyond necessary duties, forbidding familiarity but not charity. (See also a verse of the canonists),

"Os, orare, vale, Communio, mensa, i.e. it forbade conversation, prayer, communion, eating, but it allowed

"Utile, lex, humile, res ignorata, i.e. it allowed intercourse between husband and wife, and children, masters and servants."

The power by which popes have to deprive kings by virtue of an excommunication was unknown in early times, first claimed with disastrous consequences by Gregory VII. It came to pass in time that a man dying excommunicated refused burial in a consecrated place, and the clergy prayed for his soul. In the case that men have been excommunicated after their deaths. This was done by striking their names from the list of those commemorated at the Eucharist.

Exedrae.—The general name for the buildings as were distinct from the churches, and yet within the precincts of the Church taken in its largest sense. Eusebius, speaking of the church of Tyre, says, "When the emperor finished his famous structure with a colonnade, he set himself about the exedrae, or banqueting-rooms, and joined one to another by the ambulae of the church." Also he speaks of the junction with æci, rooms for council, "he provided spacious exedrae and ambulae, side, united and attached to the ambulae and communicating with the entrance in the middle of the temple." Among the chief was the baptistery, for baptism. Also the two vestries, as we should call them, still in use in the Oriental churches; viz., the Diakonikon in the sacred utensils, etc., were the Prothesis, where the side-table was placed [Jebb].

Exemption.—A privilege granted to churches or monasteries, whereby they are exempt from the jurisdiction of the bishops in whose dioceses they are situated. While it frees persons from the operation of a law, exemption frees them from the authority of certain persons. Religious houses are exempt from the rule of the bishop and subject to the Pope alone.

Exeter.—Until the year 703 the southern part of the island from Kent to the borders of Wales was under the Bishops of Wessex, but in that year it was divided into two, and the western half was fixed at Sherborne. A hundred years later it was necessary to the large increase of converts, further subdivisions, and Cornwall and Devonshire became two separate dioceses. Cornwall was first fixed at Bodmin, and Devon at Exeter. The See of Devon was fixed at Crediton, Aidulf being its first bishop. There were nine bishops of Devon, and Leofric, the last of them, moved the See to Exeter, and the See of St. Germans to it by order of Edward the Confessor. He himself was present at the consecration of the cathedral in 1060, at St. Peter's Church, which had been chosen for that purpose. The Sees of Cornwall and Devon remained united until 1877, when the latter was founded.

The cathedral of St. Peter was founded in the twelfth century by Benedictine monks; but the building had suffered much from the Danes in the tenth and eleventh centuries. Leofric, the last of the Saxon bishops, had been a great benefactor of the cathedral, but of this Saxon church, except a small part of the site of the old bed-rm, no vestige remains. The history of the Church of Exeter assigns the foundation of the cathedral to Warelwast, a nephew of the Confessor, who became bishop in 1107, the rebuilding of the cathedral. Of that building we have remaining the north and south transepts, forming the transepts of the present church, and some traces in the east end. The east door leading into the cathedral was laid the foundation in 1206, in the reign of Henry III. Six bishops have been cathedrals, and during the siege by King Stephen, in 1136, it was destroyed.

In the thirteenth century were built the chapter-house in the thirteenth century. To him are attributed the unique sculptures, probably the work of the kingdom. Bishop Peter Quibben began the transformation of the cathedral to the Decorated style, and died in the last year of Bishop Quibben (1369), leaving it, except in a few details, much as it stands at present. In 1870 a complete restoration was commenced under the care of Sir Gilbert Scott. The income of the See is £4,200. The cathedral chapter consists of the dean, four canons residentiary, three archdeacons, twenty-four prebendaries, and four priest-vicars.

Exhortation.—An address made to move people to the due performance of their duty. There are several of these in the Church Service, but the one which begins Morning and Evening Prayer, "Dearly beloved brethren, the Scripture moveth us in sundry places," is by way of pre-eminence called The Exhortation. It grasps the whole idea of worship—[1] thanksgiving and praise, [2] hearing God's Word, [3] prayer as preparatory to the Confession of sin and the Absolution. Other exhortations occur in most of the principal services of the Church.

Exorcists.—The second in rank of the lesser Orders of the Church, whose business it was to exorcise or cast out the evil spirits from persons possessed, i.e. demoniacs. In the Apostolic age the power of exorcising was a miraculous gift of the Holy Ghost given to many Christians; but for the first three centuries the bishops and presbyters were the usual exorcists. When this miraculous gift was withdrawn from the Church, then the special office of exorcists was instituted. The Greek Church does not reckon them as an ecclesiastical Order at all. In the Latin Church they are mentioned in the Canons of Antioch [341] as one of the lesser Orders; they stand next to the acolythi, or servers: the ceremonies of their ordination are inserted in the ancient rituals. They received a book of exorcisms from the bishop, who pronounced these words:—"Take this book and get it by heart, and have authority to lay hands upon catechumens and baptised persons possessed." This form was concluded with a particular benediction upon the exorcist. The Jews had their exorcists (many of them impostors), as we may learn from the Gospels, from the Acts, and Josephus. Justin Martyr, in his Dialogue with Trypho, charges the Jews with superstitious practices in their exorcisms, and that they made use of perfumes and ligatures like the heathen. Hence we may conclude that exorcising was practised among the heathen; and Lucian bears witness that such was the case. In one sense every man is his own exorcist, in that, by his prayers, he may resist and drive away evil spirits.

Expectation Week.—The week before Whitsuntide, so called in memory of the Apostles' waiting for the promised Comforter after the Lord's Ascension. The Sunday between the two events has been strikingly called "the Sunday without Christ" (W. Page Roberts). The Church services for this week are specially solemn in tone, as seeming to ring out the Church's Expectation for the perfect comfort which is still to come. The Collect prays for the gift of the Holy Spirit to comfort us who are orphaned (this is the real force of the original word in John xiv. 18, translated "comfortless"), the Epistle is taken from St. Peter, "the Apostle of Hope," as Archbishop Trench happily designates him, and speaks of the end of all things at hand, as it practically is to each one of us, and exhorts to sobriety, devotion, charity, practical usefulness. The Gospel is part of our Lord's parting address to His disciples, an exhortation to the Church to patient waiting.

Expiation. [WORK OF CHRIST.]

Extreme Unction.—The ceremony of anointing the sick with oil, practised by the Romish Church. Of Extreme Unction, the Romish Council of Trent asserts, "The holy unction of the sick was instituted by our Lord Jesus Christ, as truly and properly a sacrament of the New Testament, as is implied indeed in St. Mark; but commended and declared to the faithful by James the Apostle and brother of the Lord (James v. 14, 15). 'Is any sick among you? Let him call for the elders of the Church, and let them pray over him, anointing him with oil in the name of the Lord; and the prayer of faith shall save the sick, and the Lord him up, and if he have committed shall be forgiven him.' From what as the Church hath learned from tradition handed down, she teaches form, proper minister, and effect of some sacrament; for the Church stood that the matter is oil blessed by the bishop, for unction most aptly receives grace of the Holy Spirit wherewith of the sick man is invisibly anointed that the form consists in these words: 'this anointing, etc.'" Four canons by the Council on this subject:—

"1. If any shall say that Extreme Unction is not truly or properly a sacrament instituted by our Lord Jesus Christ, and declared by the blessed Apostle James, but only received from the Fathers, or a human tradition; let him be accursed.

"2. If any shall say that the anointing of the sick does not confer remission of sins, nor relieve the sick, but has ceased, as if it were formerly only of healing; let him be accursed.

"3. If any shall say that the usage of Extreme Unction, which the Roman Church observes, is contrary to the sentence of the blessed Apostle James, therefore should be changed, and despised by Christians without sin; let him be accursed.

"4. If any shall say that the anointing of the sick, whom St. James calls for, is not to be called for the anointing of the sick, but of the priests ordained by the bishops, in any age in any community; and that the priest is not the only proper minister of extreme unction; let him be accursed.

Oil was an ordinary means of healing among the Jews, but there is no proof in Scripture that the custom of anointing was to be continued in the Church. The ceremony of Extreme Unction as now practised by the Roman Church dates back only to the twelfth century. They no longer anoint the sick person with a view to his recovery of body, but this sacrament, as they call it, is only administered to those approaching death, extremis, as the last of all religious duties. Extreme unction is performed on the forehead and hands, and by His most merciful promise may the Lord forgive thee what thou hast committed by sight, and by hearing, etc. Extreme unction is administered after the Viaticum. The Article of the Anglican Church declares that the Lord's Supper to be one of the sacraments ordained by Christ, and that the five other sacraments of the Church of Rome, amongst them Extreme Unction, says they "are not to be received for sacraments of the Gospel, but have grown partly of the corruption of the Apostles."

FREDERICK WILLIAM, D.D. [b. 43], a distinguished divine and agnot family, educated in the England, of which his father was joined the Roman Catholic Church. He was a graduate of Balliol College, where he was a friend of the shop Tass and F. Oakeley, became university, and was ordained. Like many spirits of the Oxford of fall under the influence of J. H. though he had left Oxford during sent of the Tracts for the Times. became rector of Elton, in Huntingdon, and during that time wrote a full poem in blank verse, entitled Light, describing the movement of a light towards the light, and evidently to describe his own movement out of the infallible Church. His works published at that time were Syrian Lake and The Chervell, and he also wrote Sights and Foreign Churches, the outcome of travel on the Continent with a view to becoming a Roman Catholic, he went to Italy, and returning founded a religious society at Birkenhead. In 1849 he became the head of the Oratory, and there remained till 1864. Some of his hymns have gone to the rank, and are known all over the world. Secret Service, bless us ere we go; my soul; O come and mourn with O Paradise, etc. His prose works will not live, but the hymns we think that he had true poetic instinct

GEORGE STANLEY, D.D., uncle of the late [1773-1864], a distinguished member of the Evangelical school, author of the Bampton Lectures for 1801; of Romanism, Sacred Calendar of the Church. He was a prebendary of Salisbury.

St. Peter, Bishop of Rome, succeeded in the year 236, and was martyred on Jan. 20th, 250. There is a legend that the brethren were assembled to elect a Pope, a dove settled on the head of a man who was a layman just come to Rome, thus he was elected. Very little is known of him, but he is said to have caused the martyrdom of Pritanus, the predecessor of whom he had been martyred in Sardinia, and to have been buried in the Appian Way, in which he is afterwards interred. Three miracles are attributed to him.

F.—A faculty is a legal instrument issued in the court of the chancellor of the diocese, by which the Ordinary gives his sanction for various purposes. In cases where it is desired to make any alteration in the structure or ornaments of a parish church, the law requires that a faculty be obtained before such alteration is taken in hand. The procedure is as follows:—the rector and churchwardens of the parish petition the court of the chancellor of the diocese to issue a faculty, they presenting at the same time plans of the intended alterations. A copy of this petition must be affixed to the church doors to give due notice to all concerned of the intended alterations. Any parishioner may appear before the court to oppose the issue of a faculty. The chancellor, having heard the case and examined the plans submitted, gives his decision. Appeal lies from this court to the Court of Arches, and thence to the Privy Council. But it was laid down, in the case of Woolcombe v. Ouldrige, that the superior court is very reluctant to interfere with the inferior court in the matter of faculties; however, in the case of the church of St. Mary-at-Hill, in the city of London, Lord Penance, on appeal, revoked the faculty granted to the rector and churchwardens by the chancellor of the diocese for reseating their parish church. In one case the court ordered a confirmatory faculty to be issued, sanctioning the alterations that had been illegally carried out, the archdeacon having first notified to the court his approval of the said alterations. In the case of an ornament having been introduced without a faculty, such ornament cannot be legally removed without a faculty. A clerk in holy orders may be proceeded against criminally for making alterations without a faculty, but, as Sir R. Phillimore says, "such a course is inexpedient." Faculties are not granted unless there is ample security that the necessary funds will be forthcoming. Faculties are also issued to allow the churchwardens to sell church furniture and utensils when no longer necessary, as, for example, when they have been replaced by new articles. A faculty may also be issued for admitting a person into the diaconate before the age of twenty-three. In this case the faculty, as it seems, must be issued by the Archbishop of Canterbury [Phillimore]; but in no case is a faculty issued for admittance to the priesthood before the legal age of twenty-four. Faculties have been also issued for appropriating pews and seats to certain individuals, but these are very sparingly issued, and only in very exceptional cases. A faculty once granted is irrevocable, unless it can be proved that it was obtained by "surprise and undue connivance." Faculties are required also for building vaults, erecting monuments, for removal of bodies, and for altering churchyards, or building thereon vestries or schools. The stamp duty on a faculty is ten shillings, and the necessary fees payable into court amount to five guineas.

Pagius, PAUL, an eminent Protestant minister and Hebrew scholar, was born at Rheinsabern in 1504. He studied at Heidelberg and Strasburg, in the latter town under Elias Levita. In 1537 he was appointed head of a school at Isny, where he remained six years, at the end of which time he returned to Strasburg as Hebrew professor and preacher. But when the INTERIM [q.v.] was introduced into Strasburg, Pagius, at the invitation of Archbishop Cranmer, came to England, and became Professor of Hebrew at Cambridge, where he died in the same year [1549]. During the reign of Queen Mary his body was dug up and burnt. He translated a great many Latin works into Hebrew, as Thibites Ebraice, Tobias Hebraice, Sententia sapientium Hebraeorum, Annotaciones in Targum, and Isagoge in linguam Hebraicam.

Fairbairn, PATRICK [1805-74], one of the founders of the Free Church of Scotland, Professor of New Testament Exegesis in the Free Church Theological College at Glasgow. He was the author of several theological works, of which the principal are.—The Typology of Scripture [2 vols., 1847], Ezekiel and his Prophecies, The Pastoral Epistles, and a Treatise on Pastoral Theology, published posthumously, with a biographical preface.

Faith.—This word is used in Holy Scriptures in several different senses, springing out of its primary signification of "trust." It sometimes denotes merely the assent of the intellect to the credibility of this or that assertion, as in the Epistle of St. James, where faith without works is regarded as equivalent to the unproductive assent of the understanding to a truth set before it. It is also used of simple trust and confidence in a person, as, e.g., with regard to the Apostles' fears of shipwreck [Matt. viii. 26], "Why are ye fearful, oh ye of little faith?" and in the case of St. Peter walking on the water [xiv. 31], "Oh thou of little faith, wherefore didst thou doubt?" The same Greek word is used in Acts xvii. 31 of the assurance given by one person to another. "Whereof He hath given assurance unto all men, in that He hath raised Him from the dead." Akin to this is its usage for "good faith," "faithfulness," as in the enumeration of the weightier matters of the law, judgment, mercy, and faith, Matt. xxiii. 23, and Gal. v. 22, where faith, in the list of the fruits of the Spirit, seems to mean "trustworthiness," though possibly it may rather signify "trustfulness," "willingness to trust others." [See also Rom. iii. 3; Tit. ii. 10.]

But its most frequent use is to express the exercise of that faculty of the soul by which it embraces the promises of God and the revelation of His will, and that especially with regard to the Person, sufferings, and mediatorial work of our Lord Jesus Christ. It is in this sense of the word that the acts of the worthies of old time are said to have been wrought by faith believing that what God had He was able to perform. Of a was the faith of those who blessings of healing, whether or for others, from our Lord as Take, for, example out of num the faith of the blind men Matt. ix. 28, 29: "Jesus said Believe ye that I am able to do said unto Him, Yea, Lord. But the highest object of Person of Jesus Christ, His mediation; and its highest being "the hand by which we to take the blessings God's in the death and risen life Saviour. "Justifying faith termed, is no more assent to th of the Crucifixion, not even apprehension that Christ's de perfect, and sufficient sacrifice the whole world; it has to do and the affections, as well as standing: "with the heart unto righteousness" [Rom. productive of results [James ii its fruits are—works of love [wisdom [2 Tim. iii. 15]; vi world [1 John v. 4]. There remains for notice on the word: when, generally prefixed, it signifies the best most surely believed among equivalent to the Christian St. Jude [v. 3] exhorts th contend earnestly for the faith to the saints; St. Paul pr which once he destroyed [warns Timothy that in the) shall depart from the faith, as

In Gal. iii. 23 either the word used in two different significations, or ought to be prefixed to the word stance. In Gal. vi. 10 Christians are servants of the faith; and there are other instances. In Eph. iv. 5 it is about the article: "One Lord, one baptism."

Faithful Men.—This title is given in the 19th Article of the Church of England to a member of the Church. It was the old expression in early times for all who had been baptised, and signified that just as the church is called "holy," as signifying God's intention with regard to the faithfulness required of each member, so proper and consistent character. The expression soon became restricted to those persons who were in full communion, distinguished from Catechumens, and it was generally applied only to those who were admitted to the Holy Communion, and to join in the Lord's Prayer, as well as to hear and receive the profounder doctrines of the church. Here the catechumens only heard plain morals and daily duty. The expressions, "perfect" and "enlightened" in 1 Cor. ii. 6, and Heb. vi. 4, have the same meaning.

Faith-healing.—The name given to a movement of recent origin. It has arisen in the Swiss village of Airolo, where Dorothea Trudel, a woman of artificial flowers, between the years 1840 and 1850, is said to have effected wonderful healings by the power of prayer, resting her hands on the heads of the afflicted. James v. 14. A similar movement sprang up almost simultaneously in the Black Forest, where Pastor Blumhardt, an able minister, had a number of cases had sprung up in his neighbourhood, not unlike demoniacal possession.

His prayers over them, he tells us, were answered by cures, and he goes on to say, "Everything concerning illnesses in my neighbourhood has now to be changed. Seldom did a cure appear in it. The people would not believe. The general state of health was bad." Blumhardt died in 1880, aged 65; Dorothea Trudel died of typhus at the age of forty-eight. Both of them lived in small houses in which their practice was carried on. Sweden and America have many nursing homes of this movement, spread from the latter into England. There are centres in London, Brighton, Liverpool, and elsewhere, which are called Beth-houses of security). The head of the movement presided over by an American named Boardman. Meetings are held every Wednesday, open to any one. Some of the literature connected with this movement is very objectionable, some merely foolish. None of it, however, is very remarkable. There have been already signs of disagreement among the devotees, as to the nature of the cure, whether miraculous or not; as to the means, whether oil should be used; and as to the name, whether it should be called faith-healing or Divine healing. The best accounts of the movement are published by Messrs. Morgan and Scott.

Faith, St., VIRGIN AND MARTYR (Oct. 6th), suffered under the Diocletian persecution. Although nothing more is known of her, yet, most likely on account of her significant name, many churches in England have been dedicated to her. She is commonly represented in art with sword and gridiron, or resting on an iron bed, with a bundle of rods in her hand.

Fakirs.—A sect of Dervishes or wandering Mahometans, who live on alms. When they enter a town they each blow a hunting-horn, and then some go and beg for the rest, distribute what they receive equally among the whole company, and if anything remains, give it to the poor, leaving nothing for the next day. Some maintain that they are privileged to commit acts which would be considered wicked in other people, and therefore give themselves to all sorts of impurities. They have chiefs, who give audience to the people, while their disciples recite their virtues and favours from God. Sometimes one chief has as many as two hundred disciples, and they have a standard, and lances and other weapons. There is a third kind, the children of poor people, who retire into mosques to study the law in order to become Moulas, or doctors. There are also Penitent Fakirs, who always maintain a certain position, sometimes during their whole lives, as holding their hands across over their heads, or turning them behind them. They have other Fakirs to serve them with necessaries. There are said to be about two million Fakirs in India. The term is, however, often employed there to describe a religious mendicant of any faith.

Faldstool.—This word comes from the German falzen, "to fold"; and stuhl, "a chair"; and designates a portable folding chair, like our camp-stools. Formerly a bishop used sometimes to take such a chair with him, or one used to be placed for him in the choir when he went to officiate in any church not his own cathedral. The name is now commonly, though incorrectly, applied to the "Litany stool."

Falk Laws, THE.—So called after the Prussian Minister, Falk, who, in 1872, received the supervision of ecclesiastical and educational affairs. After the promulgation of the dogma of Papal Infallibility by Pius IX. in 1870, the Roman Catholic Church began to extend its interference over the temporal affairs of the countries of Europe. In Germany the matter took something of the form of the struggle between William Rufus and the Pope concerning Anselm—Had the Pope or the King the power to appoint and set down the bishops? In the case of Germany, the Roman Catholic Church deprived a number of clergy and teachers of their offices, whereupon the Prussian Government, in order to counteract this, passed in May, 1873, a law for the inspection of schools, by which all schools in Prussia, Roman Catholic as well as Protestant, were placed under the direct superintendence of the State magistrates. In July of the same year the Jesuits were expelled from Germany, the Government considering that the setting up of the Infallibility of the Pope was due in a great measure to their influence. In order to establish a definite division between the spiritual and temporal powers, the so-called "Laws of the Church" were passed, whose chief aim was to curtail the powers of the Roman Catholic clergy, especially with regard to the imposition of penances, etc., and to provide for their training and education, which up to this time had been carried on by the Jesuitical schools. By the same laws a royal court of justice was formed for the management of ecclesiastical affairs, and arrangements were made for the abolition of the convents, to be carried out if necessary. At the same time the Protestant Church received a firmer organisation, and the laity were given a stronger voice in Church government. A proclamation issued in September, 1873, announced that a system of synods, parochial and provincial, was in the course of formation, which would include Protestant and Roman Catholic representatives, all of which would be subject to the High Clerical Council, under the presidency of the Kultur-Minister, Falk. The whole question caused great excitement and bitterness in Germany. In the course of the quarrel—the Kulturkampf, as it is generally called—the Pope appointed Ledochowski to the See of Posen. Prussia did not approve, and absolutely refused to allow him to take possession, Bismarck exclaiming, "Wir wollen nicht nach Canossa gehen" ("We will not go to Canossa"), referring to the struggle between Henry IV. and Gregory VII., and the humiliation imposed on the former. Ledochowski was for many years without employment, until the Pope made him a cardinal and gave him a post in the Vatican. The German Chancellor certainly never anticipated so stubborn a resistance as he found, and on the death of Pope Pius IX., in 1878, a hope of reconciliation appeared. Bismarck took the opportunity of saying publicly that the new Pope, Leo XIII., was "a wise, moderate, and pacific gentleman," that he was "not a Guelph, nor a Pole, nor a Liberalist, nor had anything to do with Social Democrats." Negotiations have slowly continued. A having arisen in 1885 between Spain relative to the Caracmarck arranged that the invited to arbitrate between and on the other hand it v much remark in the German when on this occasion the invited to the foreign ambassadors members of the Church, Leo invited. At length, in April, the dispute was ended by a compromise. The German State victory over the Roman Church in this battle had come to rest largely of the Anzeigepflicht, i.e. the obligation which the State devolved on the bishop of the transference to a new duty. This is yet to be seen whilst the objects intended are being done. In education the concessions conceded by Bismarck, and the kernel of the "May Law" of 1879. There is one other law which is due to Falk, and which has done much evil to the Church—it declared the civil contract necessary to make marriages valid. Children can be baptised even if their parents were married by a civil ceremony, especially in the large

Fall of Man. [ORIGINAL]

False Apostles.—Such as are mentioned in 2 Cor. xi. 13: appeared, had seen, or pretended to have seen, and made their claim to be based on the ground. These were the Jesuits. The text also alludes to those who were in the world and carried with them the Gospel. In his case the Gnostics, forming sects which were in one form or another recognised by the nation. These must be the same as he elsewhere calls Antichrists. The distinction between "False Christs." The last of the Christian Church, the form of which was even; the one opposed to the other schismatical members.

False Christs.—The distinctive characteristic of both as an historical fact and as a doctrine, was (as it ever will be) the notion of God. There was not of at all an analogous kind of some resemblances to it in heathen mythology, it may be said whether the resemblance to the heathen mind, it is as if men having a natural bent towards them in the religious Jews believed further in and acts, as He had made then added to their natural (seeded it by) a system of which the One God was by imitations set up in His ty, on the other hand, went on declaring that there lived

Who had lived upon earth years, seen by a few—but a world's inhabitants; that Himself; that all religions to converge towards His one wilfully rejecting the and was rejecting the only only system, which could, and make him acceptable in hope for the future that gave. Thus the claim was

Christ, sprung from an an obscure nation, living anying the death of a criminal, and as the personal centre of hole world; and this claim in such a comprehensive alification whatever of the possible. The first attack inst the bare facts on which theory was grounded. The at Christ was a mere man, as ordinary men die, and since happened to show that an ordinary man. Hence sent forth into the world as fundamental facts of Christ to the fact that Christ's rrection from the dead on er His Crucifixion, and His into heaven, proved Him an, but God; and, as it was that the facts could not be attempt to disprove them en up.

"And he," says Josephus, "was only one of many like him, who arose about that time to mislead the people."

Among such false claimants to a Divine mission were also Simon Magus, Menander, and Dositheus, of whom the first seems to be the type, as he was also the first in order of time. He was born a Samaritan, as were the other two, but educated in Egypt, probably at Alexandria, where he became imbued with the subtle metaphysics of Oriental philosophy. He gave out that he was the "great power of God," not denying altogether the Divine nature of the Lord Jesus, but claiming a still nearer place to the Godhead. Tradition declares that he was able to work miracles, and his name of "the Magian" probably indicates as much. Of his conflict with St. Peter at Samaria an account is given in Acts viii. 8—24; and an account is given by ecclesiastical historians of a still later encounter at Rome. By these it is said that Simon had carried his imitation of Christ so far that, at last, he promised his disciples he would ascend to heaven in their sight from the Capitol, and fixed a day for the miracle. St. Peter prayed to God that he would defeat the supernatural devices of Satan, and after Simon had risen a short distance from the earth, he fell down and was killed. Of Menander little is recorded, but it is distinctly said of Dositheus that he claimed to be the Messiah, and that the high priest of the Jews endeavouring to apprehend him in consequence, he fled to a cave, and there miserably perished. Claiming a Divine origin, and Divine authority, and supporting his claim by the exercise of preternatural power, Simon Magus was the type of those "false Christs" who tried to suppress the religion of the true one, standing in some similar relation to Christ as that which was held towards Moses by the Egyptian magicians. [SIMONIANS.]

Familiars. [INQUISITION.]

Familists or "Family of Love."—A sect which arose in the Netherlands in the middle of the sixteenth century. It was founded by an Anabaptist, named Henry Nicholas, a native of Amsterdam, who had become implicated in the insurrections, and fled to Emden in 1533. From thence he came to England during the reign of Edward VI., and in 1555 he started this sect. Their tenets were that there is no true knowledge of Christ except in their community, and that as Moses is the prophet of hope, and Christ the prophet of faith, so is Henry Nicholas the prophet of love. They were extreme Antinomians, and immorality was very common among them. This sect is often confused with that of David Joris [JORIS, DAVID], who was a Dutch Anabaptist, with whom Nicholas was intimate. The sect was at first popular in England, but they soon began to be considered dangerous, both to civil order and to morality and religion, so in 1660 Queen Elizabeth ordered an investigation into the matter, which resulted in the proclamation issued "against the sectaries of the Family of Love." Severe measures were also taken against them under James I., and the sect disappeared.

Fanaticism, Fanatics [Lat. fanum, "temple"].—A fanatic was originally one who spent his time in assisting in the services of the temples, so as to cut himself off from all worldly employments. The name is now applied to one whose zeal in religious matters is allowed to outrun his judgment, and who works himself into a state of excitement which he believes will be pleasing to God. As a rule, fanaticism is a kind of monomania, produced by a diseased imagination. In ancient times the diviners of oracles were known as fanatics.

Farol, GUILLAUME, born in 1489 at Gap, in Dauphiné. He studied in Paris, and became professor in the college of Cardinal le Moine. In 1521 he was invited to Meaux by the Bishop Briçonnet, but was expelled thence with other Reformers two years later, and went to Basel, where he was welcomed by Oecolampadius. Here a similar fate awaited him, probably brought about by Erasmus, and he went to Strasbourg, and afterwards to Switzerland. At Zurich he made the acquaintance of Zwingli, and travelled in various parts, preaching the doctrines of the Reformation, which he established at Geneva in 1532. Calvin settled there three years later, and both were expelled in 1538. Farol preached subsequently at Neuchâtel, Môt, and Gorze, in which latter place he and his followers were attacked in 1543 by the troops of the Cardinal of Lorraine. Farol fled in disguise to Mompelgardt, where he carried on his labours. He also preached the Reformed doctrines at his native town, Gap. He died at Neuchâtel, Sept. 13th, 1565. He was the author of many theological works.

Farmer, HENRY [b. 1714, d. 1787].—A learned Dissenting minister, for forty years at Walthamstow, and in the latter part of his life a lecturer in the City of London. His writings display great originality of thought, as well as learning. The principal are three treatises on [1] Our Lord's Temptation, in which he contends that that event was internal and subjective; [2] on the New Testament Demoniacs, holding that these were persons afflicted with mental and physical diseases; [3] On Miracles, contending that they are absolute arguments of a Divine interposition.

Farnovians.—The followers of Stanislaus Farnovius or Farnowski (died 1615), a Pole, who separated from the Lutherans in consequence of his Arian opinions, though he declared that Jesus ought to be worshipped. His followers, however, became more and more rationalistic, and finally the Divinity of Christ. [Socruiana.]

Farrar, ROBERT, Bishop of St. I. one of the Protestant martyrs, was born in Yorkshire, in the reign of Henry. He received the first part of his education at Cambridge, but removed to Oxford, and made a canon of St. Mary's College, was then in high repute, because Farrar studied there. Farrar took his degrees in 1526 and 1533. In 1538 he became Bishop Barlow, who was sent by Henry as Ambassador to Scotland. He was afterwards chosen prior of the monastery Oswald's, in Yorkshire, which he surrendered to the commissioners at the time of its dissolution in 1540, and had a pension of him of £100 per annum, which he received on his promotion to the See of St. I. He was one of the first persons in the university of Oxford to embrace Protestantism; this was mainly through the influence of the Rev. Thomas Garrol, of All Saints, Honey Lane, London, who, an active promoter of the doctrine of the Reformation, was afterwards at Smithfield, in 1541. Dr. Farrar, one of Cranmer's chaplains, and following example in marrying, this was alleged crime against him by his enemies in time. He was esteemed one of the preachers of his day, and in April, 1541, appointed one of a body of visiting preachers sent throughout the kingdom by royal authority for the better reformation of religion. He was made Chaplain to the Duke of Somerset, and appointed to the Bishopric of St. I. he was consecrated Sept. 9th, 1542, by Ridley, Bishop of Rochester, Bishop of Lincoln, in the bishop's chapel at Chertsey. His first bishop consecrated on the institution of the Sovereign. Troubles on the very entrance of his bishopric. Young, the precentor, and Rowland one of the canons, had been appointed commissioners during the vacancy of the See, they had taken advantage of this to strip the cathedral of its ornaments, and to appropriate to their use the money gained by the sale of the property they had also put the episcopal grants without the King's assent. On the bishop hearing of this, issued to his chancellor, for visiting as well as the rest of the diocese, drew up the commission in which did not sufficiently express the King's supremacy, and this was taken advantage of by the precentor, who was the subject only to disobey the commission. The Bishop of criminally dis-authority in opposition to the consequence of these proceedings, as first obliged to go to London on these accusations, which consisted of charges, most of them ex- lous as well as malicious; then on the assizes at Caermarthen, and taken back to London and im- the Tower. nounce the definite sentence against him, as a heretic excommunicated, to be degraded from the priesthood, and delivered over to the secular power to be put to death by burning in the fire. On Saturday, May 30th, 1555, the sentence was put in execution in the market-place of Caermarthen, the Bishop sustaining the torments of the fire with wonder- ful constancy and patience.

Parse.—The term used for the vernacu- lar amplification read between the verses of the Epistles and Gospels, which were read in Latin, and then each verse was paraphrased for the benefit of the unlearned.

Fast.—Strictly speaking, this signifies total abstinence from food and drink for any given period ; but the word is commonly used to signify abstinence from particular kinds of food, particularly flesh meat, and some- times it expresses abstinence from certain pleasures not unlawful—in a word, self-restraint.

Fasting was practised by the heathens of old, and also by the Jews. The latter, in- deed, had only one fast in the year prescribed by the Law [See Lev. xvi. 29–34], but there are many voluntary fastings mentioned in the course of the sacred history. In the days of our Lord there was much fasting. There is no record of His having commanded it, but in the Sermon on the Mount He assumes the practice, and we know that the Apostles used it [Acts xiii. 2–3; xiv. 23; xxvii. 9; 2 Cor. vi. 5; xi. 27]. But the absence of express Scriptural commands on the subject has ruled Anglican practice so far as this, that the Church of England has not laid down set rules such as are laid down by the Roman Catholic Church. Consequently, while the English Prayer Book notes ex- pressly what are “days of fasting or abstin- ence,” there are no directions at all what food may or may not be eaten, but the matter is left to the discretion of individual consciences. [See the Homily on Fasting.] In the reign of Elizabeth eating of flesh on fish days (i.e. Wed- nesdays, Fridays, and Saturdays) was forbidden by statute. It is very common in old parish registers to find an entry that “A. B. re- ceived a licence to eat flesh in Lent.” The contention that fasting is advantageous in respect to bodily health is probably to a great extent true in particular circumstances. How far it is also advantageous as an aid to devo- tional feeling is a question which is much discussed by Protestant theologians. While many contend that it is a great help to self- discipline, others maintain that habitual temperance is far more beneficial; that mortification beyond this has a tendency to disturb the healthy relation between body and mind, and to excite the imagination. But the setting aside of seasons like Lent for self-examination and special prayer has the sanction of past ages, and the example of some of the holiest of men. That such an observance of seasons has been common among members of the Church needs no proof, and there have been also Nonconformist writers—like Doddridge, for example—who have borne testimony to its usefulness. The following vigorous protest against the too frequent neglect of fasts is from a well-known member of what is known as the “High Church” school in the Anglican Church:—

“The Church of England has appointed two-sevenths of the year as days of Fasting or Abstinence, but their widespread neglect is a reminder of Prince Bismarck’s saying, ‘Britannia metal is to say one thing and do another.’ The Ember Days are well-nigh forgotten. The close connection pointed out by our Lord between prayer and fasting, if evil spirits are to be cast out, was forgotten when the Day of Intercession for missions to the heathen, originally appointed in 1872 on an Ember Day, was moved to the Feast of St. Andrew in the following year, though by the recent change to St. Andrew’s Eve we have been, though too apologetically, reminded of that connection. Many individual efforts have indeed been made during the past fifty years to remind Church people of the duty of fasting. Archbishop Longley once refused an invitation to dine at Court on a Friday. Bishop Hamilton religiously observed the Ember Days. The present Archbishop of Canterbury and Bishop of London have more than once pleaded for the observance of the Ember Seasons, pointing out their suitability for intercession for the home and foreign missionary work of the Church. The late Archdeacon Freeman, as examining chaplain to the Bishop of Exeter, used to urge upon candidates for ordination the practice of refusing all invitations on Fridays, saying how he and his family had done this for years, and had found the benefit of having one quiet week-day for religious uses. But these witnesses have been too few. There are fewer clerical dinner parties on Friday than there were; but many clergymen who call themselves High Churchmen have no scruple in going to tennis parties, or balls, or giving school-treats on that day. One of the chief contributions of Dr. Pusey to the Tracts for the Times were his tracts on Fasting Nos. 18 and 66. In the second of these he points out that retirement from social enjoyment is a part of fasting, and that fasting is a most important part of spiritual discipline. As to vigils, fasts, and days of abstinence, his judgment is, that the English Church does not mark any difference between them; and he counsels generally such an amount of self-denial in all matters as each individual can bear, avoiding ostentation and censoriousness, though not being ashamed to confess by his acts his obedience to the Church. During these thirty years High Churchmanship has become in a measure popular; but the same spirit of discipline, of humble thoughtful resolution, that there was forty years ago? There have been of extravagance, and we have learnt full caution, that while fasting is intended to subdue our passions, it is not intended to impair our strength of body or mind must be a real self-denial if we would do it to the Church and to Christ, Who has made almsgiving, prayer, and fasting together part of the righteousness which He requires of His disciples. The clergy are bound to teach the laity to fast by their example. Meditation is doubly useful in these days of activity and excitement. And the observance of fasting days cannot but increase the opportunities for reading, which is so necessary to the clergy, that their teaching may be more pointed, and definite. Lastly, the observance of Friday would teach the people the spirit of the observance of Sunday, which cannot be more happily described than in the phrase used in a public notice in the city of Milan, where on St. John Baptist Day, being a Sunday, the custom of closing shops on every Sunday was by common consent begun ‘for the festal repose of the Day.’”

Fasting Communion is common in the Roman Catholic Church, and an exception of the Church of England also that “if antiquity is unanimous in its teaching it is the necessity of receiving this Sacrament fasting.” The following quotations are from a tract issued by the English Church Union:—“In the third century, certain persons were afraid lest the smell of wine on their morning should betray them to be Christians, and they adopted water instead, and thought it up for this compromise by a second Communion in the evening with a mixed cup, justified themselves by reasoning that the Lord offered the mixed cup, not in the morning, but after supper. St. Cyprian, however, utterly repudiated the idea that our Lord’s time of Institution was any precedent. ‘He said,’ must needs offer at the evening of the day, that the very hour of the day might indicate the setting and evening of the world. . . . But we celebrate the Eucharist of the Lord in the morning.’ This difference between the original Institution of the Sacrament and the practice of His followers is everywhere acknowledged. St. Gregory Nazianzen says, ‘He delivered the Paschal Mystery to His disciples in a guest-chamber at supper, we in temples and before supper.’ Augustine (ad Januar): ‘It is as clear as day that when the Apostles first received the Lord’s Body and Blood they did not fast. Ought it, then, to be a reproach to the Catholic Church if the Sacrament is always received fasting from that time, it seemed good to the honour of so great a Lord's Body and Blood should be at his mouth before other food: his custom is kept throughout though the Lord gave it to the brethren ought not to give that Sacrament after nor mix it up with their food, whom St. Paul reproves for our Saviour, in order more commend the depth of that as He was going away from us Passion, to fix it in their as His last act. And He as to the future order of it that He might reserve it to settle, by whose instruction to govern the Church. For at it should be always reserved food, no one, I believe, would do that custom.' St. Chrysostom, in his fervid way, gives an example in which he lived on this accused of giving the Eucharist to those who were not fasting—any such thing,' says he, 'is blotted out of the roll of the scribes in the book of the living, so that if I have done any such thing, I also will cast me out of His Church.' St. Chrysostom indeed still pressed on this point to appeal to our Lord's first intention of himself, yet it is a violation of his general rule. Dr. Jeremy Taylor, 'it is that the Church took up therefore those who cease to it shall bear their own cost, as reproved by St. Paul's no such custom, nor the like.' The 29th canon of the Council of Nice, 325, forbids unfasting on Maundy Thursday and on Good Friday for deceased relations. A similar exception was with the canon of the Council in 1549.

It is only right to quote the representative Anglican utterance Archbishop Benson, in his 1885, writes as follows:—'The utmost reverence into superstition on Fasting Communion is a natural and pure devotion for those capable of understanding that it is a means of grace, if it spoils temper, health, or spoiling religion. It was the old Evangelical school, of old-fashioned piety long a burden, but as a command at reasonable hours, a calm, a disengagedness go now the insistence on it is for delicate persons of the Eucharist for long periods. I see it dividing the clergy, and making some unwilling to attend, and some unable to receive, at the only eucharistic gatherings possible for their brotherly intercourse. I see some clergy falling into idle habits, and wasting the morning hours of Sunday, in order to be able 'to take a late celebration,' as it is said. And if these sights startle us with at least apparent reminders of certain Divine remonstrances, the awe of them deepens as we connect them with contemporary phenomena.

"If materialism in various shapes outside the Church alarms many as a tendency of the age, we have read and noticed but little if we do not, with the earliest Fathers, perceive, and with the latest observers verify, the fact that within the Church there is sure to be some corresponding and correlative tendency. And so it proves. There is a materialistic tone and temper about certain denunciations and directions which are published among us. Materialists might point to them (if they thought it worth their while) to show that the identification of spirit with matter is not so novel a doctrine. If Christian priests even remotely assist that issue (and this assistance does not appear to be so very remote), one of the Church's redemptions will be marred unawares from within. But do not let me be misunderstood. True reverence and true self-discipline will not cease to long for and to use every hint by which we can help them to get further from self and nearer to God. Fasting Communion would not cease, though the utmost contrary to materialism were taught. The sick would not go without their Communion if the use of the Church of England be humbly followed. And that use it must be remembered, has probably never negatived any apostolic or sub-apostolic custom" [p. 97].

Fatalism.—The doctrine of irresistible necessity, not as the result of the inevitable laws of the Creator, such as Hobbes contended for, as does the modern atheist, but as the result of His arbitrary power. It can hardly be distinguished from the extreme or logical form of Calvinism, which triumphantly quotes the text about the clay in the hands of the potter, and bids men not cavil at the irresistible will of the Supreme. But it reaches its completeness in the calm submissiveness to fate which marks the fanaticism of the Mahometans. [ELECTION, FREE WILL.]

Fathers.—This name of Father is given to those early Christian bishops whose writings have been handed down through all ages of the Church, and are still quoted. Their worth lies in the insight they give us into the laws and uses of the Church in the early ages, and in the statements of their ideas on all points of Christian doctrine.

Feast. [HOLY DAYS.]

Feastings of the Jews were more than ordinary preparations of meats and drinks, for the entertainment and good-fellowship of friends and acquaintance. The extraordinary and more liberal kind of entertainment, by way of feasting, was called "Mishteh," from their free drinking at such times. And there was also a kind of feasting in which they made merry together, eating the remainder of their sacrifices. In these greater feasts there were ceremonies preparatory, which were chiefly "Salutation," either by words, as, "The Lord bless you," or "Peace be upon thee," or by asking each other of their welfare; or else by gestures, as prostrating the whole body; but most commonly by an ordinary kiss. The second preparatory ceremony was washing the feet, which was the office of the meanest servants in the family. The third ceremony was pouring of oil upon the head, and thus Christ reproves the Pharisee that invited Him, for not anointing His head. After the performance of these ceremonies, the master of the house, sitting down with the rest of his guests, took a cup of wine in his hand, and thus began his thanksgiving, which we call grace before meat: "Blessed be Thou, O Lord our God, which createdst the fruit of the vine." After this blessing of the cup, the master of the house took the bread, which he lightly cut, but not quite through, in order that he might break it more easily, and holding it in both his hands, he blessed it with these words: "Blessed be Thou, O Lord our God, the King of the world, which bringeth forth bread out of the earth." Which done, the master broke the bread, and distributed it to every one that sat at the table, and then they began to partake of the dishes that were provided. At the end of the feast the master of the house, or somebody for him, gave thanks again, after this manner: "Let us bless Him who has fed us of His own, and by Whom we live;" and then all the guests answered, "Blessed be He of whose meat we have eaten, and of whose goodness we live." Which done, he that began proceeded with a "Blessed be He, and blessed be His name:" [1] For their present food; [2] for their deliverance out of servitude; [3] for the covenant of circumcision; [4] for the Law given by Moses. Concluding with a prayer that God would have mercy [1] on His people of Israel; [2] on His own city, Jerusalem; [3] on Sion, the tabernacle of His glory; [4] On the kingdom of the house of David, His anointed; [5] that He would send the prophet Elias; and lastly, that He would make them worthy of the days of Elias, and of the life of the world to come. Which done, a grace-cup went round the table, blessed after the same manner as at the beginning. Besides the daily sacrifices, the Jewish Sabbath was a perpetual weekly feast, and observed with as much strictness and religion as any other festival. The first day of every month (which the Jews), was also a holy day, called "New Moon." They had 13 festivals, which were celebrated. As for their posture at table, it was the same as with the Greeks, is to say, lying or leaning upon a round table as described by Plutarch. he says, "Thou satest upon a table prepared before thee, by the custom of pulling off their shoes, in antiquity of the same custom."

Feasts of Charity, or Agapæ, were held at fixed times in the Christian Church, when Christians gathered together for a common meal. They were usually held on the first day of the month, and were provided by the richer members of the Church. The food consisted of bread, wine, meat, milk, and fruit, being to the means of the good of all. Men and women attended the feast, and sat at different tables, and the meal a special loaf and wine were passed round in commemoration of the Lord's death. The meal was preceded by prayers, exhortations, and Scripture, and afterwards by a holy kiss. At first these feasts were for all, rich and poor alike, but as social distinctions began to prevail, they became either for the wealthy, or distributions of food among the poor. Another cause of their falling into disuse was the building of churches, and the fact that they would not use them as churches, whereas hitherto they had used them for dwelling-place and churches were made later to revive the custom, and St. Augustine speaks of the custom of frequenting the agapæ; but it had no lasting effect, and for a long time the trace of the feasts was in the customs of churches, at which they continued to be held as late as the sixteenth century.

Featly, DANIEL, D.D. was rector first of Lambeth, then of St. Dunstons, and was a member of the Assembly of Divines in 1643, and was the last episcopalian who remained in it. He wrote dipt, or the Anabaptists duckt head and ears at a disputation [2] Mystica Clavis, a set of questions and answers on texts; [3] a book on Private

Fees.—Ecclesiastical fees are divided into two main divisions:—[1] those payable to the clergy; [2] those payable to lay officials. [1] Of fees payable to the clergy, what are called "surplice fees" are the most important; they are fees paid to the clergy for performing certain offices on behalf of individuals; in their origin they were quite voluntary, but long ago nade them obligatory. of a parish is also entitled to fees for the erection of monuments and gravestones, in church or churchyard, and for the construc- tion of vaults for burial.

[2] Fees payable to the diocesan officials. By Constitution of Archbishop Stratford, the fee for Ordination was not to exceed sixpence; and by canon 35 of the year 1603, the fee is not to exceed ten shillings; but for the letters testimonial of ordination under the bishop's seal, extra fees are payable, on the ground that these are no part of ordination, but are provided for the security of the clergy. The fees payable by the clergy at ordination and on other occasions, to the officials of the diocese, were fixed by an Order in Council of March 19th, 1869. According to this order, clergy pay £2 7s. at ordination.

Fees on Institution are fixed by an Order in Council of July 24th, 1857, under Act 1 & 2 Vict., c. 106, at £7 13s. 6d., and for Induction £1 8s. [For other fees payable, see FIRST-FRUITs and TENTHS.] For licence to a perpetual curacy, the fee is £4 9s. Fee for licence to a curacy is 13s., in addition to stamp duty. For licence of non-residence 18s., plus stamp duty. Under the order of March 19th, 1869, the following fees were fixed:—For resignation of a benefice, £1 1s., paid to the bishop's secretary; for visitations of bishops and archdeacons, 18s.; for conse- cration of church and churchyard, 12 guineas; for burial ground alone, 10 guineas.

The fees payable by the clergy at institu- tion are recoverable by monition and seques- tration. The most important Acts dealing with Fees are 1 & 2 Vict., c. 106, & 30 & 31 Vict., c. 135.

Felicissimus. — [1] A schismatical deacon of the Church of Carthage, in the third century. He was appointed by Novatus with- out St. Cyprian's consent, and opposed himself to the episcopal system of government, which St. Cyprian upheld. During the Decian perse- cution, and the absence of St. Cyprian, Felicissimus, and five other priests like-minded with himself, joined with the persecutors of the Christians. He persuaded the presbyters to readmit the lapsi to Communion before they had gone through the usual course of penance; and this being forbidden by the prelate on his return, Felicissimus and his party assembled and formally excommunicated him and all others who did not adhere to their views, and chose Fortunatus as their bishop [Easter, 251]. Felicissimus endea- voured to gain the support of Cornelius, Bishop of Rome, but failed; the Novatian controversy having just broken out between Rome and Carthage, making Cornelius and St. Cyprian natural allies.

[2] A confessor at Carthage, imprisoned with Rogatianus at the beginning of the Decian persecution. It was to these two confessors that St. Cyprian wrote, exhorting them to take care of his flock in his absence, in conjunction with the Bishops Caldonius and Herculanius, and whom he commissioned to excommunicate the schismatic Felicissimus. Their festival stands in the Roman martyrology on Oct. 26th.

Felicitas, Str., was a Roman lady of high rank, who had been left a widow with seven sons. Her influence in Rome was so great that the heathen priests petitioned the Emperor that she might be imprisoned. Authorities do not agree as to under which emperor she was persecuted, some saying Antoninus Pius, and some Marcus Aurelius. The Governor of Rome, Publius, thought he would be able to persuade her to recant by working upon her feelings as a mother; but she refused even to beg for her children's lives, still less for her own. The governor then caused her and her sons to appear before him publicly, and when she still persisted in her refusal to sacrifice to the gods, ordered her to be struck on the face. He then turned to the boys, and asked each separately to renounce his faith and so escape martyrdom, but they one and all remained steadfast. They were sent to prison, waiting the Emperor's orders. He decreed that they should be treated as rebels and enemies of religion, and be executed by different methods. The eldest, Januarius, was beaten with whips loaded with lead; Felix and Philip were killed with clubs; Silanus was thrown headlong from a high place; and the three youngest—Alexander, Vitalis, and Martial—were beheaded. Felicitas was kept in prison, enduring great hardships, and at length she too was beheaded.

Felix I., Pope and martyr, was a Roman by birth. He succeeded Dionysius, in 269. His first act was to depose Paul of Samosata [SAMOSATA, PAUL OF], Bishop of Antioch, who had founded a heresy very similar to that of the Sabellians, and to set up Domnus in his place. At this time he is said to have written a letter to Maximus, Bishop of Alexandria, stating the Christian doctrine of the Incarnation. He was murdered in 274, in the Aurelian persecution, after having himself, as it is said, buried 342 martyrs.

Felix II.—When Liberius, in 355, was banished on his refusal to sign the condemnation of Athanasius, the Arian party made Felix Pope. A petition was soon brought forward for the recall of Liberius, and the Emperor Constantius proposed that the two should hold the See jointly. But the Romans refused to allow this, so Felix was compelled to retire. His fate is unknown. Some hold that his adversaries killed him, others that he rebelled, and others that he died in seclusion at Porto.

Felix III. succeeded Simplicius I. in 483. He is chiefly noticeable as assisting in the first rupture between the East and Western churches. Acacius, the Patriarch of Constantinople, being a favourer of the MONOPHYTES [q.v.], persuaded the Emperor Zeno to issue the HENOTICON [q.v.], which posed the Bishop of Alexandria, and Peter Mongus, one of the sect, in 484. The deposed bishop appealed to Rome, and sent two bishops, Messinus and Valerian, to order his restoration. The legates were corrupted by bribes, and did not fulfil their duty, whereupon Felix called a council of seven bishops at Rome, and excommunicated Acacius, Peter Mongus, and the legates. This caused a schism, which was not till 819. Felix died in 492.

Felix, Str., Bishop of Nantes in the sixth century, was descended from an ancient noble family. He was born at Bourgneuf, and was ordained priest in 540, and was made Bishop of Nantes after the death of Eumiles, in 550. He assisted at the Council of Paris in 557, and on his return home endeavoured to enforce the decrees that was decreed by the Council. When Clothaire took Nantes in 560, he made Felix Bishop governor of the town, which he held until the King's death, and then retired in order to be able to give himself to proper work. He was present at the Council of Tours [566], and the fourth Council [573]. At the latter Council he had a quarrel with Archbishop Gregory of Tours, who describes him as careless and boastful, and that if Felix had been Bishop of Meaux, the Egyptian ships, instead of bringing spices, would have only transported paper on which the Bishop could write the good men of his time. Fortunatus, of Poitiers, describes in one of his poems Felix's great success in converting the heathens round him. Becoming dangerously ill, he nominated his nephew Burgundianus his successor. But Gregory declared the nomination to be irregular, and refused to consecrate him. Felix died in 584. His day is June 1st.

Felix, Str., of Nola, in Campania, lived in the third century. Having been brought up in the Christian faith, he was ordained reader, exorcist, and lastly priest. He was made Bishop of Nola during the persecutions of Decius and Valerian, and was forced to retire into the desert. Felix, who had stayed behind, was carried before the magistrate, and loaded with chains, into prison. On the night it is said that an angel set him free, and sent him to Maximus, who was dying, and full of thorns. Felix found some grapes, and gave him the thorns, which he pressed and gave to the Bishop, who revived. Felix then placed him on his shoulders, and carried him back to Nola, where he remained concealed in his house until Decius's death, in 251. When he was discovered, the heathens were greatly incensed.

on of Dr. Samuel Fell, Dean , was born at Sunningwell, in Berkshire. He was istchurch, where he took the degree of Master in 1643, about which time he carried arms for Charles I. at Oxford, and was afterwards made an ensign. He became a clergyman, and was deprived of his preferment by the Parliamentarians in 1648. He continued at Oxford during the Common-wealth, and had a private congregation of Royalists, to whom he ministered in accordance with the now forbidden Liturgy. At the Restoration he became Canon, and afterwards Dean of Christchurch, besides being one of Charles II.'s chaplains in ordinary. In 1675 he became Bishop of Oxford, and died in 1686. He was very charitable, and a munificent patron of learning, and greatly promoted the buildings and privileges of the University. He was a good classical scholar and philologist. His chief works were:—The Life of Dr. Hammond; Sermons; Responsio ad Epistolam Thomæ Hobbesi, Malmesburiensis, etc.

Fellowship.—A foundation in a college, awarded by examination. The Fellow is entitled to a share of the revenues and a voice in the government of his college, and, if he be in holy orders, to presentation to one of the livings attached thereto. Formerly all fellowships ceased on marriage; but of late this rule has been much relaxed, and now nearly all colleges have special rules of their own regarding them.

Feltham, OWEN [b. 1610, d. 1678].—The author of Resolves, Divine, Moral, Political; a work which has gone through many editions. Little is known of his life.

Fénélon, FRANÇOIS DE SALIGNAC DE LA MOTHE, was born in Périgord, 1651, died 1715. He was early destined for the ministry, and made such rapid progress in his studies, that before he was eighteen he was called on by his uncle, the Marquis de Fénélon, to preach before a learned assembly in Paris; but fearing lest the praises bestowed on him should cause vanity, he was sent for several years to the seminary of St. Sulpice, where he passed his time in devotional exercises, and at length took orders in 1675. In 1688 he was made director of an institution in Paris for female converts to the Roman faith, and while here he published his first work, De l'Éducation des Filles, a very well-known book in this country. He formed a friendship with Bossuet, who brought him under the notice of Louis XIV., who was at that time trying to unite the Churches of France; by him Fénélon was sent to Poitou, in 1685, to convert the Protestants. He refused a military escort, preferring to use only the arms of the Bible. In 1689, he was appointed by the King tutor to his heir-apparent, the young Duke of Burgundy, a task which he discharged most faithfully, striving to prepare the mind of his pupil for the real business of life, and impressing on him the futility of all earthly glory and power which was not founded on the great principles of justice and truth. In 1694, the King presented him to the Abbey of St. Valery, which he renounced the following year on being made Archbishop of Cambray. Just at this time began the controversy about Quietism (q.v.), which afterwards brought about his disgrace. In 1687 he formed the acquaintance of the celebrated Madame Guyon, whose piety and exemplary life seemed to have blinded Fénelon to the practical consequences of her doctrines. At first Madame du Mainmon held her in favour, but she was persecuted by Bossuet, and at length the protection afforded her by the former was withdrawn. Bossuet required Fénelon to condemn her doctrines, but instead of this he published a book called Maximes des Saints sur la Vie Intérieure, which was a defence of some, at least, amongst the doctrines of Madame Guyon. Bossuet answered this by publishing a rival treatise, Explication des Maximes des Saints, which was received with universal approval, while his opponent's work was loudly condemned. The King, already irritated by what he thought were censures on himself in some of Fénelon's works of fiction, ordered that his book should be submitted to the tribunal of a body of ecclesiastics, of whom Bossuet was one. Fénelon refused to accept him as judge, and the work was then sent to Pope Innocent VIII., who delayed his reply for a long time, and at last, in 1699, came a decision condemning it. Fénelon at once submitted, and signed a renunciation, but it was a severe blow to him. Bossuet was touched by his meekness, and would have sought a reconciliation, but Louis XIV. was just then specially irritated against him on account of the publication of Télémaque. This had originally been written for his pupil, the Duke of Burgundy, and Fénelon had given it to an amanuensis to make a fair copy of it for the prince, but he treacherously made a duplicate copy, which he published without the consent of the author. The King, suspecting that some passages in it were a satire on his court, was furious, and the book was suppressed in France, and Fénelon was forbidden to hold any intercourse with his late pupil. He retired to his own diocese, and there led a quiet life till his death in 1713. Fénelon was a voluminous writer. Besides the works already mentioned, he wrote:—Dialogues des Morts, Dialogues sur l'Éloquence, Directions pour la Conscience d'un Roi, Démonstration de l'Existence de Dieu, &c. Many of his works were written for the instruction of his pupil, whom he hoped to see govern with liberal views, but who died two years before his tutor.

Ferial Days.—Days which are neither festivals nor fasts—ordinary week-days. The name has a curious history. Feria, amongst the Romans, were holy-days (feri, "holy;" and diurni, "days"), especially marked by the cessation from all work. Some were private, observed by particular families, the others public in honour of the gods. Thus the Lupercalia in honour of Pan were feri. So were the Nundinae (so called because they were kept every ninth day), on which the country people met to buy and sell. Hence the derivation of our word "fair." In 354, Pope Sylvester, because he would not call the days of the week as the Jews did—Sabbatum, Prima Sabbati, Secunda Sabbati, &c., nor by the names of the planets or fœtigods as the pagans did, called Sunday, Dies Domini; Monday, Feria Prima; Tuesday, Feria Secunda, &c., and Saturday, Die Sabbati; and said he called them feri, quod a necessariis operibus, et quod a ceteris Christianis feriarentur.

FERRAR, NICHOLAS [d. 1592, d. 1637].—A clergyman of the Established Church, and friend of George Herbert. He was ordained deacon by Laud, while Bishop of St. David, in 1626, but never proceeded to priest's orders. His life was one of devout asceticism, and he devoted his means, which were ample, to pious uses. His house was like a monastery, in which he scrupulously observed the hours, sleeping on the floor, and rising at one in the morning. He provided a free school in his neighbourhood, and regularly taught in it. [Life by Jebb and Mayor, 1866.]

FERRAR, ROBERT. [FARRAR.]

FERRARA, COUNCIL OF.—Summoned by Pope Eugenius IV. in 1438, in opposition to the Council of Basle, and with a view to restoring union between the Latin and Greek Churches. The four questions proposed were:—I. The Procession of the Holy Ghost, whether from the Father alone, or likewise from the Son. II. The use of leavened or unleavened bread in the Eucharist. III. Purgatory. IV. The Supremacy of the Pope. On account of the plague the Council was transferred to Florence. [FLORENCE, COUNCIL OF.]

Ferry Law.—The law passed in France under the guidance of Jules Ferry, in 1879, after a very bitter contest, which prohibited the members of any not recognized religious association to be the teachers of a public school. It was aimed at the Jesuits, and had the effect of closing twenty-seven of the colleges, and stopping 850 teachers. [GALLIC CHURCH.]

Festivals.—The origin of these is very ancient, as well among the pagans as among the Jews and Christians. The observance may be said to come naturally, as does external worship. The simple fact that we are visible and material creatures implies visible worship, and the same object which is sought by it, namely, to manifest and heighten inward devotion, is that which is intended servance of festivals. Some of those instantly were probably instituted in a ages, others were afterwards added at times. Of the chief of the Church account will be found in respective headings. They are, 1, those connected with the principal the Saviour's life. Some are "im-festivals," as CHRISTMAS DAY, which is on Dec. 25th, others are movable, 2, and WHITSUNTIDE, which depends 3. Fetichism or Fetish-worship.—The word fetich comes from the Portuguese fetico, fetico, "magic," "charm," or "oracle," and it is the term the negroes of Western Africa, where the Portuguese were the first European traders, applied to their religion. The word was brought into use in Europe by De Brosses, in his work Des Cultes des Dieux Fétiches, published in 1760. The term fetichism may be explained as worship rendered to objects of art or nature, to animate or inanimate bodies, or their qualities—in fact, anything to which a magical power is ascribed. Thus superstition might cause a piece of wood, a horn of a goat, a certain plant, etc., to become a fetish in the eyes of a savage who thinks that it exercises any influence upon him, and then this fetish becomes his idol. Fetichism is identical with a belief in charms, and the poor savage will not unfrequently destroy his fetish if it does not favour his wishes.

Fenarbach, Ludwig A. [b. 1804, d. 1872].—A Rationalist teacher of Germany. He was a disciple of Hegel, but forsook him, and started for himself as a Materialist, holding that God is a creation of the human intellect, which forms an ideal of its own. His principal work was translated by Miss Evans ("George Eliot"), under the title of Essence of Christianity.

Feuillans.—A monastery near Toulouse, founded towards the end of the sixteenth century by Jean de la Barrière [b. 1544, d. 1600]. He was a Cistercian, and his new sect was only a reformation of the Order. Barrière became Abbot of Feuillans in 1574. There was much opposition on the part of the Cistercians, but in 1588 Pope Sixtus V. confirmed their reforms and forbade all interference with them, and in 1595 they were formed into a separate congregation. Nuns, on the same principle, were also formed, the nuns being called the Feuillantines.

Fiacre, St., son of Eugenius IV., King of the Scots, was probably born about 606. He was educated by Conanus, Bishop of Man, who inspired him with the desire of a secluded life. He went with his sister to France, and was received with great kindness by the Bishop of Meaux, who entrusted him with the erection of an oratory near the forest of Fordille. It was dedicated to the Virgin Mary, and became a favourite resort of pilgrims. Upon his father's death a message was sent him urging him to take the crown, but he refused to give up his life of solitude, and lived at Meaux till his death in 670. He was buried in the cathedral, and his name is associated with many miracles supposed to have been wrought by him both before and after his death.

Fichte, Johann Gottlieb [b. 1762, d. 1814].—A metaphysical writer, a disciple of Lessing, whose first theories involved the principle that by "God" is meant the Moral Government of the World—that in this sense, and in this only, the belief in God is true and needful. Later in life he approached Christian views. His Destiny of Man, Way towards the Blessed Life, etc., were attempts to formulate views and convictions for himself concerning Christianity, and he so far succeeded as to realize that it is something more than a code of morals. How far it was a symbolic presentment or historic fact he never seems entirely to have settled. He had been an enthusiastic admirer of the French Revolution, and this lay at the bottom of much of the movement of his mind. He was continually at work upon the inquiry—what was needed to make him free, to enable him to fulfil his destiny? And this inquiry led to a conviction that he needed a true God, one who was not evolved from his own mind, but who was above him. His contemporaries charged him with inconsistency. He could only answer that he must have what he required, and could not do without a personal Lord. And the purity and nobleness of his life was the best attestation of his earnestness, and of the path by which he was being more and more guided towards the eternal Truth. He died in a career of brave self-devotion, of postilence caught in ministering to the sick and wounded on the battle-field. His son, Immanuel Hermann Fichte (d. 1879), was an influential Christian teacher.

Field, RICHARD, noted for his book on the Church, was born at Hempstead, in Hertfordshire, in 1561. He became a student at Magdalen College, Oxford, in 1577, from whence, after taking his B.A. degree, he moved to Magdalen Hall, where he became M.A., and afterwards Bachelor and Doctor of Divinity. While at the University he spent much time in controversy between the Churches of England and Rome. In 1598 he was made rector of Burghclere and chaplain in ordinary to Elizabeth. James I. made him a prebendary of Windsor, and in 1610 Dean of Gloucester. He was a great friend of Hooker, and was noted for his good preaching, his learning, and his powers of controversial argument. The first four books of his great work Of the Church were printed in 1606, and four years after a fifth appeared, with an appendix, containing "A Defence of passages of such of the former books that have been excepted against or wrested to the maintenance of Romish errors." He also published a sermon preached before the King at Whitehall, 1604. He died November, 1616, and was buried in the outer chapel of St. George, at Windsor.

Fifth-Monarchy Men.—A set of enthusiasts in Cromwell's time, who said that Christ would come personally to reign on earth and establish a "Fifth Universal Monarchy," and that, until that time, His saints would provisionally administer the civil and that no single person should rule any kingdom.

Filioque Controversy.—Filio or Filioque, in the phrase proceedeth from the Father and the Son, appear in the Nicene Creed in the Western Church, are in to the Council of Bracara in 4 to that held at Toledo in 589. Church has always refused to and though they were gradually the Churches of the West, yet resolutely declined to approve tion, and ordered a copy of the the interpolated words to be silver plates and set up in St. Peter's. Firmilian was Bishop of Cappadocia, in the third century. He took a part in the Council of Iconium in 244, other Eastern bishops met against him, and decreed the necessity of converted heretics, as their faith being performed by a heretic, Pope Stephen I. not approving deprived the bishops that met at See. Firmilian wrote a letter with whom he was intimate, speaks very severely of the Church historians have vainly suppressed this letter, or have forgery. Firmilian died at the

First-fruits.—It began early in the Christian Church the first-fruits to God. It was voluntary, but when the idea labored that the clergy were the rights of the Levites, the giving began to be considered obligatory. the Council of Franks [791] has quoted as a proof of this. The corn and wine were the chief, etc., were also made, to be distributed to the poor. The amount given was one-sixtieth and one-fortieth. The English Church before the Reformation used to give English benefices on condition that he should give a first year's produce. He also enforced force their clergy to pay King Henry VIII. declared of the English Church, he took trust for himself. They came to until the reign of Queen Anne, when they added to the small livings formed what is now known as the Bounty.

This was a very common symbol in Christian art. It is frequently found in the Catacombs, which probably the oldest Christian monuments in the world. The explanation of the fish is that the word ICHTHUS, forms an acrostic, the initials of the words Iesus Thesus Uius Sæclæ, i.e. "Jesus son of God, the Saviour."

Fisher, John, Bishop of Rochester, was born in Yorkshire, in 1459. He was Michael House (now Queen's) Cambridge, of which he became Chancellor in 1496. He was afterwards chaplain to Margaret, Countess of Richmond, Henry VII.'s mother, whom he had persuaded to found St. John's College, at Cambridge, and to give university professorships at both Universities. He himself was the first Professor of Divinity at Cambridge. In 1504 he became Bishop of Rochester. When Henry VIII. came to the throne, Fisher was in great favour. In 1527, when the King applied to him for help in his divorce. All of the bishops except Fisher. Again in 1532 he stood out against Henry in the matter of the King's supremacy. Sometimes he was mistaken, as in the case of Kent, whom he knew to be an enemy of the King, but he did not expose him. He was accused of treason, but the King did not believe him until he and Sir Thomas More refused to take the oath of supremacy and he was thrown into prison. He was released as a reward for his fidelity, but he was not allowed to wear the cardinal's hat, which so incensed him that he was beheaded on Tower Hill, 22nd, 1535.

Act, The, passed in 1665, was known as the "Clarendon Act." It was framed to deprive the dissenting ministers of a means of earning their living by preaching or teaching. It required that all who taught should take the oath of abstinence, and swear not to try alterations in Church or State. Nonconforming ministers should give notice of any town where he ministered, except when travelling.

Five Points. [DONT, SYNOD OF.]

Five Propositions. [JANSENISTS.]

Fiabellum Muscatorium.—A fan used in olden times by the deacons to prevent goats or flies falling into the chalice during the celebration of the mass. It was usually made of peacocks' feathers, and sometimes of fine cloth.

Flagellants.—The name given in the thirteenth century to a sect of fanatics started in Perugia in 1260 by a hermit, and which at once sprang up all over Italy. The people marched through the streets two abreast, with a cross and banner before, with their faces hidden, and bare to the waist, and singing psalms, while they scourged themselves with knotted cords stuck with points and pins. They did this twice in the day and once in the night, and the penance lasted thirty-three days and a half, in memory of our Lord's earthly life. The priests were at first favourable, but afterwards preached against them, and they soon disappeared. Between the years 1347 and 1349 the dreadful Black Death visited Europe, carrying off millions of people, and the sect again arose, appearing first in Magdeburg in the spring of 1349. They soon spread all over Germany, and then went further, into Denmark and England. They arranged themselves into a regular body, and marched on from town to town, staying only one day in each. They were at first very popular, but the people soon got tired of them, and their unpopularity was hastened by a Bull issued by Pope Clement VI. They had degenerated into heretics, affirming that their blood united in such a manner with Christ's, that it had the same virtue, and that after thirty-three days of whipping they were absolved from all guilt and punishment of sin. In 1398 a band appeared at Genoa, stating that Christ and the Virgin Mary had appeared to them, revealing that in order to save the world there must be a Flagellant pilgrimage, but these were stopped by Boniface IX. They were condemned by the Council of Constance in 1414, and John Gerson wrote a tract against them entitled, Contra Sectum Flagellantium.

Flagon.—The vessel in which the wine for the Holy Communion is contained previous to being poured into the chalice for consecration.

Flavel, John [b. 1627, d. 1691].—A Nonconformist minister. He was born in Worcestershire, educated at University College, Oxford, ordained at Salisbury, and appointed, in the days of the Parliament, first incumbent of Deptford, then of Dartmouth. In 1662 he was deprived, and retired to Devonshire. Under James II.'s declaration of the dispensing power, he returned to Dartmouth, and refused to quit his charge there for a richer post in London. He was through life a great student, and wrote several works, of which Husbandry Spiritualised is still read.

Flavian, Bishop of Constantinople, was noted for his great piety. He was a priest and treasurer of the great church, when he was chosen successor to Proclus in 447. He refused to make the customary present to Chrysaphius, favourite of the Emperor Theodosius, after his election, who in revenge endeavoured to deprive him of his See. In Flavian's time the Eutychian heresy sprang up, which he condemned in a synod at Constantinople: for which he was deposed in 449 in another pseudo-synod, held at Ephesus by Dioscorus of Alexandria, and he died on his way into exile at Epipa, in Lydia. Afterwards, when the heresy was suppressed, his remains were brought to Constantinople and buried in the church of the Apostles. [EUTYCHIANS.]

Fléchier, ESPRIT, Bishop of Nismes, was born in 1632 at Pernes, in Venaissin, near Avignon. His uncle, Father Hercules Daudifret, was general of the congregation of the "Fathers of Christian Doctrine," so Esprit was educated here, and when he left he became famous for his panegyrics on the saints, and for his funeral orations, in which he is said to rival, or even to excel, Bossuet. He was ordained, and became a tutor, and in 1673 was chosen one of the Forty of the French Academy in place of Godeau, Bishop of Vance. In 1685 he went to convert the Protestants in Poitou and Brittany, and on his return became Bishop of Lavaur, where he only remained two years, being translated to the See of Nismes, where he remained till his death in 1710. During his episcopate the Edict of Nantes was revoked, and this was followed by cruel persecutions of the Huguenots. Fléchier was very mild and tolerant, and carried out his orders with as much temperance as possible, so that he was beloved both by Catholics and Protestants. He was very charitable, and at his death left over twenty thousand crowns to the poor. His works were collected and published in 1782. The chief were the Lives of Cardinals Ximenes and Commendon, and of Theodosius the Great. Of his funeral orations the most famed are those on Madame D'Aiguillon and Marshal Turenne.

Fleetwood, JOHN.—The author of a Life of Christ, which was very popular in the last century, but worthless as a critical work, being a mere compilation and paraphrase of the Gospels. Nothing is known of him, and it is probable that the name was assumed.

Fleetwood, WILLIAM [b. 1650, d. 1723]. Bishop of St. Asaph [1706] and of Ely [1714], a very learned prelate, and famous as a preacher. His sermons were reprinted in 1854.

Fletcher, GILES. A religious poet, son of Dr. Giles Fletcher, and nephew to Richard Fletcher, Bishop of London. He was born at Cranbrook, in Kent, about 1584. educated at Westminster School and College, Cambridge. He remained bridge, where he became a noted preacher 1617, and then was presented to the Alderton, in Suffolk, where he died. He is chiefly celebrated for his poem, Victorie, which he published in 1610 certainly a very remarkable work; shows that he was greatly influenced by Spenser.

Fletcher, JOHN WILLIAM, the cousin of John Wesley, was a Swiss by birth and education. His real name was Jean Gode la Fléchère. He received his early education in his native place, Nyon, and then for seven years to the Academy of Fribourg. From childhood he had a tender and devout spirit, and desired to be a Christian minister; but when he was his views considerably changed, and he pursued a military career instead. Against the wishes of his parents, he went to Lisbon and received a captain's commission in the Portuguese service. He was just about to sail for Brazil when an accident—the upset of some boiling water over his legs—prevented him. On his recovery he returned to France, but shortly after set out for Fribourg where his uncle had procured a commission for him; but again his plans were frustrated by the Peace of Aix-la-Chapelle terminating the war, and by the death of his uncle. Fletcher now determined to go to England and after eighteen months spent in France, he came to the language at the school of Mr. Burdett Hatfield, he became tutor in the family of Mr. Hill, of Tern Hall, in Shropshire, where he held for seven years. It was while living in Mr. Hill's family that Fletcher was under the influences which determined his whole future course. He was led by a conversation to go and hear the Methodist preachers and soon joined himself to them. The date of his joining is not certain, but it is known he was a member of one of their classes. He was urged by some of his friends to enter the ministry, but having doubts as to his fitness he asked the advice of John Wesley, who strongly recommended Fletcher's being ordained. Accordingly, on Sunday, May 17, 1738, he received deacon's orders from the Bishop of Hereford, and the following Sunday he was ordained priest by the Bishop of Bangor. He was licensed as curate to the parish of Tern in Shropshire; this appointment was, however, merely nominal, Fletcher still continuing his tutorship in Mr. Hill's family. He was, however, often read prayers and preached at Methodist chapels of London, and from the acquaintance of Charles Wesley and John Newton, the Countess of Huntingdon, and Mr. Hill offered his tutor the living of Ternham, in Cheshire, but Fletcher refused the ground that there was "too much little labour;" Mr. Chambre, of was then appointed to Dunham, and became the incumbent of Madeley. in 1760, and here he laboured till in 1785. The inhabitants of his were a very rough class, and little or had been done to raise and improve. Fletcher worked hard amongst them, laboured in a fearless manner, often to his life from some of the most of his flock. In 1768 he undertook the of Lady Huntingdon's College at Madeley, but he did not give up his own till he resigned his presidency in 1771 at of the Calvinist controversy. as an Arminian and Whitfield a and naturally they could not be in harmony. Fletcher was an and most of his writings are in defence of Calvinism and in defence of Wesley. Wesley always grudged Fletcher to his oblation of Madeley, and wanted him to itinerant preaching, and in 1773 he wanted Fletcher should succeed him in one of the Methodist preachers and but he did not feel equal to his health was failing him, and for he was obliged to give up his work, abroad for three and a half years. He married, and returned to Madeley. Schools were just being formed in the Fletcher at once organised one for

His labours in his parish were blessed. Wesley says that if he had equal strength, he would have been eloquent preacher in England; his character and earnestness of devotion were in themselves. His principal work Checks to Antinomianism.

FLEURY, CLAUDE [b. 1640, d. 1723], Abbé of writer of many works, of which his Universal History, in 20 vols., is the greatest. It was translated by Dr. J. H. Newcome, 1742. Fleury's work extended to 1742, and was continued by Fabre to 1784.

FLETCHER, THEODOR, D.D.—The reviver of the Society of Deaconesses in Protestant Germany. b. near Wiesbaden, 1800; d. 1864]. Simple-hearted, pious man, with great energy, work, and skill in organisation. He laboured at Kaiserswerth. His flock was small one, the bulk of the population being Roman Catholic, and as his people were depressed, owing to depression of trade, he went in 1822 to go about begging for the result of which was that he gained knowledge of Christian organisations, almshouses, and the like, and of the means to keep them alive. This knowledge he used on his return, and while making permanent arrangements for the support of his flock at Kaiserswerth, he procured wider means of good. He laboured in America and the Holy Land, and was Anglican Bishop of Jerusalem in founding a house of deaconesses at Jerusalem, and, by the help of the King and Queen of Prussia, founded a Christian hospital with deaconesses at Berlin. Daughters of the mother institution at Kaiserswerth sprang up on all sides, and now the institution is established on a successful basis nearly all over Europe. [DEACONESSSES.]

Florence, COUNCIL OF.—This Council was removed from Ferrara, on account of an outbreak of the plague; it had been summoned by Pope Eugenius IV., in opposition to that of Basle, as he could not agree with the Fathers there assembled. The Emperor of the East, John VI., Palæologus, and the Patriarch, and the most noted persons of the Greek Church, attended the Council, at which also the Pope and his cardinals were present. Champions were chosen on each side: on the Latin, Cardinal Julian Cæsarini, and John, the Provincial General of the Dominican Order in Lombardy; on the Greek, Isidore of Russia and Cardinal Bessarion. After two fine harangues made by this last, on the Procession of the Holy Ghost, all the Greeks subscribed to the belief of the Western Church, except Mark, Bishop of Ephesus. Afterwards some other matters relating to Purgatory were determined, and a union between the Greek and Latin Church concluded; but the conduct of the Eastern bishops not being approved by their party when they returned home, prevented the agreement from taking any effect. The Abyssinian Church and the Jacobites desired to be comprehended in this union; this was in 1439. The Acts of the Council of Florence were signed on the part of the Latins by the Pope, eight cardinals, two Patriarchs, two bishops, ambassadors of the Duke of Burgundy, eight archbishops, forty-seven bishops, four heads of orders, forty-one abbots, and the Archdeacon of Troyes; on the part of the Greeks, by the Emperor, three Patriarchs, nineteen archbishops and bishops, the dignitaries of the Church of Constantinople, the head of the Imperial monastery, and four abbots. [PAPAL SCHISM.]

Florence of Worcester.—A chronicler who lived in the twelfth century. His work, Chronicon Chronicorum, beginning with the history of the world, reached to his own time (i.e. 1118). Another monk of the same monastery carried it on to 1163. Florence also wrote a treatise on the royal family of England.

Florinus.—A Roman priest of the second century, who had been a disciple of Polycarp, but who joined Blastus in publishing a book containing heretical doctrines. He declared that God was the author of evil. Pope Victor excommunicated Florinus and Blastus, who nevertheless contrived to gain many followers of their heresy. Irenæus wrote to him, seeking to overthrow his arguments, and afterwards went to Rome on purpose to hold a conference with him; in the course of this he reminded him that Polycarp, who had taught them both, had held no such heretical opinions. Florinus afterwards joined the sect of the Valentinians.

Florus, surnamed MAGISTER, or DIACONUS, lived at Lyons during the ninth century, and took an active part in theological controversy. He opposed vehemently the doctrine of Transubstantiation as set forth by Paschasius Radbertus. Most of his writings were on the subject of Predestination, which he declared to be twofold—one of the Elect to everlasting life, and another of sinners to everlasting death. He was appointed by the Church of Lyons to write against Scotus Erigena on this subject, and accordingly wrote in 852 his Liber adversus Joh. Scoti erroneas definitiones. Florus was present at the Council of Chiersy in 849, when Predestination was the subject discussed. He wrote many letters with reference to the contest between Agobard and Amalarius, and other theological works.

Fo-ism.—China is the birthplace of the oldest institutions known in history. It was an ancient nation before Athenian influence or Roman conquest began. The religion of this wonderful people has taken a threefold form:—1. The State religion, Confucianism [CONFUCIUS]; 2. TAO-ISM [q.v.]; and 3. Fo-ISM, or Chinese Buddhism. The name Fo is the first syllable of Foë-t'a = Buddha. It is of later date than either of the others, and, in fact, owes its origin to their failure. One of them had succeeded in imparting form to Chinese society, but it was altogether secularist, and tended continually to ignore everything invisible. The other was mystic and wild in its imaginations, becoming more and more a system of demonology. It was while brooding sadly over the deficiencies of these religious systems that the Emperor Ming-te, about A.D. 60, is said to have seen a vision of a gigantic and glorious figure. Consulting his Ministers of State upon it, they bade him seek over the western mountains for the interpretation. A deputation was accordingly sent, which returned accompanied by a Hindu teacher, who brought with him a collection of sacred books and a portrait of Sakya-Mouni. [BUDDHISM.] And thus Buddhism gained a footing in China, though it has never displaced the old religion. Some monarchs patronised, others persecuted it as a foreign religion. But the growing intercourse with India was favourable to the growth of Buddhism, which culminated with the fall of the Mongol dynasty in 1368. But the transcendentalism which characterises the Buddhism of India forms no part of the Fo-ism of the Chinese. There was probably no room for it in the matter-of-fact worldly sharpness of the Chinese character. The only genuine devotees are the monk dicants. The rest of the professed to confide in some particular to reverence the books, to abstain from vice, to support the monks. The Fo recognise the excellence of the morality, but hold Fo superior to as being an object of worship. Relations between Fo-ism and the Thibet will be considered under LA. Unlike other forms of Buddhism has no regular, graduated hierarchy, though, as we have said, a moral system is recognised, it is of a shadowy almost impalpable. Ethical writings are void of reference to his person; there are no precepts on duties. When the Buddhist monk is engaged in devotions by the sound of the wood block, he utters the aspiration that "all living beings may become enlightened;" there is no sympathy even to the Supreme, no sympathy even in the struggle against evil. The land is studded with Fo-ist temples, in the colossal form of Buddha and two or three are almost always seen; many of them, however, are in ruins, and the most meagre. Flowers and perfume are offered to him. But, generally, it is not the Buddha of India, Sakya, who is superseded by Amitábha, (i.e. "Infinite Light"), who is held to be a more perfect Buddha than Sakya, who is thought to have retired into seclusion. To Amitábha, enthroned on a lotus, the Fo-ist looks for deliverance from evil, and hopes to enter into the bliss of Nirvana. The history of this change of religion is obscure, but there seems strong reason to believe that the Christian missionaries of the seventh and following centuries did much to do with it. Fo-ism is a flower which when Christian preachers—Lao-tse and others—dared to plant in Peking, the speculation which the Chinese mind seems to have made of considerable adoption of Christianity and some mingling with it. The same thing showed itself in the case of the Taeping movement of the descriptions of Amitábha apparently borrowed from the Bible [see Christ and other religions, vol. ii., p. 102] and the thought of the New Testament altogether—namely, the holiness of heart and life, and blessedness. Thus, when Amitábha is declared to be the one to whom we should look to him who will be delivered from the phraseology seems in St. Paul's Epistles, the resulting in repentant monks of Fo-ism are their pupils in the professions and the immorality

GILBERT, Bishop of Hereford, and of London, lived in the twelfth century and was concerned in the controversy between Archbishop Becket and King Henry II. siding with the latter. We first met him as opposing Becket's election to the see of York. Some accused him of wanting to keep the archbishopric for himself, or the removal of the metropolitan See from Canterbury to Hereford. He was a pious, austere man, devoted to learning. In 1164 Foliot went to Rome (while Becket was in France), to defend the King's right to appoint and depose the Archbishop, and to accuse the Archbishop of resisting him, and on his return to England he sequestered the archbishopric of Canterbury.

In 1169, when Becket was re-elected, he was excommunicated, and had to go to Rome to have the sentence removed.

King Henry did penance in 1174 for the murder of Becket. Foliot preached the sermon, and said the King was guiltless, but the words had been misinterpreted. He

One Ritual Case.—This was tried under the Public Worship Act, and being regarded by both sides as a test case, was elaborately argued first before the Lord Penzance, and then (his judgment being appealed against) before the Privy Council. The "three aggrieved parties" made their representation on Jan. 11, 1875, the case was heard on Jan. 12 following, and judgment was given by Lord Penzance on Feb. 3rd. The points in dispute were the following:—

1. The use of lighted candles when not required by the rubrics.

2. The wearing of alb and chasuble.

3. The pouring of water with the Sacramental

4. The use of wafer bread.

5. The kneeling eastward during the consecration of the Eucharist.

6. The singing of the Agnus Dei after it.

7. The communicating with one person only.

8. The distinction between Matins and the Communion Service.

9. The procession round the church at evening prayer.

10. The placing of a crucifix (with candles) on the altar screen.

11. The hanging up of pictures, known as Stations of the Cross.

The majority of the Bench condemned each of these practices, and the incumbent (Rev. C. J. Ridsdale) appealed from the judgment upon the four marked thus.*

On these four was argued in Jan. and on May 12th the judgment was given. It is a most elaborate and careful document, expressed with great moderation and gentleness. It forbade the judgment whether such an ornament would be likely to be turned to superstitious uses. A correspondence between the Archbishop and Mr. Ridsdale ensued, in the course of which the latter declared that though he could not conscientiously admit the authority of the court, yet he should feel bound to obey the admonition of the Archbishop, if he would give him written authority to discontinue the practices in dispute. The authority was given, and peace was at once restored.

Followers of the Lord Jesus.—The name of a congregation so returned in the Registrar-General's Report.

Font.—The vessel which contains the water for the administration of Holy Baptism. As that sacrament is the admission into the spiritual temple, the Church of Christ, so it is natural that the instrument and symbol of baptism should be placed near the chief entrance or extreme west of the material temple. Great varieties of form and arrangement are found in ancient fonts, many of them being exquisite both in design and execution, showing that the greatest care and art had been lavished on them; and these have often been preserved through the successive changes which have come on the surrounding buildings. Thus it happens that we have many more Norman fonts than Norman churches. The first well-defined shape which the font assumes is that of a circular tub-shaped vessel, with little grace of form. Some of these may be Saxon. Many are certainly Norman. [BAPTISM; BAPTISTERY.]

Fontevraud, ORDER OF.—A religious Order of both men and women, founded by Robert of Arbrèsle in 1093, under the title of Pauperes Christi. The rules were very severe, involving total abstinence from flesh and wine. At one time there were a great number of devotees of this Order, and in fact it lasted until the great Revolution, when it was abolished.

Foot-pace.—The name given to the broad step immediately round the Lord's Table.

Forbes, ALEXANDER PENROSE, D.C.L. [b. 1817, d. 1875], Bishop of Brechin, one of the most able and learned theologians of his day, was the son of the eminent judge, Lord Medwyn. He went out to India, but his health becoming impaired, returned to England and became a student at Brasenose College, Oxford. He took his degree in 1844, and was ordained in Scotland, but soon after was appointed to the curacy of St. Saviour's, Leeds. After two years he was elected Bishop of Brechin, which post he held for almost thirty years. Bishop Forbes was an able and active writer, and an acute controversialist, his chief works being commentaries on the Canticles, the Penitential Psalms, the Te Deum, and the Writings of the Fathers. He also wrote explanations of the Nicene Creed and the Thirty-nine Articles.

He was the principal leader of what was called the "Catholic School" in Scotland, and a warm supporter of the old Scottish Communion office, for which he was severely censured by some of his countrymen. But even greater than his literary ability was his deep spirituality of character, which gave extraordinary power to his preaching, and it was remarkable that his Presbyterian neighbours were all proud of him, and testified their respect by crowding to his funeral. "He was a man," said Mr. Gladstone, "of devoted life and labour, of wide learning, of balanced mind, uniting with a strong grasp of Catholic principles the spirit of a true historic student, and a genuine zeal for literary culture."

Forbes, JOHN, a Scotch Episcopalian writer, was the son of Patrick Forbes, Bishop of Aberdeen. He was born in 1593, studied at Heidelberg, and in 1619 was appointed Professor of Divinity to Aberdeen University, a professorship founded by his father. During the struggle between the Episcopalians and Presbyterians he showed great toleration, but as one of the "Aberdeen Doctors" carried on a dispute with the Covenanters. In 1640 he was deprived of his office, and went to Holland, where he remained till 1646. While here he carried on a debate with Vossius, the celebrated Dutch scholar [VOSSIUS, GERARD], whether St. Augustine's opinion concerning Grace was agreeable to the doctrine of the Church in all ages. Forbes died in 1648, two years after his return to Aberdeen. His chief works are in favour of toleration, as Irenicum Amatoribus Veritatis et Pacis in Ecclesia Scotiana [1629] and A Peaceable Warning to the Subjects in Scotland [1638]. He also wrote Instructiones Historico-Theologicæ.

Formosus, Bishop of Porto, in Etruria, in the ninth century, succeeded Stephen V. as Pope. In 878 he had been excommunicated, with many others, by Pope John VIII., for having contested with the Pope the election of a new emperor, but Martin II. removed the sentence, and reinstated him in his See in 882. In February, 891, Formosus crowned Stephen V. as Pope, and when the latter died, later in the year, Formosus was elected as his successor. The election met with much opposition at Rome, for in the first place it was contrary to the canonical law that bishops should be translated from one See to another, and the fact that Formosus had previously been degraded and excommunicated was an additional reason against his claim. Besides this, a contrary faction had fixed upon Sergino as the new Pope, and were about to crown him when the partisans of Formosus interposed and persisted in inaugurating him. In 892 Formosus crowned Lambert, son of King Guido of Italy, as his father's colleague, but soon afterwards invited Arnulf, King of Germany, to take the crown, and actually crowned him at Rome in 895. Formosus died in 896, and his body was treated with great indignity by Stephen VI., who had long wished to occupy the Papal See.

Formulary.—A compilation of prayers or articles of belief. The Prayer Book may be called a formulary, as it contains the rites, ceremonies, and prescribed forms of the Church.

Fossarii, or Fossores ["Diggers"].—Men appointed by the early Church to bury the dead. This duty was at first performed voluntarily by the Christian brethren, but as Christianity spread it was found necessary to appoint men for the purpose, and this was done by the presbyters of the tituli of Rome at the people's expense.

Foster, JOHN [b. 1768, d. 1843].—A Baptist minister, best known for his excellent Essays. These were published in 1805, and comprise:—
1. On a Man's writing Memoirs of Himself; 2. On Decision of Character; 3. On the Application of the Epithet Romantic; 4. On some of the Causes by which Evangelical Religion has been rendered less acceptable to Persons of Cultivated Taste. These have passed through many editions, and are still considered models of clearness and purity in English style.

Fox, GEORGE, the founder of the Society of FRIENDS [q.v.], was born at Drayton, in Leicestershire, in 1624. He began by keeping sheep, and then was apprenticed to a shoemaker in Nottingham, till he was nineteen, when his religious impressions became so strong that he gave up his work, and wandered through the country. His friends persuaded him to return home, where he stayed for a short time, but again in 1646 he left them. He discontinued his attendance at public worship, saying that it had been revealed to him that it was not education, but the presence of God in the heart, that qualified for the ministry. He first began teaching his doctrine at Manchester in 1648, and at the same time started the customs peculiar to his followers, e.g. the adoption of the terms "thee" and "thou," the refusal to take any oaths, and the discontinuance of all tokens of respect, as taking off the hat, and using the word "sir." These customs, quite as much as his religious opinions in themselves, were causes of his persecution. After preaching at Manchester, he travelled through the midland counties, exhorting the people to give up all forms of vice and adopt the Christian graces. His followers were first known by the name of "Quakers" at Derby, in 1650. The rest of his life was taken up by teaching and imprisonment. In 1655 he was brought before Cromwell, who dismissed him, pronouncing his character and doctrine to be blameless. In 1671 he went to America, where he remained two years. On his return to England, he was imprisoned at Worcester, and then went to

1, St., the founder of the Order of cans [q.v.], was born at Assisi, in 1181. He was first christened

John, but when his father, Peter Bernardini, who had been trading in Franco, returned, he changed the name to Francesco. In his youth he was gay and fond of pleasure, but seems from the first to have been generous to the poor. He fought in one of the wars that were perpetually breaking out between Assisi and Perugia, and being captured remained in prison a year. When he was twenty-five he fell sick, and on his recovery had lost all delight in his former pleasures. He felt he had something better in him, and while he was pausing to decide he heard that Walter of Brienne was about to set out against the Germans, so Francis joined. When he had marched as far as Spoleto he was taken ill again, and saw a vision telling him to return home, which he did. He now utterly changed his manner of life. Calling poverty "his bride," he resolved never to refuse alms to any poor person, travelled to Rome, where he threw down all the gold he had on the altar at St. Peter's, exchanged clothes with the beggars outside, and began to beg with them. His father not understanding him, shut him up for some time, and brought him before the Bishop, in whose presence St. Francis declared "Peter Bernardini was my father; I have now but one Father, He that is in heaven." He spent some time tending the lepers in the hospital at Gubbio, and on his return to Assisi, began to build up the ruined church of St. Damian, begging the materials, and working with his own hands. In time his townsmen saw his earnestness, ceased to despise him, and eventually many joined in his work. He afterwards assisted in the restoration of the churches of St. Peter, and St. Maria degli Angeli or the Portiuncula. One day, according to tradition, on the Feast of St. Barnabas, 1208, he heard the text, "Provide neither gold nor silver nor brass in your purses, nor scrip for your journey, neither two coats, neither shoes, nor yet staves. And as ye go, preach, saying, The kingdom of heaven is at hand." This he looked upon as a direct message to him, so he began preaching. He soon gained followers, the first two being Bernard di Quintavalle and Pietro de Catania, both fellow-townsmen. He chose a rule for them, by opening the Gospels three times, and taking the texts thus found. He went to Rome, and gained the approval of Pope Innocent III., though at first only by word of mouth. They then settled at the Portiuncula, going continually on missionary journeys. In 1219 St. Francis went to preach to the Mohammedans, with some of the brethren, where he was taken before the Sultan, and offered to enter a fire with the priests of Islam, to show the truth of his words. It is said that on his return to Assisi he saw a vision of the Crucifixion, and ever afterwards bore marks of nails on his hands and feet, and a wound in his side. He died two years later, Oct. 4th, 1226. He was the author of many sermons, treatises, and hymns.

Francis of Paula, founder of the Franciscan Order of the Minims, was born at Paula, in Calabria, in 1416. He entered the monastery of San Marco on his return from pilgrimage with his parents to his patron saint, St. Francis of Assisi, but soon afterwards withdrew to a cave near Reggio and became a hermit. His fame soon spread, and he was joined by many, so that by 1436 he founded an Order. They followed the Franciscans, to whose three vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience, they added a fourth of perpetual fasting, and kept Lent the whole year. Francis gave them the motto of "Charity." Sixtus IV. confirmed the Order in 1476, and Alexander VI. gave them the title of Minims, because they called themselves the least of all in the Church of God. Francis grew famed as a miracle-worker, and Louis XI., who was dying at Plessis-le-Tours, sent for him and implored him to prolong his life, which the Saint declared his inability to do. Louis's successors, Charles VIII. and Louis XII., kept Francis in France, where he founded many monasteries, and died in 1507. He was canonised by Leo X. in 1519, and Charles VIII. founded and endowed the church of Trinita de Monti at Rome in his honour.

Francis of St. Domingo.—A Portuguese Dominican, whose pious zeal led him and several of his brother-monks to undertake missionary work in the Philippine Islands. They laboured with much success here. He then went on to Formosa, and converted many pagans to Christianity. At length, in his endeavours to reconcile the people and the governing body, who were engaged in a cruel civil war, he lost his life, being shot to death with arrows, A.D. 1633.

Francis of Sales, Sr., Bishop and Prince of Geneva, and founder of the Order of the Visitation, was born in the castle of Sales, near Annecy, in Savoy, on Aug. 21st, 1567. He studied in the college of Annecy, and, finding himself inclined to the profession of an ecclesiastic, took the clerical tonsure at eleven years of age, and afterwards travelled to Paris, where he remained under the care of the Jesuits. He studied under Genebrard and Maldonatus till 1584, when he went to Padua, to study civil law under Panciroli. Here he made the acquaintance of the Jesuit Antonio Possevino. Francis gained a great reputation for his learning and piety, and commenced Doctor in Laws. He then made a journey to Rome, returning by Loreto and Venice to Savoy. He found that his father had obtained for him the appointment of counsellor to the senate of Chambery, but St. Francis had become possessed by a great desire to devote himself wholly to the Church. Being the eldest son, he was very unwilling to inform his father, so in his perplexity consulted his cousin, Louis of Sales, Canon of Geneva, through whose mediation Count of Sales was reluctantly induced to surrender his son. Thus, in 1590 he was ordained. He at once began to preach, and attracted all who heard him by his full and pleasant voice and his earnest manner. He was made Prior of the Collegiate Church at Annecy. In 1594 he was sent as one of the missionaries to the valleys of Savoy. The city of Annecy, which was an independent republic, had gained possession of the territories of Terni, and Gaillard, all peopled with heretics and Calvinists. Claude de La Roche, Bishop of Geneva, wishing to reconquer them to their former faith, sent out several missionaries, among them Francis and Louis. It is said that when they arrived at Tonon, the capital of Chablais, it contained only seven Roman Catholics, but on the Eve, 1597, eight hundred persons were admitted to the Holy Communion. Francis made an attempt to convert Beza [q.v.]. On his return to Annecy, in 1599 he was appointed coadjutor Bishop of Geneva under the title of Nicopolis. At first he refused, but consented at the request of Pope Sixtus VIII. He was obliged to defer his departure, being seized with an illness which proved fatal; but he recovered, and returned to France to resume his missionary labours. Cardinal Perron used to say that Francis could confute any heretic, but that his gentleness and persuasion could not be effectual without the assistance of the coadjutor. His coadjutor was Father Berulle, afterwards Cardinal. He succeeded him as to the rule for the regulation of the Oratory. Henry IV. with his preaching, offered him 20,000 livres pension and the first vacant bishopric. He refused and returned to Savoy. On the 1st of May, 1602, he heard that Granier was dead, and now sole bishop. He retired for two months to prepare himself for his consecration, which took place on Dec. 8th, 1602. His first object was to reform his diocese and all the religious houses, after which he turned to his work of preaching to the people, of whom he is said to have converted 72,000. In 1610 he began the Order of the Visitation, with the help of the Abbess of Chantal. In 1618, finding that he was failing, he appointed his brother Francis of Sales, his coadjutor, with the title of Bishop of Chalcedon. Francis died of a paralytic stroke at Lyons, Dec. 28th, 1622. He was buried at Lyons, but his remains were transferred to Annecy on July 1st, 1623, the day which his festival is held by the Church. St. Francis wrote many discourses, of which the chief is Discourse on a Devout Life.

Francis Xavier. [XAVIER] Franciscans.—One of the

indicant, Grey, or Preaching Friars [FRIARS], who took their name from their founder, St. Francis of Assisi. The society of Fraterculi ("Little Brothers") by which name Francis ordained his disciples should be called, was patronized by Innocent III., and afterwards by Honorius III. in 1223; for the purpose of that it might in some degree correct the corrupt state of the Church. The first came to England in the reign of Henry III., and set up an establishment at Oxford in 1224, and, like the Dominicans, acquired much of the wealth and influence which formerly belonged to the regular clergy.

As an instance of the way in which they accomplished this purpose and their way, the following bold story is recorded. Some of their brethren on the way to Oxford when overtaken by a storm, and coming for shelter in a Benedictine abbey. The abbot believed that they were on an anticipatory sport, gave orders that they should not be admitted, but finding the desperate state of the case, he refused to give them the shelter that they asked, and shut the doors. A young monk who had been with them, gave them some food, and a hay-loft for the night. After going to bed himself, and dreamt that a devil appeared, and charged the monk for having neglected to carry out the duty which he had appointed, upon which he commanded that the abbot should

Then St. Francis came and showed to the young monk who had been with the Franciscans; upon which he went to tell the abbot, but found that the rest of the monks strangled in the report of this tragedy circulated about England, and thenceforward the friars met with a better reception. Their power was increased they benefited for their theology, which was different from that of the time, though they showed much subtilty and ingenuity in their sermons; and they did not confine themselves to the instruction of members of the society, but travelled about through the country preaching for the benefit of all who would listen. About this time colleges were instituted at the universities, and in three centuries the most learned were added to this Order. In course of time more ancient Orders were roused up to rival the Franciscans in their colleges were endowed at Oxford and Cambridge for the accommodation of the students from the different monasteries. In the dissolution of the monasteries, they had fifty-five houses in England.

SEBASTIAN [b. at Donauworth, Ireland, 1542].—He at first held a post as Evangelical preacher, but resigned it in 1528 in order to join the Anabaptists. Not being satisfied with their creed, he determined to be independent of any particular sect, and to follow the line of an eclectic. He believed all sin to be of equal magnitude, and maintained that men ought to follow the dictates of the Holy Spirit, without attending much to the letter. With the intention of spreading his opinions, he set up a printing press as his means of livelihood, and published many theological works, some of them opposing the doctrines of the Romish Church, and some those of the Protestant. He contrived by this means to draw upon himself the indignation of both parties; and the divines of the Augsburg Confession, who met at Smalcald in 1540, entrusted Melancthon with the task of confuting Franck's fanaticism. The latter suffered much persecution, and was driven from place to place. Luther occasionally took part in the storm raised against him.

Francke, AUGUST HERMANN [b. 1663, d. 1727], a native of Lubeck, was an eminent religious teacher of his day, but more famous for his practical philanthropy. In 1698, having for the previous three years gathered into his house a large number of poor orphans, he founded for them at Halle the first Orphan Home, the model of many which have been founded since. It grew mightily—so much so that he had 2,000 orphans under his care when he died. He had never appealed to Government for help in this good work: his benevolence and wisdom were so widely known, that voluntary contributions flowed in unasked. He had set them to work as printers, and now the establishment is one of the greatest publishing houses in Germany.

Franconia, HOUSE OF.—This family was the second great line, after the Karlings, which ruled over the "Holy Roman Empire." The Franconian period followed the Saxon [SAXONY, HOUSE OF], and comprised the reigns of four Emperors—viz. Conrad II. [1024–39], Henry III. [1039–56], Henry IV. [1056–1106], Henry V. [1106–25]. During this period the Pope shook off the Imperial yoke, and began the fight for supremacy, which lasted almost three hundred years. The clergy and secular princes united against the Emperors, and took advantage of the Papal efforts to secure their own independence. Henry III. made two expeditions to Rome, and called a synod to depose three rival Popes—Sylvester III., Benedict IV., and Gregory VI., appointing in their place a German, under the name of Clement II. The great struggle of Henry IV. against Hildebrand is told under the name of GREGORY VI. In the reign of Henry V. the investiture question was settled by the Concordat of Worms. [CONCORDAT.]

elemosynam, "in free alms." Such tenants were bound to offer prayers, masses, or other Divine Services for the souls of the grantors and their heirs, and therefore were quit of temporal duty or service for such possessions. It was by this tenure that almost all ancient monasteries held their possessions, and many of the parochial clergy. At the Reformation the tenure of frankalmoigns was continued, though the nature of the services was "altered, and made conformable to the purer doctrine of the Church of England" [Blackstone].

Franks.—The name of a powerful Teutonic tribe, who exercised the greatest influence upon the history of modern Europe. They established themselves within the boundaries of the Roman Empire, in the latter part of the fifth century, pushing the Goths into the south-west part of France, and establishing a kingdom, which they strengthened by entering into close alliance with the orthodox clergy, the Goths having alienated them by holding Arian doctrines. Two great dynasties succeeded each other in the beginnings of the Frankish kingdom. The first was the Merovingian, the first monarch of which was Clovis [q.v.], the second the Carolingian, named after Charles Martel. In the latest historical form of nomenclature, these two lines are known as the Meerwings and the Karlings. The greatest member of the latter race was Charles the Great, commonly known as Charlemagne, the grandson of Charles Martel. [CHARLES.] His coronation as Emperor of the West, in 800, was the restoration of the Roman Empire, which, in fact, had never ceased in theory to exist. Henceforward it was known as the "Holy Roman Empire," and it continued, though with many changes, until the year 1806, when Napoleon put an end to it. [ROMAN EMPIRE.]

Fraternity.—A term applied to some religious societies formed for mutual improvement, or chiefly to insure a regular attendance on the ordinances of the Church, or the performance of certain devotional practices.

Fraticelli.—A name given to a body of Franciscan friars, who formed themselves into an independent community under two Minorite monks, by the authority of Pope Celestine V., who established them by a Bull in 1294. They made a vow of poverty, and lived on the charity of the populace. The Fraticelli were much hated by the other Franciscans, and in 1302 Pope Boniface VIII. dissolved the Bull, upon which the brethren fled into Sicily, and united themselves with the sect of the Beghards, to whom they declared that they were filled with the Holy Spirit, and no longer needed the sacraments, being free from sin. Clement V. endeavoured to conciliate them, without success, in 1312; and, as their fanaticism continued to spread, John XXII. had recourse to the Inquisition, which he entrusted with the task of stamping out the heresy. From this time the sect gradually disappeared, or became merged in other sects of heretics. They based their doctrine chiefly upon a commentary on the Revelation, by Peter John Oliva, a friar of the monastery of Béziers.

Free-will.—The Necessarian or fatalist view of actions and events can never be conciled with the felt freedom of the will. As long as self-consciousness and determination co-exist in every man's mind, every man will feel himself a free and responsible agent, be the arguments on the other side what they may. As regards self-consciousness, the very power to think implies the separate existence of the thinker; the faculty of perception, whether the object perceived be material or mental, shows the existence of the inner self that perceives. With respect to self-determination, exercise of free-will is implied in the term. If the mind were under impressions from without, there would be no self-consciousness, and if thought and desires from within could not be resisted, there could be no praise nor blame, no merit nor demerit. The Necessarian view then, which thus takes away the instinctive feelings of human responsibility, can never be practically accepted by the sense of mankind at large. Society would become impossible under such conditions, and, as it has been well observed, we should have no more reason to resent the stab of an assassin than the random kick of a horse.

was employed as a substitute by those less able to afford it. This style of painting was adopted later by Christians, and in mural decorations they even copied the designs of heathen painters, taking care to exclude any- thing idolatrous, and to introduce devices symbolic of their own faith. For a long time they refrained from illustrating scenes from Christ's life, in their horror of anything con- nected with idolatry, and contented themselves with conventional designs or arabesques. The earliest fresco paintings of Christian art are in the Campo Santo at Pisa (end of four- teenth century), in the Church of Assisi, in the Cathedrals of Orvieto and Siena, and in the San Spirito at Florence. The art reached its zenith in the hands of Raffaello and Michel Angelo, and after their time gradually declined. It was again revived in the present century by the skill of the German painters Cornelius, Overbeck, Kaulbach, and others. One of the principal patrons of the restored art was Ludwig II., King of Bavaria, and the Ludwigs-Kirche and other public buildings of Munich are resplendent with modern frescoes. There is a very fine one at All Saints' Church, Margaret Street, London, by Mr. Dyce.

Frewen, ACCEPTED, eldest son of John Frewen, rector of Northiam, in Sussex, was born in 1588. He was educated in the Free School at Canterbury, and afterwards at Mag- dalen College, Oxford, where he was demy, Fellow, and divinity-reader. He then went as chaplain to the Earl of Bristol to Germany and Spain. While he was in the latter place Charles I., then Prince of Wales, heard him preach, and the sermon made a great impres- sion on him, so that when he became king Frewen was made one of the chaplains. He afterwards became President of Magdalen College, where he continued about eighteen years, and was four times Vice-Chancellor, as well as Dean of Gloucester and prebendary of Canterbury. In 1644 he became Bishop of Coventry and Lichfield, where he stayed till 1660, when he became Archbishop of York. He died in 1664, and is buried under the east window of York Cathedral. He was one of the members of the Hampton Court Confer- ence.

Freylinghausen, JOHANN ANASTASIUS [b. 1670, d. 1739].—A German theological writer of the Pietist school, and a writer of some very beautiful hymns, several of which have been translated in Miss Winkworth's Lyra Germanica, and thence have found their way into most of our popular hymn-books.

Friar [Lat. frater, Fr. frère].—This name is applied now to all Orders of monks, but it was formerly the distinguishing title of the Mendicant Orders, of which the four principal ones were the Franciscans, or Grey Friars, founded 1210; the Dominicans, or Black Friars [1216]; the Carmelites, or White Friars [1245]; and the Augustines [1256].

Friars, OBSERVANT, or Observantines.

—A branch of the Franciscans, who in the thirteenth century separated themselves from their brethren, on account of the relaxation in discipline permitted by their minister-general, Elias of Cortona. The Observantines desired to keep up the original strictness of their rule, and lived apart in places of their own choosing, after the manner of hermits, while their brethren remained in the convents, living under the relaxed rule, and were called Conventuals.

Friday. [WEEK.]

Fridolin, St.—A native of Ireland, who followed the example of Columbanus by going missionary journeys on the Continent of Europe. He is memorable for the monastery he founded on the banks of the Rhine, near Beckingen.

Fridstole, or Frith-stool.—Literally, "the stool of peace." Formerly there were in certain churches, of which Hexham and Beverley are examples, stone seats placed near the altar for those who claimed the privilege of sanctuary. Any criminal escaping to one of these might enjoy his life and liberty.

Friends, THE SOCIETY OF.—A religious body, commonly known by the name of "Quakers," founded in 1646 by George Fox, the son of a Leicestershire weaver, whose tenets stand in the strongest antagonism to what we may call external worship, and who, it has been well said, offer the remarkable spectacle of a Christian body "without a creed, a liturgy, a priesthood, or a sacrament." The name Quakers was given to the Friends by Gervase Bennett, a magistrate, on Fox exhorting him to tremble at the Word of God. Fox was only twenty-two when he commenced to preach his doctrines. Amongst these he taught that preaching, to be effectual, must come from the direct operation of the Holy Spirit on the soul, and that therefore it was not necessary to have a separate order of men educated for the ministry, but that the humblest person, whether male or female, who had an inward call from the Spirit of God, was qualified for the office of a Christian preacher. He abandoned all the ceremonies which the Reformation had allowed to survive, even the rites of baptism and the celebration of the Lord's Supper, holding them as outward signs which had in them the danger of gradually coming to be regarded as possessing in themselves the saving power which they were meant only to represent. He allowed no proscribed form of devotion, saying that the silent converse of the soul is as acceptable a worship to God as the utterance of prayer and praise. He opposed all adornment of places of worship, the use of music in the praise of God, observance of fasts, whether as private. As regards other matters ample evidence that Fox and his leaguers as a body held firmly what is commonly understood as the fundaments of the Gospel, which are set forth with clearness in a letter on Christian doctrine addressed to the Governor of Barbados. At a somewhat later period the Friends of Penn and Barclay gave a more definite form to the principles of the Society.

The Friends profess to endeavour out the admonitions of the New Testament in a literal and practical sense, and to the spirit of Christ's teaching in all relations of life. Thus, in obedience to the injunction not to swear, they refuse an oath in a court of justice; to swear they consider involves a denunciation of all war, and consequently refuse military service; not to render honour to other was carried out by ignoring all complimentary salutations and bows, and by addressing every individual by Christian name, and the singular "thee" and "thou." They also show great simplicity of dress and have refused to join in any frivolous amusements such as cards, dancing, etc., even drama, music and art. These points were in general, and even carried to great extent, but of late years considerable changes have been observable in the practice of the Friends in these respects, especially amongst the younger members. The greater portion still speak and dress plainly and unobtrusively, otherwise like other people; and recently the Yearly Meeting authorities withdrew the customary insistence on "plainness of speech, behaviour, and dress," leaving such matters to the conscience of individual members, whilst art and drama are no longer frowned upon.

Whilst professing to bring all to the test of the Holy Scriptures, the authority of which is fully acknowledged, Friends believe that the help of the Holy Spirit who inspired them is needed for right understanding, and that, more than light of the Spirit truly shines in the human mind, and if heeded, and its teaching obeyed, is a present guide and comfort to him. This doctrine of the "Inward," which they believe is given to all men—as well as Christians—in sufficient measure, is their central, cardinal, and principle. In their public worship, they wait in silence for the immediate influence of the Spirit on the heart, allowing individuals to engage in preaching or prayer—and men and women—who really believe themselves called of God to do so, and give gifts acceptable to their brethren, of true gifts, as well as of sincerity and consistency. They allow at such times

ing, even of the Scriptures, and were never read at all in their p; but of late, in many meetings of publicly reading a portion at the commencement of the meeting. They do not, however, consider themselves to be dependent upon any authority whatever, regarding the conduct of the assembled members, if so be it a normal state of things, as is the case with God, and equally beneficial to who can engage in it. They attach sanctity to one day more than regarding the Sabbath as a Jewish law, away with by Christianity, alike as claimed by the Son of God. They consider it in accordance with the will to give up one day out of seven for public worship, and to the good of the soul as to rest and meditation.

One of the community of Friends is known as the Presbyterian. They have regular meetings: Monthly Meetings composed of the congregations from the neighbourhood, who choose Elders to watch the ministry, and Overseers to attend to the education of the children of such as are in humble circumstances, provision for the poor, and to their duties. At these meetings are sanctioned previous to their public worship; the Friends are taught to be "not a mere civil communion, but a divine ordinance, and that it is the will of God alone to join persons in a covenant, and the interference of man an assumption altogether unlawful. Holy Scripture, or the example of the Holy Church." Quarterly Meetings receive general reports from the Monthly Meetings, and to hear appeals and decisions; and the Yearly Meeting—the general superintendence of the whole of a particular country, London comprehending the whole of Britain. Formal discipline or orders are at its inception considered in their own principal tenet by the earlier Friends, and much controversy and others.

It did not rise till the Revolution, the Friends were much persecuted, except during the reign of Charles II.'s reign, when they obtained some indulgence for his folly. The early persecutions were largely due to their refusal to swear, and to the ecclesiastical supremacy by the tithes and church-rates; but not considerably increased by the manner in which some of them acted against "man-ministry" and man authorities. There can be no doubt that some of the excesses of the Friends—as Nayler and others—were a disorder of mind, caused by an age peculiarly given to religious fanaticism.* Since 1688 the Friends have benefited by the Toleration Act. In 1833 the British Legislature recognised the objection of Friends to taking oaths, and the simple affirmation of a Friend has since that time been accepted in place of it. This, the legal recognition of their marriages, and other privileges, have been won solely by the power of passive resistance, and are a singular proof of the efficacy of it.

By the year 1652 the Society of Friends had spread through all the northern counties, and by the time of the Restoration there were meetings not only throughout Great Britain and Ireland, but in the West Indies and British America. They are more numerous now in America than in England. The founding of the colony of Pennsylvania by William Penn induced many of the British Friends to emigrate thither, and the free institutions of the New World favoured the increase of the Quaker communities in other States also. Like other bodies, they have been somewhat weakened by division or secession: indeed, their leading tenet was peculiarly likely to lead to great differences of view, and there can be little doubt that some of the earlier and stricter Friends placed the inward teaching of the Spirit in reality above that of the Scriptures themselves. This doctrine of the "Inward Light" was pushed to excess in the earlier part of the present century by Elias Hicks, a very popular minister in the United States, and a man of remarkable powers. He ultimately embraced—if he had not held them all along—Unitarian views, which were widely spread amongst other American Friends; and the result of the controversy which could not but arise upon such a vital point, was a great schism, about one-half of the body in America seceding, and being known as Hicksite Friends, holding Arian views, and the remainder being known as Orthodox Friends. The reaction against the Hicksites was carried too far in the opinion of some of the stricter of the Orthodox Friends, and the result was a second small secession, who followed John Wilbur, and who adhere more closely than the main body to the peculiarities and original tenets of the founders of the Society. In England Friends were almost unanimously orthodox, and the Hicksite controversy excited great alarm. Isaac Crewdson, an acknowledged minister of Manchester, published a small book called The Beacon, containing extracts from the writings of older Friends, of which many could be cited, placing the "Inward Light" apparently above the authority of Scripture, and pointing out their dangerous tendency. Such a course provoked retorts, in which many joined who were as orthodox as Crewdson and his party, but who resented the implied censure brought upon their predecessors. This controversy—known amongst Friends as The Beacon controversy, from the title of Crewdson's publication—also grew in sharpness, and the result was that all over the United Kingdom a considerable number of Friends left the Society. This secession, however (about 1836), was merely of individuals, who mostly joined other Christian bodies, and never became a separate communion. The body in England, so far as known, is now not only uniformly orthodox, but in practice, as pointed out above, has approximated perceptibly in many points to that of other Christians, especially in regard to greater recognition of the desirability of audible ministry, and the partial use of the Scriptures in public worship. In at least one large mission conducted by Friends (at Bristol) even hymns are employed, as at ordinary mission-halls; and although the Friends would not consider such a meeting as one of their own, still such practice marks a change, which in the early part of the present century it would have been impossible to foresee. This change is distinctly traceable to the controversy here briefly described, and gives it considerable importance in the history of the Society.

* James Nayler had formerly been an officer in Cromwell's army, a fact which increased the fury of his Puritan persecutors. At an early stage of his disorder he was remonstrated with, and finally disowned by Friends for his excesses, and was punished in the most barbarous and torturing manner, to which death would have been preferable, both at London and Bristol, bearing his sufferings with unexampled fortitude. For a full account of them see Sewall's History of Friends, and also Seyer's History of Bristol. At a later period, when Nayler returned to his right mind, he himself recanted his errors, expressed deep repentance for his excesses, was received again by his friends into full communion, and died in perfect peace. Nothing can be more distressing than to read how men who chiefly needed the kind care of a judicious physician were tortured in a manner worthy of the Inquisition; while in New England, not only male but female Friends were actually hung by the Puritans for returning after banishment.

The number of Friends in Great Britain and Ireland at the end of 1884 was about 18,000, to which should be added about 5,000 regular attendants of their worship, though not formally in membership, which is guarded somewhat strictly. There are small communities in the South of France, Germany, Norway, etc. They are most numerous in America, where they are believed to number from 50,000 to 60,000, and the total number in the whole world is probably from 90,000 to 110,000. They have at no time exceeded 200,000 in total numbers, and nothing is more remarkable than the extraordinary influence in religious, social, and even political life exercised by so small a body. Owing to their rejection of any paid ministry, they are not able to "organise" foreign missions on any large scale, but of late years an association has been formed by some members, which supports missions in Madagascar, worked in harmony with the London Missionary Society; one in Palestine conducted by Theophilus Waldemeir, one of the captives rescued by our country from King Abyssinia; and in India. They have some mission work in Japan, and Constantinople. What they do thoroughly done. Their principles should be done for love, and nothing for merit; and ministers who are led to any service from home, are entertained by other Friends, or have their wants supplied. Their home mission work, however large, and very practical in character, as regards their Sabbath-schools. In Great Britain the number of scholars is 36,000, or fully double the number of total membership, which is a parallel. Not being fettered by ideas about Sabbath-keeping, they have a long period taught writing, and useful knowledge, in their Sunday schools, and the result in attracting, and improving their scholars among the poorest classes, is eloquent testimony to their freedom of operation. In Sheffield alone, some 2,000 scholars are under care in "First-day Schools," of which 500 attend regularly their work, as it is of any outward attraction, and in after-life join the Society. They are amongst the originators of, and in support, the Bible Society; and they are as a body in the relief of distress (in support of their own poor, which is taken by them), the suppression of prison reform and mission-work [FRIENDS], and other philanthropic of need reference.

Friends were undoubtedly much affected in England by the events mentioned, and for many years were steadily declining in numbers. A Quaker zeal appears, indeed, to have with the cessation of persecution and the difference between the missionary spirit of Fox and his successors the quietism of their descendants marked. Recently, however, they appear to be again slightly increasing chiefly amongst the working classes, and further and authoritative statements of doctrine and discipline, see The Christian Discipline of the Religious Society of Friends, published by the Yearly Meeting, and the Yearly Meeting's annual. The book cited and the annual are the only official exponents of the Society, being the work of special committees by the Yearly Meeting, and formally approved by that body.

Friends of Light.—A sect of Rationalists, originating in Prussia in 1841. They applied the principles of Platonism to the Lutheran doctrine, and interpreting it by the spirit of the nineteenth century, in the spirit of necessity in the letter, and asserting freedom of the intellect. In 1845 forbade them to do so, but they still exist.

[b. 1503, d. 1533], born at Smithfield. He was who had been brought from Italy to be a student of his Christ Church, Oxford, but of other opinions, and, more than an intimate friendship with Thomas More, denying the authority and the efficacy of papal bulls. He was committed to the block, and would have escaped death if not for a confinement written against him. He was the first English Protestant doctrine of the Reformation's Martyrs, ed. Stoughton, nastic gown of coarse cloth, sleeves, and fastened round the waist with a girdle or rope. Some parts of the frock, but it was made of it.

HARD HURRELL [b. 1803, d. 1868] was one of the Fellows of Oriel College, one of the beginning of the movement; an enthusiastic friend of Mr. Newman. The latter has written in his Apologia to his portrait "he hated the Reformation," an advocate of the celibacy of the clergy, and of devotion to the Blessed Virgin. His friends travelled together in France, and Froude's influence upon him was very great. Failure of health forced him to quit Oxford, and he went to the West Indies, only returning in 1868. Keble published his Devotional Journals, letters, and sermons after his death; and his portrait by Froude, the historian, has interesting notices of him in his Tractarian Movement.

St. Frumentius, the Apostle of Ethiopia, began his ministry in 330, during the reign of Constantine the Great. According to the tradition, Meropius, a merchant, was returning from Ethiopia, on his way home, and there, leaving two children, died. These were brought to the emperor, who was pleased with their intelligence, and made them part of his household. On his death with the emperor, Frumentius afterwards became a monk, and after working for some time as a missionary, was consecrated bishop by St. Athanasius, under the name of Salama, or "father of peace." He was distinguished by establishing Christianity in Ethiopia, and by his untiring energy and zeal for the cause. The translation of the New Testament into the native language is sometimes ascribed to Frumentius, though there is evidence to show that this was not done till the fifth or sixth century.

Fry, ELIZABETH, daughter of Mr. John Gurney, born near Norwich in 1780—an eminent philanthropist, who is sometimes called "the female Howard." She was a Quaker, but not brought up in their strictest notions, and in her early girlhood was somewhat sceptical; but the preaching of William Savery, an American Quaker, was the means of settling her doubts, and she became a "plain Friend." In 1800 she married Joseph Fry, who had a large business in London. Early in 1813 the utterly miserable state of the female prisoners in Newgate attracted her attention, and she at once set about trying to improve their condition, going amongst them, preaching and ministering also to their bodily comfort. In 1817 she formed a ladies' committee for the reformation of the female prisoners, and established a school and manufactory within the prison. The following year she turned her attention to benefiting the female convicts under sentence of transportation. The improvements made through her intervention at Newgate were carried into other prisons. She visited also the prisons in Belgium, France, Germany, and Holland, striving to get amendments in prison discipline. She took a vast interest in the abolition of slavery, and endeavoured to improve the British seamen by instituting libraries in the coastguard and Royal Navy ships, stored with religious and educational books. She was highly esteemed as a preacher amongst her own sect. She died at Ramsgate in 1845, and was buried at Barking, in Essex.

Fulda, MONASTERY OF.—One of the most famous monasteries of Germany, founded, under Benedictine rules, by St. Boniface, the Apostle of Germany, in 744. Its first abbot was St. Sturm [q.v.], and under him and some of his successors it so flourished that it became the very centre of German learning and progress. The Emperor Otto I. gave its abbot the title of Archchancellor of the Realm. It was not destroyed at the Reformation, but its importance and influence dwindled from that period.

Fulgentius, Bishop of Ruspe, in Africa, born at Telepte, in North Africa, in 468; died at Ruspe, 533. Though of noble birth, he devoted himself to a life of seclusion and asceticism, and lived for a short time in a monastery. Driven thence by the persecutions of King Thrasimund, who was an Arian, and a bitter enemy of the Christians, Fulgentius travelled for a time in Italy and the south of Europe. On his return he was made Bishop of Ruspe in 508, but was not long allowed to remain in charge of his diocese. He was banished with many other bishops, and sent into exile in Sardinia, where he lived till the death of Thrasimund in 523, spending most of his time in theological writing. His chief works were treatises against the Arians, and he wrote also de Incarnatione, Predestinatione, et Gratia. In 532 he retired to a monastery, and remained there till his death.

Fuller, Thomas, the Church historian, was born in 1608, at Aldwinckle, in Northamptonshire, of which place his father was the clergyman. He went in 1620 to Queen's College, Cambridge, and became M.A. in 1628. He was ordained, and in 1638 became prebendary of Salisbury. Here he wrote his first literary work, a poem which is now forgotten. From Salisbury he went to Dorset, becoming rector of Broadwindsor. While here he married, but his wife soon died. In 1640 he wrote his first prose work, The Holy War, a History of the Crusades, and in the same year became member of the Convocation at Westminster. Two years after appeared his Holy and Profane State. He had given great offence to the Puritans by a sermon which he had preached at the Abbey; now refusing to take an oath to the Parliament, except on certain reservations, he joined the King's party at Oxford, where he managed in the pulpit to disgust the Royalists as much as he had the Roundheads. However, he obtained a chaplaincy in the royal army, and employed his leisure time while travelling through the country in collecting materials for his future work, The Worthies of England. In 1648 the Earl of Carlisle presented him to the rectory of Waltham. Here he immediately set about the quaintest of all his writings, Palestine. He managed to pass the "Triers," and continued his ministerial functions during the Commonwealth. In 1656 he wrote his Church History of Britain, to which was appended the History of Cambridge and of Waltham Abbey. In 1658 he was presented to the living of Cranford, in Middlesex, and was within sight of a bishopric at the Restoration, when he died in 1661. He was buried at Cranford.

The chief characteristics of Fuller's writings are their quaintness and humour, which show themselves in every page—indeed, in almost every line. His works are very voluminous, but never grow tedious. Wherever the reader opens one there is always something to instruct and amuse. He is rarely satirical, and the little satire he shows is never bitter, but always good-natured. He has been compared to Jeremy Taylor and Edmund Burke, but in some points is very unlike both. See a very brilliant essay upon his life and works by Mr. Henry Rogers.

Fullo, Peter, a follower of the Eutychian heresy in the fifth century. He had been a monk, but was expelled from his monastery on account of his errors, and for some time lived a licentious life at Constantinople. The interest of some friends he was introduced into the family of Zeno, son-in-law of emperor Leo, and by a show of piety won his favour. Zeno, being made Cæsar, came to Antioch, the capital of his province, bringing Fullo with him. There were many followers of Apollinarius in the city, joined with them in charging the Bishop of Antioch, with heresy. Through his agency Martyrius was made Bishop of Constantinople, and Fullo usurped the Pope Simplicius deposed him, and took an interest with Zeno to get him elected before this could be effected Fullo's party assassinated Bishop Stephen. Zeno restored his former bishopric in 482. During his episcopate he published a new heresy, adding to the credo the words "Who was crucified for us" and so declaring that the three Persons of the Trinity had suffered. He refused when admonished by the other bishops to leave the Church to do so.

Gabriel Sionita, a learned Syrian, was born at Edden, a village in Lebanon, in 1577. He studied at the College in Rome, where he became professor of the Syriac and Arabic languages. He was sent for to Paris, where he became professor in 1614. He brought with him many Arabic Bibles which he had copied, and the manuscripts in Rome; and the first printed in M. le Jay's Bible. He was also the author of an Arabic grammar and geography entitled Geographia Nova et Doctrina Christiana ad usum doctissimi. He died at Paris in 1648.

Gaianites.—A sect of the Manichees which arose in the sixth century. It took its name from its leader, Gaianus, who was a deacon of Alexandria, and on the death of Timotheus III. was chosen bishop of Alexandria by the monks and people, in opposition to the Emperor's nominee. After Gaianus was deposed, and fled to the desert, he held the same opinions as Julianus, viz. that after the union of the human and divine natures in Christ, His Body was immortal, and that He suffered neither hunger nor any other infirmity to which we are subject by the laws of natural necessity. They were also called Julianists and Aphthartodocetes.

abdicated, and Galerius became sole ruler. He changed the order of death to the Chris- tians to that of mutilation, but in 308 the persecutions became worse than ever, and it is said that from then till 310 more blood was shed than in any other two years in Roman history. In the latter year the Emperor being seized by an incurable disease was frightened, and at once made an edict of toleration. He died May, 311.

Galilee.—A porch or chapel at the entrance of a church; a term also sometimes applied to the western portion of the nave. It was considered scarcely as sacred as the rest of the church, and in it it was customary to place dead bodies awaiting their burial, and also women might here meet and converse with the monks who were their near relations. The "Galilee" answers to the narthex of the ancient church, a sort of court of the externs. There are several examples in our English cathedrals; at Durham it is an extensive chapel, built for the use of the women, who, according to the strict rule of St. Cuthbert's Abbey, were not allowed to come farther into the church than the second pillar of the nave. At Lincoln it is a porch on the west of the great transept. At Ely it is either a porch or chapel at the west of the nave. In former times there was a Galilee to St. Stephen's Chapel at Westminster Abbey.

Galileo [1564-1642].—This famous man was the son of Vincenzo Galilei, of Pisa, and was christened by the name by which he is now universally known, his full name being, as will thus be seen, Galileo Galilei. The his- tory of his remarkable experiments and dis- coveries, deeply interesting as they are, have no place here, our business being his position in the religious history of his times. In 1609 he constructed his famous telescope, and became the founder of a brilliant series of discoveries in the solar system. He examined in turn, long and patiently, the moon and the planets, and thereby set aside opinions of the schoolmen, which had in his time been taken for granted as fixed truths. This gave occa- sion for the Jesuits, who cordially hated him for belonging to the party which expelled them from Padua, to denounce him to the Inquisition as a heretic, and he was openly denounced by Caccini, a friar, in the pulpit. Galileo defended himself with spirit. He never dreamt, he said, of attacking religion. The Scriptures were written to teach men the way of salvation, not astronomy. But the Inquisition persisted, and he was summoned to Rome. Pope Paul V., in 1616, gave him an audience, promised him personal safety, but commanded him not to teach the Coperni- can system of the motion of the earth, and Galileo left Rome in disgust. The appearance of some comets led him again to prosecute his astronomical discoveries, but he kept clear of prejudice, and was afterwards received by Pope Urban VIII. with great favour. But in 1632 he published a treatise on the Ptolemaic and Copernican system, thrown into the form of a conversation between three fictitious persons, in which the Ptolemaist gets altogether the worst of it. And unfortunately for the writer, the Pope recognised in the beaten controversialist some likeness to himself, for he had used some of the arguments which Galileo pulled to pieces, not without much ridicule. Again he was summoned before the Holy Office, and it is supposed, though hardly proved, that he was put to the torture, and a long sentence was passed upon him, of which we transcribe only a small portion:—"The proposition that the sun is the centre of the world, and immovable from its place, is absurd, philosophically false, and formally heretical, because it is expressly contrary to Holy Scripture. The proposition that the earth is not the centre of the world, nor immovable, but that it moves, and also with a diurnal motion, is absurd, philosophically false, and theologically considered, at least erroneous in faith." Consequently the sentence goes on to prohibit his book, to confine him to the prison of the Inquisition during pleasure, and to command him to say the Penitential Psalms once a week, etc., etc. In order to obtain so mild a sentence he had to abjure his "errors," which he did. On rising from his knees after doing so, he whispered to a friend, "E pur se muove" ("It moves all the same"). From that time he was kept in strict confinement, sometimes treated even rigorously when words of his were supposed to indicate unorthodoxy. He continued his studies, and wrote Dialogues on Motion, but the terror of the Holy Office was so great that he could find no publisher in Italy. A few years later the book was published in Amsterdam. He became blind in 1636.

The case of Galileo has been evidently felt to be an awkward one for the Roman Church. The late Dr. W. G. Ward faced it with much courage in two articles of the Dublin Review in 1871. He rests his defence on the ground that the sentence was not pronounced by the Pope ex cathedra, and therefore was not infallible. It was natural and inevitable, he says, that they should regard his opinion about the earth's motion as false and contrary to Scripture, seeing that the obvious sense of Scripture is unquestionably opposed to the Copernican theory, and only some overwhelming scientific probability could render it legitimate to override the obvious in favour of an unobvious sense. Later researches have supplied this overwhelming probability, and consequently all Catholics now admit that the Holy Ghost for wise purposes permitted the sacred writers to express themselves in language which was literally true as understood by them, but was figurative in the highest degree as understood by Him.

Gall, Sr., or Gallus, the apostle of Switzerland, was one of the most distinguished scholars whom St. Columbanus brought him from Ireland to France. He descended from a good Irish family, and was sent to Columbanus to be educated for the service of God. When Columbanus and his disciples took up their residence in the castle of Bregenz, they found a chapel which they determined to consecrate for Christian worship, but in it were many gilded images, which the pagans regarded as their tutelary divinities. Gall was well acquainted with the German language, and was chosen to preach before a multitude assembled to witness the consecration. His preaching made a great impression on them, strengthened by breaking in pieces the images, and thus proving to them the weakness of their false gods. Here he remained some time, but when at last he was expelled, Columbanus and his disciples went to Italy, but ill-health prevented from going with them; he betook himself to the protection of an old priest named Gall, who took care of him till he was strong enough to seek another sphere of duty. Gall says that he and a deacon named Gallus wandered together through the forest, and were shown by Divine guidance a spot where they should fix their abode. Being pointed out to them, the monks of St. Gall, named after Gallus, were built thereon. Here he laboured in the education of youth, in the training of monks, by whom the seeds of Christianity were sown far and wide. A bishopric of Costnitz was offered him, but he preferred discharging the duties of his convent, and declined the offer. The date of his death is uncertain. The monastery he founded became one of the most celebrated Benedictine establishments. His works were among the best friends and preservers of ancient literature. It was for a long time subject to the Bishop of Constance, and were often great disputes between the monks as to the right of the abbot. It was secularised in 1792, at the time of the French Revolution.

Gallican Church.—The circumstances of the foundation of the Gallican Church are unknown, and it is doubtful whether it was of Greek or Asiatic origin. A letter by Eusebius, written in the second century, is the first reliable account of the Church in Gaul, and tells of the persecutions which Christians suffered under Marcus Aurelius. Lyons, the chief missionary city of Gaul, and the See of the bishop who survived this persecution Pothinus, Bishop of Lyons, suffered martyrdom when ninety years of age, and the names of many others. Among the survivors was Irenaeus, a presbyter in Lyons, and who was above-named letter. During the persecution he was indefatigable in his labours for his brethren, and was commended to them who were in prison to write to them to the Bishop of Lyons, who presented a protest against the heretics creeping into the Church, and was commended to Irenæus that, on returning to Lyons, he devoted himself to refuting the false doctrines of the heretics, and was therefore commended for carrying out the task. Many of his works have been preserved which are still extant, and he is considered the greatest theologian of the third century. The persecution served to promote the cause of the Church, and it remained a minority until Constantine, when Christianity was established religion. It was the converts who had hitherto been heathens who brought it to the same level, and the life and energy which were the result of the persecution. As a result of things, some of the Christians, foremost among them, introduced monasticism, and a deadly danger threatened to lay on the borders of the empire which had received the faith from the East, and therefore rejected the perfect Divinity of our Lord. There was a gulf between them and the Christians, and this proved disastrous to the Gothic States, and, as a result, went far to prepare the way for the invasion of Spain. It was at the invasion of Gaul by Clovis, heathen though he was, that the invitation of the Catholic Church prevailed that there was less apprehended for the Church from heretical patrons. That the beginning of the kingdom of Clovis was speedily followed by the conversion of King Clovis, at the close of the century, through the influence of his wife, Clotilda, herself a Christian. His zeal for the cause of the Church led him to defeat the Arians in battle at Soissons, and not only gave lands for the churches, but invited foreign missionaries to the people. Towards the end of the century the Moslem invasion threatened to overwhelm the empire, but it was beaten back by the Franks, under Martel, at Tours, in 732. The conversion took place from that time, and the accession of Charlemagne to the throne of the Church was greatly influenced by the fact that the State was enlightened and civilised by an enlightened Church, and he organised the system so carefully that after his death the Church's influence continued to extend itself on all sides, though his enormous empire fell to pieces. All through the changes which took place, Church government remained the same; the country was divided into 120 bishoprics, which were contained in eighteen provinces, each of these being under the rule of an archbishop. The Pope became possessed of almost unlimited power through the general confusion in the State, and the clergy as a whole realised that by maintaining a union with him they would best advance the cause of the Church. After the death of Charlemagne succeeded a period of inactivity, in which the religious zeal which had characterised its predecessor seemed to be dying out, and this lasted till the eleventh century. Towards the close of that century, the sufferings undergone by pilgrims in the East originated the first Crusade [CRUSADES], the cause of which induced men who had hitherto been only fighting one against the other to take up arms against a common enemy. The Crusades, which lasted at intervals until the end of the thirteenth century, gave a large accession of power to the popes and to the Church, while the power of the nobles was declining through the amount which they expended on war. With the end of the Holy Wars the Papal power began to decline, owing partly to the increase of power of the French Government, the advanced civilisation of the laity, and the degeneracy of the clergy; and the conduct of Philip the Fair, who took advantage of his own influence to bring contempt on, and finally to cause the death of, Pope Boniface VIII., brought matters to a crisis. The successors of Boniface, who had now taken up their residence at Avignon, were remarkable for the voluptuousness of their lives, and the Church's influence grew weaker year by year, especially after their return to Rome, when the French clergy appointed a Pope of their own to remain at Avignon, and the schism thus occasioned lasted from 1378 to 1417, and was terminated by a council held at Constance, which deposed both Popes, and appointed Martin V. over the whole Church. The power of the Papacy continued to decline, and the right of nominating bishops, besides other privileges, was transferred to the French Crown. Among the earnest-minded clergy the need for reformation was strongly felt, and the first attempt to effect it was made by a few men in the south of France, under Peter Waldo. The persecutions which they suffered compelled them to escape to Piedmont, where they were little able to influence the religion of their country, and their opinions were accordingly disregarded as harmless to anyone but themselves. Only when the Reformed doctrines which originated in Germany began to spread was there any considerable movement in France in the same direction, when the Huguenots first began to excite alarm in the Church. [HUGUENOTS.] Under Henry II. the Protestant doctrines were allowed to spread, but after his death the contest between the Houses of Guise and Bourbon, which was as much political as religious, changed the whole nature of the struggle. On the minds of the people the Reformed Religion took little hold, and the atrocious massacre of St. Bartholomew in 1572 was a deadly blow to the Huguenots; but the turning point of the contest was the decision of Henry of Navarre to become a Roman Catholic, an act which destroyed the Protestant hope of ascendancy. A small proportion of the population still remained Protestant, and Henry protected them by the Edict of Nantes, securing toleration for them. But in an evil hour for France this Edict was revoked by Louis XIV. in 1685. Meanwhile the Order of the Jesuits under Ignatius LOYOLA [q.v.] had arisen, pledged to obey implicitly the will of the Pope. The Jesuits were looked upon with anger and suspicion by men of all religions. Not only Protestants, but Catholics were arrayed against them: for their unqualified submission to the Vatican implied enmity to the ancient liberties of the Church and the nation. They were in constant conflict with the divines of the Sorbonne, who accused them of treason towards the State; and on the murder of Henry III. by the monk Clement, such a storm of popular fury was raised against the Order that they were banished from France. Henry IV., however, who at heart was a sceptic ("Paris is well worth a mass," was the phrase which truly summed up his motives), favoured the Jesuits from motives of policy, and selected one for his confessor, and, the practice being kept up during the reigns of his successors, the influence of the Order was greatly increased. Eventually such influence resulted in much evil to the Church and nation; for the high aims which had characterised the founders of the movement gave way in their successors to the desire to increase their own power, and even the Popes, whom they professed to obey, had to give way to them and conciliate them. Their controversy with the JANSENISTS [q.v.] lasted till far into the eighteenth century, and resulted in the Pope's censure of the Jansenist doctrines, though these were nevertheless far from being exterminated. The Jansenists had effected a reformation in the convents and other religious houses throughout France, and the Jesuits found a means of showing their animosity by persecuting the sisterhoods, and destroying their houses. In return an adherent of the Jansenists published anonymously the Provincial Letters, which became exceedingly popular, and dealt a severe blow to the Jesuits. [PASCAL.] Besides the Jesuits, there were others whose zeal was as great as theirs, but far higher in motive, and who endured all kinds of hardships in the endeavour to stir up a revival of religious feeling in France. Francis de Sales was one of these, and was said to have seventy thousand Calvinists to the contrary of Rome, besides having carried out the reformation of the religious Orders. Less famous than he was St. Vincent, the founder of so many religious orders in France. [VINCENT.] The reign of Louis XIV. saw the power of the Gallican Church increase, and in proportion the Papal authority was diminished. The King claimed the right of appointing to vacant bishoprics; this being refused he caused a series of bulls to be drawn up limiting the Papal authority in France, and declaring that it should be controlled by the Church's ordinances, canons and local customs. Here was the origin of what is known as "Gallican tendency towards Nationalism, as opposed to Papal centralisation; the same tendency was shown by men like Gardiner in England, who, while holding Romish doctrines, were also zealous for national independence. The opposite tendency is known as Jansenism [q.v.]. We have noted in an article on Bossuet how that great man, while earnest on behalf of a Church united under Rome, yet was jealous of its unity should be corrupted into tyranny. He declared that the Pope had no deposit of power over monarchs, and, indeed, no control in temporal affairs; that the authority of the Pope is not above that of general councils; that his decisions require confirmation by the Church. This last proposition was reckoned heresy after the Vatican Council of 1870. Louis XIV. was fortunate in his clergy, two of whom [Bossuet and Fénelon] stand in the first place among French ecclesiastics. The doctrine of "Quietism" was put forward by Fénelon in several books, and in which he had numerous followers, was condemned as unsound by a Papal brief, which was, however, only issued in accordance with the wishes of the King. As Calvinism and Jansenism had been repressed, so now was Quietism. King Louis, who cared little for theological discussions, but was entirely under the control of his Jesuit Ministers, and was influenced by Madame de Maintenon, made their rule the religion of the Court to a certain extent of the people, became very formal, wanting in fervour, though his vices were conducted with elaborate ceremony. Thus it became hollow and unmeaning. It is no wonder that after the King's death the people freed themselves from the yoke, and cast off even the outward show of religion. But that which did most to bring about the downfall of the Church was the rise of the different schools of philosophy: Rousseau, D'Alembert, and others, who held Christianity in contempt, and used different methods of expressing their hatred. The parochial clergy, about 42,000 in number, comprise curés cantonaux (the ministers of the chief places in each canton),* and desservants, who serve the other churches in the canton. They are, however, substantially the same as the curés, and each in his own locality is called " M. le Curé;" only the curé proper has to be appointed by the bishop, with the approval of the Govern- ment; the desservant is the nominee of the bishop alone. The stipend of a curé, which is paid by the State, is from 1,200 to 1,500 francs a year, and the commune provides him a house rent-free. The churches are under a conseil de fabrique.

Gang-week.—One of the names given to Rogation Week, because of the processions round the boundaries of parishes which take place then.

Gangra, Council of, was held in the fourth century. The exact date is very doubtful. Some place it between the councils of Nicea [325] and Antioch [341], and others later than the Constantinopolitan synod of 380. The object of the Council was to confirm the decrees that had been passed at Neo-Cæsarea against the EUSTATHIANS [q.v.]. Twenty canons were made, followed by an epilogue drawn up by the bishops present, who numbered about sixteen, condemning those who, under pretence of the exercise of works of severity and mortification, "do insult those who live in a more plain and simple manner, and would bring in innovations contrary to the Scriptures and the canons of the Church." They admire virginity, but at the same time "honour honest marriage." This Council has always been a great difficulty to the Roman Catholic Church in advocating the celibacy of the clergy.

Gardiner, STEPHEN [b. 1483, d. 1556], Bishop of Winchester, and Lord Chancellor of England, was born at Bury St. Edmunds, and was said to be the natural son of Richard Woodville, the brother of Edward IV.'s queen. He studied at Trinity Hall, Cambridge, and was well versed in canon and civil law, and a good scholar in both Latin and Greek. He became secretary to Cardinal Wolsey, and was sent to Rome in 1527, to negotiate the divorce between Henry VIII. and Catherine of Aragon. On his return he was made Secretary of State, and in 1531 Archdeacon of Leicester, and at the close of the same year Bishop of Winchester. He complied with the Court in renouncing the Pope's authority, and wrote a book, de Vera Obedientia, in support of the King's supremacy, but he never abandoned in any degree the doctrines of the Roman Catholic Church with respect to the Sacrament. For this reason he opposed all further reformation, endeavoured to dissuade the King from listening to the proposals of Cranmer, and was the head of the reactionary party in the latter days of King Henry. He was instrumental in the downfall and execution of Thomas Cromwell in 1540. Towards the end of the reign Gardiner fell out of favour with Henry, and endeavoured to ingratiate himself by impeaching his Queen, Catherine Parr, of heretical tendencies; but in a personal interview she managed to convince the King of the falseness of the accusation, and Gardiner fell into yet deeper disgrace. The King had named him executor of his will, but revoked this. In the reign of Edward VI. he was imprisoned in the Fleet from Jan., 1547, until the following December, and this certainly without any justification. He was then allowed to retire to his episcopal palace in Southwark, and though his sentiments continued the same, his outward compliance left no room, for a time, to find occasion against him; however, on account of a sermon preached on St. Peter's Day, 1548, he was arrested and committed to the Tower. On his refusal to subscribe to certain articles which had been drawn up, he was deprived of his bishopric. Queen Mary released him on her accession in 1553, and he became her Lord Chancellor, and was restored to his bishopric. He had a great share in the articles of marriage between the Queen and Philip of Spain, and officiated at the ceremony. In the proceedings against the Protestants, there seems no reason to doubt that much of the severity was owing to him; and when Cardinal Pole urged that the people were to be recovered to the Church of Rome by moderation and gentleness, Gardiner declared for the execution of the laws against the Lollards, insisting that terror was a more effectual expedient than bare persuasion. It is remarkable that, fierce as he was against the Protestants, there was always in him a strong sympathy with some of their doctrines—he was, as we have seen, a strong Sacramentalist, but he was also earnest in his holding of the doctrine of Justification by Faith, and expressed these convictions on his death-bed.

Garnet, Henry, Superior of the Jesuits in England, was born at Nottingham in 1554. He was educated at Winchester School, and had intended to study at New College, Oxford, but gave up the idea. Having turned Roman Catholic, he went to Rome, and joined the society of the Jesuits in 1575. He studied at the Jesuits' College, where he became Professor of Hebrew and Teacher of Mathematics. He became so famed that, in 1588, he returned to England as head of the Jesuits there. He followed various employments in order to hide his real calling, which he carried on with great zeal, and he is suspected of having joined in treasonable plots with the King of Spain against Queen Elizabeth. At the accession of James I. he purchased pardon, but was still suspected in one of his acquaintance with various Catholics. At last came the Gunpowder and Garnet was among those suspected was known to have been in communication with Catesby, Gerard, and Green, others of the conspirators. A Bill of attainder against these four and several others passed. Most escaped, but Garnet at Oldcorn, alias Hall, his confessor, was and sent to the Tower, 1606. He was interrogated by the Earl of Salisbury, Overal, etc. He was not tortured, but secrets were discovered by spies who to the conversation between the damned priests, they were tried and found guilty of treason, and executed at Paul's Churchyard.

Gasparin, Anthon [b. 1816, d. 1881]. A distinguished Protestant nobleman of France, who wrote several works of eminence of religious opinion as a writer against Rationalism and Romanism. Madame Gasparin, is known to many readers by her small volume, The Heavenly Home.

Gataker, Thomas [b. 1574, d. 1643]. He was educated at St. John's College, Cambridge; became Preacher of Lincoln, 1601, and rector of Rotherhithe, 1613. He was called to be a member of Westminster Assembly. He was a writer, author of a catechism, a treatise on Transubstantiation, sermons and a commentary on Isaiah and Jeremiah.

Gatien, St., 1st Bishop of Troyes at the end of the third century. He was buried in the choir of the Cathedral which has been called by his name. He lived in the fourteenth century, but his relics were destroyed by the Huguenots in 1562. His tomb is observed in the Roman Church on the Rue de la Harpe.

Gauden, John, was born at Bury, Essex, in 1603, his father being a yeoman. He was educated at Bury St. Edmunds, and then went to St. John's College, Cambridge. He moved to Oxford in 1630, as tutor in Wadham College, and afterwards became chaplain to the Earl of Warwick, who was rector in Berkshire, and vicar of Cambridge. At this time he was a Parliamentarian, who appointed him the living of Bocking, in Essex. He went on he sided more and more with the Royalists, became chaplain to the Earl of Warwick, and successively Bishop of Exeter and of Worcester, where he died in 1660.

Dr. Gauden is asserted to have written a remarkable work Seven Banquets; or, a Treatise of his Sacred Majesty's life and sufferings, which appeared in 1649. It is written in the first person, as if it were the account of Charles I.'s life from 1642

the King himself wrote it, and about it is not yet settled. It is undoubtedly the best; while Mr. Gardiner says in question, and that if it was mainly a correct account of the Council and character.

Archbishop of Cologne, was elected in 1547, and became archbishop.

He fell in love with Agnes of Hainault, which may have caused him to promote freedom and to turn Lutheran in 1583, as he was thereby expelled. At the Diet of Augsburg, 1548, which had embraced Lutheranism, he was confirmed in their religious views to prevent the progress of the emperor Charles V. brought forward the suggestion, that any ecclesiastic who embraced Romanism should forfeit his benefice.

Thus Gebhard was declared vacant, and Duke Maximilian of Bavaria was appointed. Gebhard remained at Bonn; but the Protestants refused toleration, and suspected him of heresy, would not come to his help. He fled from Bonn, and retired to Strasburg, where he died in 1601.

—The Greek New Testament speaks of the wicked, or of final perdition, comes from the word Gehinnom, or of Hinnom, by Jerusalem. The Jews introduced the worship of the idolatrous Jews used to sacrifice to Moloch in this valley. These idolatries, God threatened special manifestations of His wrath, that it should no more be called Hinnom, or of Tophet, but the daughter of Sion [Jer. vii. 31, 32; xix. 10]. Defiled by Josiah [2 Kings 23:26] thenceforward became the receptacle of all sorts of putrefying matter, and for ages came to be the image of the wicked.

of Cyzicus, son of a priest of Cyzicus, lived during the second half of the 5th century. He found an old parchment which had belonged to Dalmatius, Bishop of Cyzicus, containing an account of the Council of Nicæa, and, filling up the gaps from Eusebius Cæsariensis and Rufinus, he wrote a history of the Council. This history, either from the inaccuracy of his material, or from the prolixity of his imagination, is very untrustworthy. The disputes are mostly his own composition, and the conferences from the eleventh chapter to the twenty-fourth, in the second book, are believed to be mere fiction. His book is faulty in other ways, as there is neither method in his narration, judgment in the choice of his matter, nor beauty in his diction. This history was published at Paris, by Robert Balfour, in 1599, and afterwards inserted in the Councils.

Generation, ETERNAL.—This phrase is used to denote the Catholic faith as to the Sonship of the Second Person in the Trinity. Christ is the Son of God in a sense in which no other being is. He Himself claimed to be so, speaking of "My Father" as distinct from "your Father." And again, "I and My Father are One." His Apostles teach this also, especially St. John, who speaks of Him as "the only begotten Son." And so the creeds have formulated the Scripture teaching into an article of the faith—e.g. the Apostles' Creed, "His only Son, our Lord;" the Nicene Creed, "The only-begotten Son of God, Begotten of his Father before all worlds, God of God, Light of Light, Very God of very God, Begotten, not made, Being of one substance with the Father, By whom all things were made;" the Athanasian Creed, "God, of the Substance of the Father, Begotten before the worlds. . . Perfect God, and perfect Man. . . Equal to the Father, as touching his Godhead." The Second Article in the Anglican Church defines the same truth as follows:—"The Son, which is the Word of the Father, begotten from everlasting of the Father, the very and eternal God, and of one substance with the Father, took man's nature in the womb of the blessed Virgin, of her substance." If this were not so, then Christ's claims and words, as repeatedly recorded in the Gospels, would be nothing less than blasphemous, and were in fact so deemed by the Jews who denied them. The above definitions serve to show clearly in what respects Christ's Sonship differs from all other sonships:—First, He was begotten from all eternity; there never was a time when He was not. For although we use the words "Sonship" and "generation" in reference to the Second Person in the Trinity, yet we do not understand thereby a passing from non-existence to existence, as in physical generation; but we must understand the terms in consistency with the essential attributes of God, of which eternal existence is one [cf. John i.]. Secondly, in the eternal generation of the Son, the whole and not a part only, of the Divine Essence of the Father was communicated to the Son. "In Him dwelt all the fulness of the Godhead bodily." There could be no division of the Divine nature, so that one part should be separated from another: and though the Son be a separate Person from the Father, yet the Son still remains in the Father and the Father in the Son; different Persons, but One God. The Schoolmen describe this mystery as generatio ab intra [cf. Athanasian Creed: "Neither confounding the Persons, nor dividing the substance"]. This doctrine the Church has struggled in all ages to hold fast, as necessary to her very existence. The Jewish sect of the Ebionites were the first to deny its truth. The Arians followed, and it is extremely difficult now to realise the extent to which Arianism had permeated the Christian community in early ages. The Church had, however, faithful and victorious champions in Athanasius, Basil, Gregory Nazianzen, Gregory of Nyssa, and many others of lesser note. These all laboured in the East. The West was not so harassed, but writers like Irenæus and Polycarp did much to build up their people in the orthodox faith, and the doctrine finally triumphed at the Councils of Nice and Constantinople. At the Reformation the doctrine of the Eternal Generation of the Son was retained by Lutherans and Calvinists, as well as by the Church of England; and both Arianism and Socinianism have ever since appeared only as uninfluential heresies.

Genesius, St.—A lawyer at Arles, martyred in the Diocletian persecution. When he was converted to the faith he ardently longed to receive baptism; but the Bishop deferred it for a while, whilst he comforted his scruples by assuring him that should he be martyred, his death would be even as a baptism. Soon afterwards he was arrested; whereupon, as his biographer states, "by the inspiration of the Holy Ghost he leapt into the Rhone, and thus the river became to him a second Jordan." His pursuers beheaded him there and then.

Geneviève, St., the patron saint of Paris, was born at Nanterre, near Paris, in 422. Seven years after, GERMANUS [q. v.], Bishop of Auxerre, and Lupus, Bishop of Troyes, passed through Nanterre on their way to England to check the Pelagian heresy, and took great notice of Geneviève, exhorting her to consecrate herself to God, and giving her a medal with a cross on it to remind her of her promise to do so. From this time she is said to have performed many miracles. Her mother it is said was struck blind for giving her a blow, and only recovered her sight about a month after on washing her eyes with some water which the daughter had blessed. When she was fifteen, the Bishop of Paris gave her the veil, and received her vows according to the usual forms of the Church. Her parents dying, she went to live with her godmother at Paris. When she fell ill, and lay for three days during which, it is said, many things were revealed to her. Soon after she told to her acquaintance, and to be looked upon as a visionar. When the ill feeling against her height, Germanus passed through Paris, greatly incensed at the calumny against her, and pronounced her innocent repose did not last long. The people were alarmed at a rumour that under Attila, were coming. Geneviève told that the city would not be taken, as she was accused of prophesying false things. Her enemies were about to throw her into the Seine, when a messenger came to her, Germanus, who was in Italy, and sent her again to his reverence for her. She died soon after, and Geneviève was her protector; but she never needed on the people had become convinced of her piety, cence and sanctity, and left her house. She practised great austerities, eating only on Sundays and Thursdays, her food consisting solely of barley and beans. This course she continued until she was fifty, and then, at the persuasion of the bishops, consented to take milk. Geneviève is said to have greatly aided the conversion of Clovis, first King of the Franks. She certainly had a great influence over him afterwards, and it was by her persuasion that he began to build the church of St. Peter and St. Paul, the name of which was afterwards changed to St. Denis, for whom Geneviève had a great devotion. It is impossible to give a connected account of Geneviève, as the accounts we have give little else but a string of miracles which have been wrought by her, not only in Paris but in various parts of France. She died on Jan. 3rd, 512, and was interred in the new Church of the Apostles, in Paris. The present shrine was made in 1242.

Genuflectentes or Genuflectors ["Kneelers," or "Prostraters"].—Given in the ancient Church to the catechumens and penitents. They were called to distinguish them from the "hearers" only, for they were to remain in the lower part of the church, and attend some particular prayers specially offered up for them, while the hearers were kneeling upon their knees, for imposition of hands and the benediction.

Genuflection [Lat. genu, "knee," flecto, "to bend"].—The act of bending the knee in prayer, as a sign of adoration and reverence.

Geoffrey of Monmouth, called Geoffrey of Monmouth, the noted chronicler, was born at Monmouth at the beginning of the 12th century, educated at a monast archdeacon of Monmouth, and in of St. Asaph, which he only years, dying in 1154. Geoffrey wrote his great work, the Chronicon Britonum, which was completed. The work is said by some to be from Brut of Brenhined, a history of Britain written by Tyssilio, Asaph, while others affirm that the work is of later date, and was taken from Geoffrey's. The Chronicles are a mass of legends, with a few historical traditions. It was first printed at Paris in 1564. These chronicles come Shakespeare's Lear, much of Drayton's Polygraphon, and Milton's Comus.

—There are a great number of persons whose names figure in the history of the church. Dr. Smith's Dictionary of Biography enumerates seventy-five names. Some have thought that the name became popular from the use of the word "tilled field"), as applied to the land in Cor. iii. 9. We need only men-

GEORGE THE MARTYR.—Though few know of him, his day is a marked day in ecclesiology, for he is regarded as a saint of England, and figures in the legend of slaying the dragon on some English island. He was a centurion in the army of the emperor and is said by some writers to be the man who indignantly pulled down the emperor's decree ordering the persecution which was affixed to the wall of his city. In this it is said he was roasted to death on a slow fire. Other historians, however, declare that the doer of this daring deed was John. One thing we may maintain—namely, that St. George has been a man of marked nobleness from the honour that was paid to him in early days. Churches existed from the name of "the great martyr, St. George" in the middle of the fourth century. His remains are said to rest in a church at Lyons, existing, built over them by the emperor Constantine. The legend of his slaying the dragon belongs to mediæval times, and refers to his having vanquished the dragon in his martyrdom. Originally it appeared to be Constantine who was so named, but the Georgian Church transferred the name to their namesake. St. George was introduced into England from the bearing of Christianity, but his elevation to the rank of the English patron saint, Edward the Confessor, dates from the twelfth century. When the Christians were persecuted by the Saracens at the battle of Hattin, on the 28th, 1089, the vision suddenly appeared to them, "of St. George and his army, hastening from the mountains and attacking the enemy." The English heart at this, pushed forward, and won the victory. Again, he appeared to Richard I., and Edward III. gave utterance to the national voice by dedicating St. George's Chapel, Windsor, to him in 1348, and making him patron of the new Order of the Garter. In the first Prayer Book of Edward VI., St. George's Day was a red-letter day, and in many parts of Christendom it is still a high day. We may mention that St. George's Day, April 23rd, was the birthday and death-day of Shakespeare. Cervantes died on the same day and the same year as Shakespeare [1616]. The poet Wordsworth also died on St. George's Day, 1850.

[2] GEORGE OF CAPPADOCIA.—Gibbon, apparently from his well-known bias, has identified this man with the above-named. "The infamous George of Cappadocia has been transformed into the renowned St. George of England, the patron of arms, of chivalry, and of the Garter." This slander, as Dean Milman quietly remarks, is disposed of by the fact, demonstrated clearly by Dr. Milner, that St. George was honoured in the Church before George of Cappadocia could possibly have been transformed into a martyr.

He was born at Epiphania, in Cilicia, and began his career as a pork-contractor to the army, but had to fly the country on account of his dishonesty. He afterwards became a zealous convert to Arianism, and was sent by Constantius to supersede Athanasius in the bishopric of Alexandria. He arrived there during Lent, 356. He forbade the adherents of Athanasius the exercise of their worship, and imprisoned them; he enriched himself by many acts of oppression on the Christians, and with an armed force he entered the pagan temples and plundered them. In 358 the people rose against him and drove him away, but he was quickly reinstated by Constantius. In 361 the news reached Alexandria of the accession of Julian, and this was the signal of another rising against George. He and two of his chief adherents, Diodorus and Dracontius, were seized and thrown into prison by the pagans, whom they had greatly exasperated; here they were kept some days, till the populace, unable to restrain their impatience, burst open the prison and literally tore their victims to pieces. This violent death was sufficient, in the eyes of the Arians, to entitle their champion to canonisation.

Gerhardt, PAUL, the greatest of German hymn-writers, was born at Gräfenhainchen, in Saxony, in 1607. He studied at the Wittenberg University, and became preacher in Berlin in 1657; but after nine years was dismissed for refusing to subscribe to edicts which he thought would tend to unite the Lutheran and Reformed Churches. In 1667 he became Archdeacon of Lübben, where he died in 1676.

Gerhardt is said to have written 123 hymns, which are noted for their sweetness and easy rhythm. The best known in England is O sacred Head, once wounded, which was translated by J. W. Alexander in 1849.

Germanus, St., one of the greatest of the French bishops, was born at Auxerre about the year 380. He was the son of Rusticus or Germanilla, of high descent. He was sent to be educated at Lyons, and thence went to Rome, where he studied law with such success that he gained a reputation as one of the greatest orators and advocates. On his return to Gaul, he became one of the six "Dukes" of Gaul, his duchy including Auxerre. He fulfilled all his duties thoroughly, but was too fond of pleasure, to which he gave himself up without restraint. This incurred the displeasure of the bishop, Amator, who rebuked Germanus, which so angered the Duke that he plotted his murder. Amator heard of the design, and fled to Autun. It is said that he was here warned in a dream that Germanus would succeed him in the bishopric. Whether this is so or not, he seized his enemy, cut his hair, and made him a deacon. Germanus's heart was touched, and he was preparing to fulfil his functions when Amator died, appointing Germanus his successor. Our saint demurred for some time, but was unanimously elected, and consecrated July 7th, 418. He immediately changed his mode of life, practising the greatest austerities. He founded a monastery near Auxerre, where he spent a great deal of his time. Upon the promotion of Celestine to the Papal chair, in 422, the Pelagians, who had been condemned, attempted again to spread their errors, but were repulsed, so crossed to Britain. Here they had more success, till at last the Church there appealed to Gaul for help. A council was held at Arles, in 429, and Germanus was sent, with Lupus of Troyes, to the island. They at once began to preach, and so many flocked to them, attracted by their eloquence, that they at last had to hold their services in the streets. The Pelagian leaders, having lost nearly all their followers, agreed to confer with the bishops, so they met near St. Albans. Crowds came to look on. The heretics made a long discourse, which was more wordy than forcible; and when the bishops spoke afterwards the victory was undoubted, and the Pelagians were forced to escape from the fury of the crowd. At that time the Picts and Scots were in Britain, and Germanus placed himself at the head of the British army, which was completely victorious. Germanus then returned to Auxerre, where he remained till 447, when he again went to Britain for some time to preach against the Pelagians. As soon as he had returned to Auxerre the second time, a deputation came from the Armoricans, who inhabited what is now called Brittan had rebelled against the Emperor Valentinian III., upon which Aëtius, the commander of Gaul, sent the Alani into their country. Germanus went to Eborac, the King of the Alani, who, after many solicitations, to give up the enterprise if the Emperor was satisfied. Germanus went to Ravenna and gained Valentinian's consent; but the Alani again rebelled, and all his labours were useless. Germanus fell ill at Ravenna there July 31st, 449. He was buried at Auxerre.

Gerson, JEAN CHARLIER DE, one of the greatest scholars of the fourteenth century, was born at Orléans, in the diocese of Rheims, in 1363, his name being merely Jean Charlier. He came to Paris under Peter d'Ailly. His talents rose to honour, and became known to the University, with the title of "Christianissimus," or "The most Christian Doctor," and Canon of Notre Dame. He was obliged to lie concealed for some time, having infuriated the Duke of Burgundy by his attacks on the Duke of Orleans, and on John who defended them. Gerson was a supporter of the proposal to put an end to the schism between the Popes by the election of both Gregory and Benedict. He took a leading part in the Councils of Pavia and Constance [1414], as ambassador of Charles VI., and representative of the University of France and of the University of Paris. It was through his influence that the supremacy of the Church over the State was established. He was in some ways far ahead of his times, and was very averse to the scholastic system [q.v.]. He was forced to exile in consequence of the Duke of Burgundy. He went to Bavaria, where he remained for some years as an author. He then went to a convent of the Celestines at Lyons, where he died in 1429.

Gerson was the author of several works. De Unitate Ecclesie is a treatise on the schism between the Popes. He was also against Papal Infallibility. His other works are Contre Certain Flagellatorum, de Spiritibus, and de Consolatione. The Imitation of Christ has been ascribed to Gerson, because some of the words bear the name of John Gerson as if he wrote them, while others believe that it was John Gerson, Abbot of Vercelli in the fourteenth century. The relics were carried to St. Faustus's Church, and he Ambrosian, and whilst they were removed, one Severus, on touch, immediately received his sight, and other miracles are said to have been wrought, so that the Arians accused Ambrose of people to act their parts. St. Ambrose carried the keeping of this festival where it was kept, as well as at Rome 19th. In the Greek Church Oct. 14th.

12. FRIEDRICH HEINRICH WILHELM, one of the most distinguished of German scholars, was born at Helmstedt, in Prussian Saxony, in 1785. He was educated in his native town, and at Helmstedt and Göttingen. He became Repetitor at Göttingen, and Professor of Ancient Literature at the Gymnasium of Heiligenstadt. After the death of Johannes von Müller remaining there a year he became Professor of Theology at Halle, which he held till his death in 1842, with a short interval during the War of the Liberation the College was closed. He paid visits to Paris and England (1820 and 1821) and collected materials for his lexicons of languages. The Hebrew Lexicon was published in 1810-12, and was followed by the Hebrew Thesaurus (1813), History of the Hebrew Language (1815), and Thorough Criticism of the Formation of the Language (1817). His Thesaurus was not published till after his death. He also wrote commentary on Isaiah.

Romanorum.—A collection of stories generally with a moral attached, arranged into parables. The title is from the greater part of the stories beginning with the words, "There was an Emperor," etc. These were used by popular preachers in their sermons. The stories are all fictitious. We are told that an Emperor of Rome "named himself many of these emperors did things. Some of the stories are not even repulsive, but some are and are the germs of classical pieces of literature, e.g. the story of the cloak, which Shakespeare has wrought into The Merchant of Venice. They probably date from the thirteenth century. They are reprinted by the Early English Text Society; an easily accessible edition is to be found in Bohn's Antiquarian Library, but nearly the whole of what is good in the collection will be found in Mr. Morley's shilling library.

Ghibellines. [GUELPHS AND GIBELLINES.]

Gibson, EDMUND (b. 1669, d. 1748), Bishop of Lincoln and of London [1723], is the author of the well-known book on Church law entitled The Statutes, Constitution, Canons, Rubrics, and Articles of the Church of England. He is also the compiler of a work against Popery contributed by different writers.

Giffard, WILLIAM, Bishop of Winchester and Lord Chancellor, was probably a Frenchman. On the accession of Henry I., Pope Gregory VII., watchful for the interests of his Church, set up a claim in opposition to the King for the right of appointing to vacant sees by capitular election, which Henry vigorously resisted. Accordingly, when the King appointed Giffard to the diocese of Winchester, Anselm, Archbishop of Canterbury, refused to consecrate him, whereupon Henry applied to Girard, Archbishop of York, who consented; but such was Giffard's awe of the authority of Anselm and the Papal See, that he refused the proffered consecration. This deference to the Archbishop so much incensed the King that he banished Giffard in 1102. The matter, however, was at last arranged, the Pope consenting that Anselm should consecrate the bishops who had already been nominated, the King agreeing not to interfere in the future with canonical elections, and to waive all claims to the privilege of investiture. The King was to possess the right of recommending the future bishops; the Church, that of investing them with the spiritual insignia, but the bishop-elect was to do homage to the King for his temporalities and barony. Giffard, with several others, was consecrated in 1107. He was Bishop of Winchester for twenty-one years. He has left several monuments of his liberality and piety. He founded the monastery of St. Mary Overy (i.e. "St. Mary Over the Water"), at Southwark, now called St. Saviour's. In 1128 he established an abbey of Cistercian monks at Waverley, near Farnham, the first house which that Order possessed in England; and he also founded a priory of Black Canons at Taunton. But the most important work of a religious character that Giffard executed was the removal of St. Grimbold's Abbey, founded by Alfred, from the north side of the cathedral to Hyde Meadow in 1110, where, through his influence with Henry, he procured the foundation of a stately abbey. He also built the palace at Southwark called Winchester House, as a town residence for the prelates of his See. He died in 1128.

Gifts [Gr. charismata].—The New Testament uses this term to express powers and graces bestowed on Christians by the Holy Ghost. These gifts are described as of two kinds—ordinary and extraordinary. The ordinary are those shared by all Christians: wisdom, understanding, counsel, spiritual strength, knowledge, true godliness, holy fear; they are given abundantly or sparingly according to the faith of the recipient. With these may be classed the “fruits of the Spirit” enumerated in Gal. v. 22, 23, viz. “love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance.” To these have been added by theologians three others, viz. patience, modesty, chastity. The extraordinary gifts of the Spirit were, for the most part, confined to the earliest ages of the Church. It would appear to have been a common thing in the Apostles’ time for newly baptised converts to receive with the laying on of the Apostles’ hands the power to speak in other tongues or to interpret them, the gift of prophecy, healing, and of the discerning of spirits. The Scripture teaching on these miraculous gifts will be found in the words of St. Paul in 1 Cor. xii. 14. He declares that all gifts come from the Spirit; that they are “given to every man to profit withal,” and that the Spirit divideth “to every man severally as He will.” Hence there is no ground for vanity or boasting on the part of the recipients. Moreover, he declares in 1 Corinthians xiii. that these miraculous gifts, although excellent in themselves, yet, without the gift of love, are of no account whatever. Love is the first and chief of the ordinary gifts of the Spirit, and is greater than all the extraordinary gifts. Of these latter St. Paul shows that prophesying is the greatest:—“Desire spiritual gifts, but rather that ye may prophesy;” declaring at the same time how it is greater than the gift of “speaking with tongues.” It is to be noted that the gift of tongues is “a sign not to them that believe, but to them that believe not;” while “prophesying serveth not for them that believe not, but for them which believe:” or, in other words, prophesying is for the “edification, exhortation, and comfort” of the Church. The notion that the gift of tongues was for the purpose of converting foreign nations is now held by few expositors. Rather we may suppose it was an overpowering influence of spiritual zeal intelligible to those who were filled with Divine love, and to them only. [See Farrar’s St. Paul, chapter v.] It is a very difficult question to decide when the extraordinary gifts ceased to be bestowed on Christians. It is quite certain that they soon ceased to be bestowed on Christians as a rule; they gradually seemed to become more and more rare. Instances are mentioned in Eusebius v. 7, v. quotes Irenæus to prove that miracles existed in his day [A.D. 161–180]. In Eusebius vi. 9 the historian records that many miracles were performed by Nestor A.D. 211–217. But the mention of individual seems to show that the mass of Christians did not then possess this power. In all ages people have laid claim to a possession of miraculous power, but in such instances evidence has not been sufficient to establish the matter beyond doubt. In other cases deception has been practised. One instance which is mentioned by Irenæus in the passage, and by Apollonius, a writer who lived a few years later, viz.—Isidorus. Isidorus gained such manifestations of miraculous power as Apollonius, in Eusebius v. 18, accused the Phrygian heretics of receiving power on such occasions, and thereby convicted of imposture, while Irenæus attests the reality of the miraculous powers exercised by the faithful from the fact that no profit was made: “As they had received from Christ, so,” says he, “they ought to have freely.” In conclusion, it may be observed that it has only been in great portions of the history of God’s people that miraculous gifts have been bestowed in any abundance, e.g. in the deliverance from Egypt, the troublous times of Elijah and Elisha, the rise of Christ’s Kingdom upon earth, and it is also to be observed that in the ages above cited they are distinct from the gifts beneath gifts and graces which yet permanently remain. For the alleged revival of the Gift of Tongues in modern times see IRVINGISM.

Gilbert, St., of Sempringham, founder of the Order of Gilbertines in England. Son of Jocelin, a native of Normandy, was born at Lincoln in 1084. Being the first destined for the Church, he went to France for his education, and on his return to England was placed in the Bishop of Lincoln’s seminary, and then kept a public house for children of both sexes. His father had a good estate in Lincolnshire, to which he had the right of presentation to the living of Sempringham and Turrington, and, being provided with this title, Gilbert was made priest in 1123 by Alexander, Bishop of Lincoln. He then founded an Order of monks, to whom he built a monastery adjacent to Andrew’s Church at Sempringham. Many persons followed his example, and monasteries of this Order in other parts of the country. Finding his charge thus increased, he journeyed to France to consult St. Bernard on the matter, and by his advice he wrote Pope Eugenius III., begging that the Order might be put under the direction of the Cistercians; but they declined the task.

Giles, Sr., abbot, was born in Athens in 640, and came to Gaul, thinking he could serve God more easily in retirement in a strange country. The reputation of Cæsarius, Bishop of Arles, drew him to that town, where his merit was acknowledged, and he became head of a monastery in Languedoc. But his love of retirement returned, and he withdrew to a small, solitary place. Thence he removed towards the sea, and, finding in the diocese of Nismes a cave overgrown with woods, he spent the remainder of his days there in prayer and mortification. There is a legend that he was fed every day by a hind which had fled to him when pursued by the King of France, or, according to others, by Wamba, King of the Goths. This hind is often represented in pictures of St. Giles. The King, hearing much of the hermit's sanctity, invited him to Court;
 but he refused, and died and was buried in his cell. It is said that many miracles were worked there, and the spot became so revered that a monastery was built, which was named after him. The monastery was long in the hands of the Benedictines, and at last given up to the secular clergy. St. Giles is commemorated on Sept. 1st. He is reckoned as the patron saint of Edinburgh, where the cathedral is named after him.

Gill, JOHN, D.D., an eminent Baptist minister, was born at Kettering, in Northamptonshire, in 1697. He attended a grammar-school in his native town till he was forced to leave on account of a rule excluding all Dissenters. Then he carried on his studies alone, and made great progress, especially in classics.
 In 1717 he began preaching at Higham
 Ferrers, and three years afterwards went up to London. He preached for some time at the Horselydown Baptist Chapel in Southwark, and in 1757 removed to Carter Lane, where he remained till his death in 1771.
 Dr. Gill was a strong Calvinist, inclining to Supralapsarianism, as his work, The Cause of God and Truth, shows. This work was an answer to Whitby's Five Points. His chief work was the exposition of the New and Old Testaments [1746-8, and 1763-76], a book of great value. He also wrote A Treatise on the Doctrine of the Trinity, A Body of Doctrinal Divinity, A Body of Practical Divinity, and A Dissertation on the Hebrew Language.

Gilpin, BERNARD, a learned Englishman, was born at Kentmire, in Westmoreland, in 1517. At the age of sixteen he went to Queen's College, Oxford, where he became a Fellow, and was chosen by King Henry VIII. as one of the first masters of Christ Church College. In his youth he was a great adherent of the Papacy, and was singled out to dispute with the Reformers, and it is said that Peter Martyr was more afraid of him than of any other of his adversaries; but at last, by continual study of the Scriptures and the early Fathers, he became convinced of the truth of the doctrines of Protestantism. He was ordained, and in 1552 became vicar of Norton. When Queen Mary ascended the throne he went abroad for three years, and on his return became Archdeacon of Durham and vicar of Houghton. Queen Elizabeth offered him the bishopric of Carlisle, but he refused it, saying that he had many friends in that diocese to whom he could not grant what they should desire of him without injuring his conscience, nor refuse without disgusting them. He died at Houghton in 1583. He was noted for his extreme liberality to the poor, and his eloquent preaching. He was much interested in education, and is said to have always had twenty-four scholars in his house, whom he entirely provided for, and six of whom he sent to the universities. He was known by the names of "Father of the Poor" and "Apostle of the North."

Giraldus Cambrensis (GERALD DE BARBI) [b. circa 1146, d. circa 1220], was the son of Giraldus of Windsor, a Norman noble who settled in Pembrokeshire and married Nesta, the sister of Griffith ap Rhys ap Theodore, Prince of South Wales. He began his education under his uncle David, the Bishop of St. David's, and then went to the University at Paris. He took Holy Orders in 1172, and was appointed soon after to the Archdeaconries of Brecknock and St. David's. He spent ten years in the Court of Henry II., who had a great esteem for him, and employed him in several embassies. He was afterwards preceptor to the King's son John, whom he attended into Ireland. He wrote a description of that country as well as of England and Wales. The See of St. David's was offered to him three times; in the first place he gave it up because his election had not the royal sanction; in the second, because he could not get his nomination confirmed at Rome, and the third time he declined it. He spent his last years in study and retirement, and died at St. David's in his seventy-fourth year.

Girdle.—In the Romish Church, a cincture to keep the alb in its place. Formerly it was a narrow band of silk of all colours, now a plain white cord. Choristers generally use red girdles. The Pope wears a sash in addition.

Glanville, JOSEPH, an eminent preacher and writer, was born at Plymouth, in 1636. In 1652 he was admitted to Exeter College, Oxford, from whence, after four years, he removed to Lincoln College, in which he took the degree of M.A. It is said that he then became chaplain to Rouse, the Cromwellian Provost of Eton, without being ordained. Soon after the Restoration he received Holy Orders, and obtained the rectory of Wimbush, in Essex, and was made a member of the Royal Society. In 1662 he was presented to the living of Frome Selwood, and four years after to that of the Abbey Church, Bath; he was afterwards made Chaplain in Ordinary to

King Charles II., and Prebendar cester. He died at Bath on Nov. He was a writer of more than genius, and a great master of style. He was the author of several works: Orontius, a treatise on the pre-ludes, published in 1662; Scopis & Confessed Ignorance the Way to Considerations touching the Being of Witchcraft; Sadducismus Triumphans at modern Sadduceeism; Plus l'Esprit le Progrès et l'Avancement of Knowledge the Days of Aristotle; and several

Glastonbury.—A small town set, famous for the great abbey which flourished there. Dr. E. A. Freeman pointed out [English Towns and p. 77] that this abbey has an interestively unique. After speaking of Tintern, of Westminster and Canterbury goes on:—"We know their beginnings, know their founders; their histories, very legends, do not dare to trace foundations beyond the time of coming into this island. . . . At Glastonbury, among the great churches, we feel instinctively that on this name of England is out of place with easy steps from the realm of the realm of Ine." Here, on the island of Avalon, as it was called, Joseph of Arimathea was said to have preached and the famous Glastonbury Thorn, which destroyed during the Civil Wars, was the staff brought by Joseph of Arimathea from Palestine, and was popularly said to blossom on Christmas Day. Glastonbury was the shelter-place of the British when they were persecuted and destroyed by the pagan English. Here, King Arthur, their champion, is said to be buried, and for ages his tomb was held in high honour all through the troubled days of the "making of Britain" and its history is glorified by its connection with the great Dunstan. The abbey was ruined at the hands of Henry VIII. in one of the most shameful passages in that reign. Its last abbot, Whiting, a man of life, was hanged on the top of Glastonbury Tor. [See Froude, iii. 247.]

Glebe [Lat. gleba, "turf, soil, or land"]—The land possessed as part of the endowment of an ecclesiastical benefice. According to Phillimore, "every church of common law is entitled to house and glebe." The amount of these was of such absolute necessity that without them no church could be consecrated. The house and glebe were comprehended under the word "glebe," which the rule of the common law defined as est ut unicuique ecclesie unus manerium absque ullo servitio tribuatur."

as, when the income is more than the incumbent, the whole or part lands may be excepted out of the tithes to augment any poor adjoining glebe lands in the hands of the parson or vicar, although endowed lands in the parish, nor vice versa, in the canon law "that the tenant shall not pay tithes to the Church; and if the land is sold out, it shall pay tithes as if it were in the hands of the parson."

When land is needed for the glebe for the incumbent, glebe lands may be purchased; and it is usual that glebe lands may be exchanged with other lands, either in or out of the parish. If any incumbency does not include more than twenty acres, the glebe lands that belong to the freehold. When the land-tax on any living belonging to a glebe is redeemed, it may be provided that the land belonging to it, instead of a rent-charge, but such colleges as are subject to a rent-charge out of the Excelsis.—The hymn at the Communion Service, Glory be to thee.

This is a hymn of unquestioned origin—one, therefore, which we find in the Western Church. It is still there, the fourth century, the usual form. The oldest copy which is still extant is appended to the famous Book of Common Prayer, now in the British Museum. The text of the hymn read thus:—

God on high, and on earth peace,
Toward all men.

Thee, we bless Thee, we worship Thee,
We praise Thee, we give thanks to Thee
For all thy great glory.

O heavenly King, Father Almighty,
Thou only-begotten Son, Jesus Christ,
Thou Holy Ghost.

O Lamb of God, the Son of the Father,
Thou takest away the sin of the world,
Have mercy upon us, Thou that takest away
the sin of the world.

Receive our prayer, Thou that sittest at the right hand of the Father, and have mercy upon us.

For Thou only art holy, Thou only art the Lord, Thou only art glorious, with the Holy Ghost, in the glory of God the Father.
Amen.

Between this and the form now in use are owing to the Latin translation. It can be seen that he has transferred the "Holy Ghost" from the third person to the second, which is not without some effect, as it obscures the fact that the last verse is a quotation from Phil. ii. 11. It is probable, that the hymn may belong to the fourth century.

It was adopted by the Western Church, as in the East, at first used as a morning hymn: ad matut. Omnia in that direction at the beginning of the service. Another, a few years later, orders it to be sung every day during the Easter season, every Sunday, and on the greater festivals. So in the Mozarabic and in the ancient Irish Churches.

We cannot tell for certain when it became a eucharistic hymn in the West, but probably, as far as regards the liturgy of Rome, as early as the beginning of the sixth century; in the Gallican and Spanish Churches probably in the eighth century.

There are several variations of the hymn found in the different Churches of the West. The following is from the ancient Irish Church:—

1. Glory to God in the highest, and in earth peace to men of good-will.
2. We praise Thee, we bless Thee, we adore Thee, we glorify Thee, we magnify Thee.
3. We give thanks to Thee because of Thy great mercy, O Lord, Heavenly King, God the Father Almighty.
4. O Lord, the only-begotten Son, Jesus Christ;
O Holy Spirit of God, and we all say Amen.
5. O Lord, the Son of God the Father, O Lamb of God, that takest away the sin of the world, have mercy upon us.
6. Receive our prayer, Thou that sittest at the right hand of God the Father; have mercy
upon us.
7. For Thou only art holy, Thou only art the Lord, Thou only art glorious, with the Holy Ghost, in the glory of God the Father.
Amen.

Another form has this addition in the middle:—

"Thou that sittest at the right hand of the Father, have mercy upon us, have mercy upon us, help us; guide us, preserve us; cleanse us, give us peace; deliver us from our enemies, from temptations, from heretics, from Arians, from schismatics, from barbarians."

Gloria Patri ["Glory be to the Father"].

—The Latin title of one of the primitive doxologies of the Church, sometimes called the lesser doxology, to distinguish it from the "Gloria in excelsis." Glorifying the Father and the Son, together with the Holy Ghost, was, in St. Basil's judgment, practised and prescribed by the Apostles themselves. He believes this was one of the "ordinances" or "traditions" for which St. Paul praised the Corinthians—as they had been delivered to them by him. The earliest mention that we meet with of this hymn is found in the circular epistle of the Church of Smyrna concerning the martyrdom of their bishop, Polycarp, from whence we learn that he uttered a doxology nearly resembling Gloria Patri. Polycarp was conversant with the Apostles, and was consecrated Bishop of Smyrna by St. John the Evangelist. The most ancient form of this doxology was only a single sentence without a response—"Glory to the Father, and to the Son, and to the Holy Ghost, world without end. Amen."

Part of the latter clause, "As it was in the beginning, is now, and ever shall be," was inserted some time after the first composition. The doxologies then in use were various in form, and the Arians took advantage of this diversity and wrested some of them so as to appear to favour their own views. They principally used one which ran in these words: "Glory be to the Father, by the Son, in the Holy Ghost." In the Fourth Council of Toledo [A.D. 633] the words "As it was in the beginning," etc., are omitted, but the word "honour" is added to "glory." The Western Church repeated it at the end of each psalm, and the Eastern Church at the end of the last psalm, the whole commonly running thus: "To Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, be all glory, worship, thanksgiving, honour, and adoration, now and for ever, throughout all ages, world without end. Amen."

Gloucester, BISHOPRIC OF.—The distinction of Gloucester as a cathedral city dates from the reign of Henry VIII. The cathedral is dedicated to the Holy and Undivided Trinity, but for many centuries preceding the Reformation there had existed the great Benedictine Abbey of St. Peter. Tradition speaks of a bishop and Christian king at Gloucester in the second century, but it is not probable that Christianity had any recognised hold in Britain till the beginning of the fourth century. The battle of Deorham in 577 swept away Christianity from the Severn valley, and for many years the Romano-British town of Caer Gleow, or Glou-ceaster, lay waste. Fifty years later, the counties of Gloucester and Worcester fell under the sway of the Mercian King Penda, and his grandson and successor Ethelred, who was a Christian, made a large grant of land to the under-king Osric in 681, on condition that he should build a nunnery at Gloucester and make his sister Kyneburg the first abbess. In 767 the nuns were driven from their abbey, and for fifty years St. Peter's lay in ruins. Beornulph, who was slain in 825, is said to have rebuilt the abbey, but, instead of nuns, he filled it with secular canons or preachers. Canute is said to have driven out these secular canons and to have substituted for them the Benedictine Order of monks in 1021. The first abbot was Edric, one of the secular canons, who became a monk in order that he might have this post. This abbey was destroyed by the Danes. In the reign of Edward the Confessor, Aldred, Bishop of the Hwiccas, commenced a new abbey in the Norman style. About 1067 Gloucester fell into the hands of the Norman invaders, and the abbey was seriously injured by fire. In 1072 William's chaplain, Serlo, was installed as abbot, and found the monastery very deficient in funds; but the Norman knights who had seized the neighbouring Welsh territories quieted their consciences by donations of land to Serlo and his successors. Serlo then commenced the work of restoration, and in 1100 the church and monastery were re-dedicated; two years later it was again damaged by fire. In 1134 Robert, Duke of Normandy, was buried here. In 1216 Henry III. was crowned at Gloucester, and in 1228 the great central tower was commenced; it was completed in 1239, and once more the abbey church was dedicated by Walter de Cantilupe, Bishop of Worcester. Very little work of this period is now to be found in the cathedral. The burial of the murdered King Edward II. did more than anything else for the welfare of the monastery. Thousands of pilgrims laden with offerings came to his shrine, and between 1329 and 1337 was built the south aisle, the earliest specimen of the work which renders the choir and cloisters so unique with their roofing of fan tracery. The choir was built between 1351 and 1411. The chronicles of St. Peter's terminate with the fourteenth century, and from that time to the Reformation we are dependent on Leland for any account of the additions and alterations in its structure. Between 1421 and 1455 Abbot Morwent rebuilt the western part; in 1460 the great eastern tower was begun, and finished in 1482, and in the latter part of the fifteenth century the present Lady Chapel was built. On Jan. 4th, 1540, the monastery was called upon to surrender to the spoils, with Thomas Cromwell at their head; the next year the abbey church was converted into a cathedral, and John Wakeman, the last abbot of Tewkesbury, became Bishop of the new See. In 1836 the Sees of Gloucester and Bristol were united under Bishop Monk. The cathedral has been restored of late years by Sir Gilbert Scott.

Gnosimachi [Gr. gnōsis, "knowledge;" and machoi, "fighters"].—A sect opposed to knowledge, that is to the science of Christianity, pronouncing good works all that was necessary. They were formed from a reaction against the Gnostic, Antiochian, and Alexandrian schools of theologians. Another name for them is the Rhetorians, so called from the ler, Rhetorius of Alexandria, whom St. Anasias speaks of as holding the opinion : doctrines are of no consequence, and that heretics are right in their own way.

Gnostics derived their name from the extraordinary religious knowledge (gnōsis) which they claimed to possess. The term is the name of any one particular sect, but not of a number of sects who all accepted the same main principles, but differed from one another on particular points, each sect following its own founder. Said to have been originally propagated by Simon Magus, Gnosticism spread through the greater part of the Roman Empire, rising to its greatest height at the middle of the second century, and continuing almost to the end of the fourth century. It was more a distinct religious system than a heresy, but its acceptance of some of the fundamental doctrines of Christianity made it a source of great trouble to the Church. It had some good effects, however, in causing the Faith to be more carefully maintained and more clearly defined.

Paul is supposed to refer to Gnosticism when he speaks, in his Epistle to Timothy, of the "opposition of science (gnōsis) falsely so-called" [1 Tim. vi. 20], and of "fables and genealogies" [1 Tim. i. 4]; and again, in the Epistle to the Colossians, of "philosophy and vain deceit" [Col. ii. 8].

Our knowledge of the system is derived from the works of its opponents, as no Gnostic writings have come down to us. It may be described as a combination of the notions of ancient philosophy, Magian theories, Judaism, and Christianity. In it the Oriental hypotheses concerning the origin of evil, and the relations of Plato and of Philo of Alexandria, were blended with the Christian doctrine of Redemption, and the resulting systems became very popular with those who had become weary of philosophy, but who yet would not bring themselves to receive the Christian faith.

The great home of Gnosticism was Egypt, particularly Alexandria. The founders of its numerous sects were almost all either Africans or Asiatics. The most renowned were :—

ASIATICS :—

1. Saturninus, who flourished at the beginning of the second century.
2. Bardesanes, under Marcus Aurelius.
3. Marcion, under Antoninus Pius.
4. Tatian (founder of the Encratites), in the middle of the second century.
5. Cerinthus, at the end of the second century.

AFRICANS :—

1. Basilides, under Hadrian and Antoninus Pius.
2. Carpocrates, under Hadrian.
3. Valentinus, under Antoninus Pius.

Ebionites, a Judaising sect, are also usually included amongst the Gnostics. [JEWISHES.] The main points of the Gnostic system were substantially as follows :—

1. Affecting the Doctrine of the TRINITY—

That there was one Eternal and Supreme Deity, from whom emanated a graduated series of existences called Æons; which Æons were to be regarded as manifestations of particular attributes of the Deity, and together constituted the Pleroma, or Fulness of the Godhead. Their number was variously given, Valentinus fixing it at thirty, Basilides at 365.

2. Affecting the Doctrine of the RESURRECTION—

That matter was essentially evil, the world and all material things having been created by a fallen Æon (or, according to some, by an evil power who had existed from all eternity). As a deduction from this, they denied the resurrection of the body, considering the body as a prison formed by the Demiurge, or fallen creator, for the confinement of the soul.

3. Affecting the Doctrine of the INCARNATION—

The above also led to erroneous views concerning our Lord Jesus Christ. They could not believe that a divine nature could unite with a material (and therefore evil) body. Accordingly two solutions of the difficulty were proposed :—

a. That Christ was human, but not divine, that He was merely a man, on whom the divinity descended at His baptism in the form of a dove, leaving Him before the Crucifixion. This view was held by the Ebionites, Basilidians, Carpocratians, and Cerinthians.

b. That Christ was divine, but not human; that His Body was not material, but—

[1] An unsubstantial phantom, which only seemed to be human.

This was the view of Saturninus, the Encratites, and Marcionites, and they were hence called Docetæ, from a Greek word meaning "to seem."

[2] Formed of heavenly elements, like those of the angels who appeared to men. This was the opinion of Bardesanes and Valentinus.

4. Affecting the Doctrine of the REDEMPTION—

That Christ's mission was not to die for sin, but to impart to man a knowledge of His heavenly origin, and to instruct him how to regain his lost condition. Those who attained this knowledge were saved. Salvation was the result, not of a sacrifice, but of gnōsis.

The rules of life deduced from the foregoing principles were of two opposite kinds :—

a. The followers of Bardesanes and Saturninus, and the Ebionites, Encratites, and Marcionites considered it their duty to resist the influence of the Demiurge by mortifying the body. They condemned marriage, and practised the greatest austerities.

b. The Basilidians, Valentinians, Carpocratians, and Cerinthians, on the other hand, regarding themselves as possessing saving "gnōsis," held that all actions were indifferent. They therefore indulged in all kinds of vicious practices and disgusting immoralities, which were doubtless the cause of many of the charges brought against the early Christians.

The Cerinthians also taught the doctrine of a millennium to be passed in sensual pleasures.

The Gnostics, as a rule, rejected the Old Testament, as given under the influence of the Demiurge. They usually accepted the New Testament, excepting, in some cases, the Epistles of St. Paul. They all made use of apocryphal books and spurious gospels which supported their views.

God.—It is a self-evident proposition that a belief in the existence of a Superior Being or Beings must be the basis of all religion, properly so called. Any movement of the soul after improvement, after that which satisfies its longings, must have its basis in such a belief in some form. The two great principles of religious belief which have prevailed in the world are Polytheism and Monotheism—i.e. the belief in "gods many and lords many," which characterised heathenism; and that in One Supreme Self-existent Being, which is at the very foundation of every form of Christianity. Outside these we have the negation which, it cannot be denied, has, and always has had, its professors, which declares "There is no God," or else which says, "We have no knowledge of such a one." [AGNOSTIC.]

When we come to examine into the grounds of belief in Deity, we first of all have a right to say that this belief is in possession of the field. However we account for it, it is unquestionably the fact that all over the world, as far as history takes us back, mankind have always believed in God, and have entered into speculations to know more of Him. Hindoos, and Chinese philosophers, Egyptians, Greeks, Latins, gave themselves with eagerness to the inquiry. The epoch of the coming of Christ found one people—the Jews—strenuously asserting that there is only one God, and that worship of other gods is a hateful superstition. The religion which Christ preached affirmed this doctrine, and the civilised world has accepted it; and thus, as we have said, the belief in God is in possession. Man is naturally a religious being—a God-worshipper—however he came to be so; and the fact is of tremendous significance, that the existence of God should thus belong, as it were, to the consciousness of humanity at large.

Christianity, however, came into direct conflict with many of the popular religious beliefs current at its birth, and thus when its doctrine of one God was called in question, it became necessary to offer reasons for such belief. In this controversy the strongest point was, there can be little doubt, the Christian doctrine of sin and of God's attitude in regard to it. It seems so now to us to believe that, if there be a God, there must be a just and moral Being, that we are in danger of forgetting that this is almost, if not entirely, confined to the teaching of Jewish and Christian revelation. In ancient heathen the matter by no means appeared in this light: his gods, as presented to him, were swayed far more by vindictive, selfish, and other personal motives than by moral motives. No man could be certain that he was not innocently offending some deity, even in striving to do some other, and thereby entailing misfortune on himself for the rest of his life, and the awful problem which for a man like Job powerless in its grasp, of reconciling the justice of God with the misfortunes of an innocent man, could never have come into the mind of a pagan at all, for the simple reason that the necessity that his deities should act right would not have entered his consciousness. Only a few of the rarest spirits of antiquity had made any approach to ideas of God as taught in the Hebrew Bible. But the truth was once clearly stated, as it was by the early Christians, it appealed at once to the conscience of men. The Christians gave arguments against the old gods; heathenism strove, under the form of Neo-Platonism, to reconstruct a new basis on which to stand itself, but it failed, and gave place to agnosticism. Thenceforth the way was clear for Christianity was not with Polytheism but with Negation and Unbelief.

The earliest argument adduced by the Christian apologists was that of the conscience—in God is an opinion implanted in the mind of men." Cardinal Newman says that belief in God presents more intellectual difficulties than any other belief, and is more certain to him as the certainty of existence. This is, in fact, making belief in God a part of the moral consciousness, and probably this may be regarded as the view accepted by the general voice of mankind. The conviction is in man that his consciousness of himself involves the consciousness of a power which is not himself, and which has an objective existence. The consciousness of imperfection involves the consciousness of perfection which must exist, above and beyond all things. We can conceive the existence of a perfect Being; and such a concept is not possible if there were no ground for it. This is known as the Ontological argument, the cognisance of an existence outside ourselves. The arguments of the great philosophers come to the same thing: "My reason begins, therefore it must have an external Author"; "I feel myself an accountable being, therefore there must be One superior to me who can punish, otherwise my existence would be a contradiction."

kin to this is the Cosmological argument—; which starts from the sequences and its in the universe. Whatever is must or have a cause or be self-existent. The is every hour showing signs that it is self-existent; change follows change, producing fresh phenomena. This argument has lately much strengthened by the modern discovery of what is called the “dissipation energy,” which involves as a necessary consequence the fact that the present constitution of things cannot have lasted from eternity, but must have had a beginning time. Otherwise “the great clock must run down” an eternity ago. Hence we are led back step by step to an ultimate cause of all things, whose self-existence is thus demonstrated. Paley carried the principle another step. The order, beauty, and arrangement of the universe, the adaptation of means to ends, all prove a wise and benevolent Intelligence created the world. This is the substance of Natural Theology—the teleological “argument from design.” Of late, however, with increased knowledge and greater development of moral sensibility, this has been objected on the ground of the multiplicity of circumstances which mar the happiness of creation. Not only earthquakes, famines, pestilences, recur again and again, but man preys on and torture each other. “I think the watch argument unanswerable,” said a late celebrated divine, alluding to the famous passage in Paley, where he supposes man seeing a watch for the first time and finding out the design of the maker. “But the watch keeps bad time,” was the retort of an opponent of the speaker. “Wouldn’t it be easy to prove that the devil made the world on his lines?” The retort is not a sound one, and yet there is a measure of truth in it. There is little doubt that the stern and apparently cruel facts of Nature do exert with awful force upon many minds, which are thereby deterred from believing in a benevolent Creator: and even Mr. Paley, who held that there were many apparent tokens of design, adaptation, and benevolence, was himself brought to the conclusion that the power of a Being who had seen such proofs of goodwill, must be limited by conditions over which he had no efficient control, to account for the phenomena. There can be no doubt that Paley’s view of Nature was a very imperfect and partial one; and the difficulty is not removed by modern ideas respecting the work of natural laws, as is sometimes maintained. It would rather appear that, as regards the Christian Revelation and its view of these elements, the difficulty has mainly arisen from an altogether partial and imperfect view of its field and its scope, which has been such, in popular teaching, confined to man himself. It is said that the contradictions and difficulties of which we have spoken find their explanation in this Revelation, which declares that through certain causes mankind has become alienated from its Creator, and thereby has become subject to sorrow and pain. [SIN.] But the Christian believes that God has restored mankind to a knowledge of Himself through Christ, who came into the world for the very purpose of revealing the nature and character of God. He revealed God as the Father, which involves the great truth of the theologian—“God is Love.” This is true. But it is too commonly taught as if man alone required such a remedial and elevating agency: it has been proclaimed in thousands of pulpits that “man alone is out of joint” with the purposes of Creation, and that all other creatures “fulfil the end of their being.” If this were so, there would be no reply to the argument of Mill and others; for the moral difficulty arises precisely from our being unable to see any moral cause for, or end in, so much physical suffering as prevails in the animal world around us. But such is not the teaching of the Revelation itself. This tells us plainly that the whole Creation also does groan and travail in pain together—the fact is not blinked; and that it also waits for the adoption and redemption—the promise to it also is not withheld. However such words are understood, their weight is obvious; and in a far wider and fuller recognition of them than has been usual must be found the Christian answer to such difficulties as these.

Thus we have seen that, as the ages rolled on, it became a necessity of the case, and must still remain so, for current conceptions of God to be modified and perfected according to the needs of the time. The fulness of perfection cannot be seen by any finite being; each one will see that which presents itself to his eye. Imperfect conceptions are not imperfect because they are partial, but because they ignore or deny the perfect. Agnosticism and Manichæism were distortions of Christian truths. The half-awakened mind of mediævalism, peopling the unknown world with imaginary dangers, multiplied mediators and intercession, until God seemed too far removed to be within the hearing of His creatures. The Reformation was in very truth a restoration of the one God to His place as the centre of all true theology. But the popular views of earthly government then in vogue showed themselves in a notion of God, which, in declaring His Sovereignty, ignored His Fatherhood and compassion. This was the basis of Calvinism. In revolt from it came the Socinian theory that our knowledge of God is imperfect, but sufficient for practical purposes, and that morality is the way of salvation. The inquiries and speculations set on foot by the sixteenth century revolt against traditional opinion will probably last until the end of time. [DEISM;

PANTHEISM.] There can be little doubt that the crude language of many theological authorities, of more than one school, seemed to present God as if separate and apart from His own creation; as if, having once made it and "ordained" laws for it, it might henceforth go on in a fashion without Him, really Divine power and authority being only henceforth to be seen in miracle or other special intervention. This subtle practical atheism was entirely foreign to the Hebrew, to whose mind God spoke in the thunder and whispered in the wind; but how far it had permeated much of very "orthodox" theology it would be easy to show. The reaction to the Pantheistic view, that God and the Universe were one and the same—God the All, of which every man or thing was but a part—was natural. But, on the whole, Christian theology has probably gained from it, in learning to see everywhere and in everything the manifestation of Divine energy, acting in the present, and bringing the Infinite presence home to the very next neighbourhood of men—as close to their actual bodies, as the Divine and Holy Spirit could draw nigh to their inmost souls.

It should further be pointed out that even the Agnosticism of modern days has also helped to correct current conceptions of God, and to give to them in some respects more worthy forms. As an argument against any real knowledge of God, the Agnostic argument is very simply answered. The great leader of this school (Mr. Spencer) has himself shown, and it has been shown by physicists again and again, that the Unknowable confronts us finally, at every point of investigation, in the physical world itself. The Energy that surrounds us, the simplest piece of Matter we take in our hands, alike absolutely baffle our comprehension at the last; we not only cannot know what they really are, but cannot even grasp any conception of their ultimate reality. Mr. Spencer himself [First Principles] very fairly demonstrates this, and the demonstration can be carried much farther. But we nevertheless can know and do know very much about the physical universe, and this knowledge is real and true knowledge so far as it goes. We know very much, and may learn yet much more, of the modes and manifestations and finite relations of the Unknowable, in their various forms. Precisely in the same way, therefore, an Agnostic is bound in consistency to admit, that though in essence or ultimate Reality we cannot find Him out, yet we may know much about the Infinite God, provided only there be such an one to know, as Mr. Spencer practically admits, and that He chooses to be known of us. Yet there is much in the Agnostic argument that is of service, and is indeed little more than grave and just rebuke to a coarse familiarity of detail and precision of statement which a truer reverence for God could never have tolerated. Divi written pages about what God "could not" or "must" do, and "must be," as freely as if the Divi were altogether such an one as Some protest against this was need even in less gross matters than may be hoped that Agnostic criticism already produced a tone of more caution and humility. To take but stance: Mr. Spencer himself has put strong terms against certain affirmations respecting the "personality" of God, a doctrine essential to the very heart of a religion or to the Christian life. But in an article he has explained this protest in a somewhat unexpected way; stating that he had been understood to mean Inscrutable Power (the term which I to use) was a Being in some sense Personality, his meaning rather what attributes such a Being possess be infinitely "above" all that we know such, as much so as the Infinite is above Finite in all other things. In such there is something to learn from, the end may bring real gains to theology.

Finally, it should be observed in those means by which God may be known that those who most profoundly study in comparative manner the progressive of the idea of God in history, will most profoundly struck with the advance to a distinct and advanced standpoint, at the close of the Hebrew and Christian revelation, at a time when the other deities recognized the world were themselves conceived sunk in sensuality and selfishness, the was taught of one God, who loved righteousness and hated iniquity, and who was not the deeds of sinful men; he was penetrated with that idea, that the mission of good men, instead of being to him be borne in sullenness or stoicism, heathen, were an awful moral problem faced somehow, and wrestled out in a spirit as a fundamental one. It is not to trace the same amazing superiority in detail; but it should be noted that, in the Scriptures have been collectively in part of the Church, they have ever stood at such historical advances as have been briefly reviewed. They have never the irreverently familiar declarations of theologians concerning the Divine attributes; they have borne continuous testimony against the banishment of God from His own "common" world, which was ever full of His holy presence; they witnessed for ages of His long-suffering and all that is true in Agnosticism "written" in them for centuries; taught to man the limitations to knowledge imposed upon him by the capacity of his own intellect. It can hardly be men will know even more of God and will form yet more worthy of Him, and will find more in themselves than we are able to know it is so, they will, like ourselves, at it is all in these Scriptures, as for them; as we in our time according to the capacity given to us like these are absolutely simple and everyday reading the Christian Scriptures will be weighty to every really good and impartial man, and will disengage at least to examine with interest, and respect, on its own merits, the Scriptures affirm concerning the "being known" of Him, whom all men clearly allege will ever be out. [See, further, TRINITY, ; CREED.]

God.—This and the expressions it is followed in the Nicene Creed assigned to assert in the most clear the essential Divinity of the Son of the Trinity. Being the Son only-begotten of the Father, the Divine nature, He is therefore called, "as one man is the son of a man," though after a spiritual manner, propagated as one light is generated, without diminution of substance from the Eternal Essence, as creatures are; being of one substance with the Father, and therefore of very God.

It is very necessary to remind the reader that the above expression is not to be taken as implying simply that Christ is God, as other Gods; for though He is called King and Lord of lords, yet His faith recognises no God but Himself, the very design of this portion of the Creed is to set forth the Redeemer of mankind as partaker in the one "Divine

St., Archbishop of Rouen, was born at Bayeux, a village in Picardy, in the year 460. A belief prevailed in the country that he and St. Medard were born on the same day, but no mention occurs in the earliest Lives of them. Godard attended the first Council of Orleans in 511, while St. Medard remained till 530. Godard was ordained by the Bishop of Vermand, and after, towards the end of the fifth century, elected Archbishop of Rouen. He was a heathen in his diocese, but by his preaching converted most of them. There were many miracles in his life which have contributed to make him famous in history. First, his share with St. Vaast, and St. Medard in the conversion of Clovis. Secondly, his assisting, in 511, at the first Council of Orleans, one of the most celebrated synods ever held in France. Thirdly, his consecrating St. Lo, a boy of twelve, Bishop of Coutances, because he believed that God would have him do so. Godard died in 530, and was buried in a chapel of St. Mary, in later times called after him. He was commemorated at Rouen with his reputed brother, June 8th.

Godéau, ANTHONY, Bishop of Grasse and of Vence, was born at Dreux in 1605. He entered the Church, and Cardinal Richelieu, attracted by his preaching, recommended him to the French King for the bishopric of Grasse, to which he was consecrated at the end of 1638. The towns of Grasse and Vence being only three leagues distant from each other, and the bishopric's worth only 10,000 francs a year, Godéau procured a Bull from Innocent X. for uniting them; but the clergy and laity appealed against the union, so he contented himself with the See of Vence. He died of apoplexy, at Vence, in 1672. Godéau wrote a great many poems on religious subjects, beginning with The Hymn of the Three Children; but his principal work is his Ecclesiastical History, containing a history of the first eight centuries. He was also the author of commentaries on St. Paul's Epistles, and on the lives of St. Paul, St. Augustine, St. Charles Borromeo, etc.

Godfathers and Godmothers. [SPONSORS.]

Godfrey of Bouillon, called the "Christian Hercules," Prince of Lorraine; the exact date of his birth is uncertain, but his parents were married in 1059. He gave such proofs of an invincible courage under the Emperor Henry IV., whom he served with great success in Germany and Italy, that he was chosen general of the expedition which the Christians undertook for the recovery of the Holy Land, and 80,000 foot and 10,000 horsemen were placed under his command. He sold his hereditary dukedom of Lorraine to Othbert, bishop of the diocese, and laid out the money in preparations for the war. He assembled his forces on the banks of the Meuse and the Moselle, and thence marched through Germany, Bohemia, and Hungary. The Greeks opposed his march, but he at length constrained the Emperor Alexius Comnenus to allow him a free passage. In 1097 he vanquished Solyman, Sultan of the Turks, and took Nicea after a month's siege, then Antioch and Edessa, but not till after much delay and frightful losses, in four years' time he had subdued Lycania, Cilicia, Syria, and Mesopotamia, which struck such terror into the Saracens that the Caliph of Egypt sued for peace by his ambassadors. In May, 1099, Godfrey reached Jerusalem, having then only 40,000 men, and many of those unfit to fight, and after a struggle of five weeks' duration, he took the city by storm. By general consent of the chieftains of his army, he was chosen King of Jerusalem, but he refused either to bear that title or be crowned with a diadem of gold in the place where his Saviour had been treated with ignominy and crowned with thorns. In August of the same year, the Sultan, seeing how Godfrey's army was weakened, sent against him 100,000 horse and a proportionate number of infantry; but they were defeated with terrible slaughter at the battle of Ascalon, and that victory gained Godfrey the quiet possession of the Holy Land. He enjoyed his conquests but a very short time, for he died in 1100. His exploits and virtues have been immortalised by Tasso in his Gerusalemme Liberata.

Godwin, FRANCIS, son of Thomas Godwin, Bishop of Bath and Wells, was born at Havington, in Northamptonshire, in 1561. He was admitted student of Christ Church in 1578, and after taking his degrees, was ordained priest, and presented to the rectory of Sanford Orms, in Somersetshire. He then became successively vicar of Weston-in-Zoyland, sub-dean of Exeter, rector of Bishop's Luffard in 1601, and Bishop of Llandaff. King James, in 1617, translated him to the bishopric of Hereford, where he died in 1633. His chief work was A Catalogue of the Bishops of England, which was published in 1601, and dedicated to Lord Burkhurst, who was in Queen Elizabeth's favour, and who caused him to be preferred to Llandaff. He also wrote Nuncius Inanimatus, or the Mysterious Messenger, and The Man in the Moon, from which work Bishop Wilkins is supposed to have taken some hints for his Discovery of a New World in the Moon.

Gomarists or Anti-Remonstrants.

—The opponents of the Arminians. They take their name from their leader, Francis Gomar, who was born at Bruges in 1563. He commenced his studies at Strasburg and Heidelberg, and in 1582 came to England, and went first to Oxford and then to Cambridge, where he took his B.D. in 1584. In 1594 he was elected Professor of Divinity at Leyden, and he is chiefly known for his violent opposition to the doctrines of his colleague Arminius. He was present at the Synod of Dort, in 1618, and was the main instrument in getting the Arminians expelled from the Reformed Church. He then became Professor of Hebrew and Divinity at Groningen, and died there in 1641. He was a man of great learning, and very bigoted in his views. His works were published in Amsterdam in 1645.

Good Friday.—The Friday in Holy Week received its name from the good things which our Saviour gained for us sufferings and death. Among the 8 was called Long Friday—probably on of the long fasts and offices used on it.

The commemoration of Christ's has been kept from the very first Christianity as a day of the strictest and humiliation. At the Fourth O Toledo, in 633, all those who only fast 3 p.m. were severely censured, and bidden to partake of the Paschal E Special thanksgivings for the Atonement intercessions for all men, were made day; and later, the singing of the Res and the Adoration of the Cross were.

The three collects for Good Friday taken from the Sermon Usque from the story of Gelasius. The first is for the as "the family of God;" the second "all estates of men in God's holy Church" and the third for all "Jews, Turks, and heretics," following Christ's example praying for His enemies. The Epistle [xi.] brings forward the ancient sacrificial type of Christ's death, and shows through His intercession there is a "living way to the Father." The Gospel John's account of the Examination of Pilate and of the Crucifixion [John xii.] history of the typical sacrifice of Isaac [Isaiah lii. 13, liii. 12] the prophetic sufferings of Christ. The Second are [John xviii., which, formerly, with John xix., formed the Gospel of John's account of the Betrayal, the Betrayal before Anna, and the Denial of Peter; and [1 Peter ii.] St Peter's exhortation to all good works on the feast of Christ, and to the bearing of sufferings bore them.

In the Roman Church the officiants appear in black garments, the altar is bare, the candles are not lighted. After vespers the altar is covered with white and passages from the Old and New Testaments are read. Eighteen prayers are said, on which our three collects are said. Those for the Jews are forbidden kneeling. Then follows "the Adoration of the Cross," which is now divested of the vestments with which it had been covered, and by the clergy and people while the Mass is sung. Then comes the Communion the Presanctified. It is forbidden to celebrate the Mass on this day, but to receive a Host previously consecrated according to a Roman Ordo about the ceremony ended with the silent prayer of the faithful; but at vespers forbidden, except in the case of sick.

Good Works.—The Twelfth of the Church of England expresses the which the Church accepted from the Law which may be taken as an example theology on this subject. The foundation of this doctrine is taken from artley, Margaret Professor of Divinity at Oxford.—"Such works are inseparable union with Christ, but then as an union, not as causes or instruments are created in Christ Jesus unto us." "He that abideth in me, and I abide in him, we bring forth much fruit; but if I should be separated from me—ye can do nothing." While, however, we regard good works as inseparable from our union with Christ, we remember that they are an end also, and for which we have been united to Him, as a condition of the continuance of our union. "The branch cannot, if it be severed from the vine, bear fruit of itself, except it abide in the vine; but yet its fruitfulness is the result of the care and pains which the vine-tender takes upon it, and therefore a condition which it is suffered to remain. And as we are in good works is a condition on which we are suffered to continue in Christ, it is the measure according to which degrees of grace are given, 'every one that beareth fruit, he purgeth it, that he may bring forth more fruit.' And yet the fruit which indeed follows upon the former works are the rule by which God will judge us at the last day. These will decide all controversy how far we have attained to the end of our new creation; how we have improved the talents entrusted to us; how we are qualified and prepared for the kingdom into which 'there shall in no wise anything that defileth,' where 'the just shall live all righteous,' where the merciful shall receive mercy, where 'the pure shall see God,' where the servant of the Lord shall have improved the pound entrusted to him; 'he that has gained five pounds, shall be set over five cities, and he who has lost ten pounds shall have authority over ten cities.'"

From this the Roman Church, at the Council of Trent, declares that a man is already justified through such works as he does by the grace of God. "The merit of Christ, whose living members by their merits increase of grace, eternal life is the actual attainment of eternal life in grace." Man being a free agent (say the commentators) his good works are worthy of reward; the rewards promised by God are of all proportion to the work of the man; it follows that they are of His free grace, not of His justice. We can claim God by our good works, therefore we can claim upon Him [Luke xvii. 7]. His own free will He has promised us that we have no right to ask [Luke xii. 47, 48], to reward good works with life [Tim. iv. 8; Rom. ii. 6; Heb. vi. 10]. Such good works can only be done by the grace of God. God moves man, not because of merit which He sees in him, but because of His own free love. But having received that love, and thus passed from death to life, the works of the Christian man, being the fruit of Christ's Passion, each and all merit God's reward. He "walks worthily with all pleasing."

Goodwin, CHARLES W. [b. 1817, d. 1878].—A learned layman, author of some brilliant essays on philological and Eastern antiquarian (especially Egyptian) subjects, but better known generally to the world as the writer of the essay on The Mosiac Cosmogony in the Essays and Reviews. In that essay he advanced little or nothing that would be questioned by Biblical students of the present day.

Goodwin, JOHN [b. 1593, d. 1665].—A learned controversialist on the Arminian side. He gained much favour with Cromwell for writing two pamphlets in defence of the High Court of Justice in the condemnation of Charles I. At the Restoration he was deprived of his living, which was in London, and his writings were publicly burned. Wesley held his theological opinions in such respect that he has been called the "Wiclif of Methodism." His works are on the subject of Justification, in which he combated the doctrine of Final Perseverance.

Goodwin, THOMAS [b. 1600, d. 1679].—A learned divine among the Independents, educated at Cambridge, and a Fellow of Christ's College, but disagreeing with Laud's views he went to Holland and became pastor of a Puritan congregation there. On the breaking out of the Rebellion he came to England, and was made president of Magdalen College, Oxford, and was one of the Westminster divines. He is said to be the Puritan president depicted by Addison in the Spectator, No. 494. His works were reprinted among Nichols's Puritan Divines in 12 vols. in 1861. They are learned and pious, but diffuse, and probably but little read.

Gorham Case.—In 1847 the Rev. G. C. Gorham was presented by the Lord Chancellor to the living of Bramford Speke, in Devon; but the Bishop of Exeter, Dr. Philpotts, then almost the only decided High Churchman on the bench, refused to institute him, on the ground that he was unsound in doctrine in denying that regeneration is in all cases wrought by baptism. Mr Gorham appealed to the law, and in 1849 Sir Herbert J. Fust, Dean of the Court of Arches, decided against him, on the ground that Baptismal Regeneration is undoubtedly the doctrine of the Church of England. Mr. Gorham then appealed to the Privy Council, and the case having been again argued, judgment was given on March 8th, 1850, reversing the decision of the court below, on the ground that a difference of opinion had existed among the Reformers, and ever since among English

Churchmen. This judgment (which gave rise to much subsequent controversy), proceeded on the assumption that the court had no jurisdiction or authority to settle matters of faith, or to determine what ought in any particular to be the doctrine of the Church of England; "the duty extends only to the consideration of that which is by law established to be the doctrine of the Church of England, upon the true and legal construction of her Articles and formularies." The two Archbishops acquiesced in this judgment; the Bishop of London did not. Mr. Gorham was in consequence admitted to the vicarage. The excitement led to the secession of a few eminent men from the Church, among them two of the Wilberforces and Archdeacon Manning. The general result of the controversy, however, was a pretty general agreement that the judgment of the Dean of Arches correctly embodied the doctrine of the Anglican Church concerning the sacrament of Baptism.

Gospel.—This is the Anglo-Saxon literal translation of the word εὐαγγέλιον, which again is only a Latinised form of the Greek εὐαγγέλιον, and signifies "good tidings." [1] In its widest sense it signifies the revelation of the mercy of God to sinful man through a Mediator. [2] It was also applied from the beginning of Christian literature to the histories of the life, actions, death, resurrection, and ascension of the Lord Jesus Christ. When delivered orally by the first preachers it was called the Gospel of His Grace, because it flows from His free love [Acts xx. 24]; the Gospel of the Kingdom, as it treats of the kingdoms of grace and glory; the Gospel of Christ, because He is the author and subject of it [Rom. i. 16]; the Gospel of peace and salvation, as it promotes our present comfort, and leads to eternal glory [Eph. i. 13; vi. 15]; the glorious Gospel, as in it the glorious perfections of Jehovah are displayed [2 Cor. iv. 4]; the everlasting Gospel, as it was designed from eternity, is permanent in time, and the effects of it are eternal [Rev. xiv. 6].

In the ritual of the Anglican Church the term Gospel is also used for the portion of Scripture taken from the writings of the Evangelists, which is read after the Epistle in the Ante-Communion Service. Formerly candles were used during the reading of the Gospels, termed "Gospel-lights." The custom of singing "Glory be to Thee, O Lord," before, and "Thanks be to Thee, O Lord," after the Gospel, is purely traditional. The first mention of it is to be found in Edward VI.'s first Prayer Book.

Gospel Side.—That side of the altar at which the Gospel is read, viz. the north side, it being understood that the chancel is at the east end of the church.

Gospeller.—The clergyman who is appointed to read the Gospel for the day. In some cathedrals a clergyman is always to perform this duty. It is customary for only two clergymen part in the Ante-Communion Service, the principal reading the Gospel, the deacons when ordained are authorized to read the Gospel in the Church of C

Gospellers.—[1] A term of applied to the Reformers, because that their mission was to preach and read the Gospel. [2] The name was assumed early Puritans, as "Evangelicals" towards by a party in the Church, so that they represented better the brethren the life and truth of the Testament. Bishop Latimer in one sermon speaks unflatteringly of the Gospeller, one of the new brethren than a rank Papist." Archbishop also describes them as "the cause of obedience, sedition, and carnal liberal

Gossip (A.-S. God-sib or "God's-brother"). One who stands sponsor at baptism. Relationship between a person and his wife was called gossamer. Formerly marriage was forbidden between those who stood in the same relationship, but the law is now abolished.

Gothic Architecture.—It was given in contempt to the style signified by partisans of the Classical architecture, who meant it to signify "barbarous," but it has been universally applied to express the whole range of medieval architecture. There was an attempt to get rid of the implied slur by using the word "Pointed" instead, but this never gained ground, and is repudiated by the best authorities. Mr. J. H. Parker, in fact, declares it a misnomer, inasmuch as he includes headed arches. He gives the following convenient epochs of the successive styles:—

Early Norman	1070—1100	Decorated	—
Norman	1100—1140	Transition	—
Transition	1140—1180	Perpendicular	—
Early English	1180—1272	Late or Decorated	—
Transition	1272—1300	of 17th cent	—

It will be seen in the above that in the styles are made to overlap, so that the Transition period continues in the succeeding style. Mr. Parker's volume, The A B C of Architecture, gives very full information respecting the changes, one of its merits being that it teaches the student how to discern styles for himself, the only real way," he says, "of understanding architectural history about and see the buildings themselves."

Gottschalk.—A German musician of the ninth century, much esteemed for his skill and the penetration of his genius, but afterwards accused of heresy for teaching redestination. He was an ardent Augustine and his pupil Fulhe taught—[1] That God pre-people to damnation; [2] that it Saviour's intention to save all at He did not die for all, but only ; [3] he denied the liberty of The divines of that time were question, some (amongst them Bishop of Troyes, and Ratram- of Corbi) maintaining that his well understood, were the same agustine's on those heads; but chbishop of Mayence, believing f heresy, sent him to his Metro- acmar, Archbishop of Rheims, ned a council at Quiersy, by doctrines were condemned, and was deprived of his priesthood, n, and thrown into prison, where , persisting to the last in his e was refused the last sacraments ch and denied Christian burial. d for an ally in this persecution Duns Scotus.

conferred, changes were made in the gown for distinction's sake, colours and facings were introduced, and hoods (originally that part of the gown which was drawn over the head out of doors) were also made distinctive. [Hoods.] Some persons again contended that inasmuch as the sermon was part of the Communion Service, the preacher should then wear his surplice, but at afternoon and evening service, where there is no mention of the sermon, the gown should be worn. This was a custom which prevailed in "High Church" services a few years ago. Formerly it was used in church as the preaching dress, and the substitution of the surplice for it was a subject of controversy, which has now almost died out. The signal for this controversy was given by Bishop Blomfield's Charge in 1842, when he expressed the opinion that the surplice was the proper preaching dress. The discussion turns upon the question whether the sermon is a part of Divine worship: if it be, the surplice is clearly the proper dress. But many contended that it was not so; that the preacher, who once was frequently an itinerant monk, was not an officiant in Divine worship. And to this it was replied again, that this was only because of the ignorance of the clergy; that when, by reason of better education, they were able to preach themselves, the sermon took its rightful place as part of their ministration. The question has never been authoritatively settled, but of late years the surplice has become the usual garment at all services.

Grabe, JOHN ERNEST, D.D., was born at Königsberg in 1666. His father being Professor of Divinity and History at the university in this town, John received his education there. He diligently studied the writings of the Fathers, and was led to doubt the orthodoxy of the ordination of Lutheran ministers, so he resolved to become a Roman Catholic, but on making his doubts known the Elector of Brandenburg sent three Lutherans to dispel them. These, failing to convince him, advised him to go to England, and he arrived here during the reign of William and Mary. He studied at Oxford, was ordained, and was made a D.D. in 1706. Five years after he died in London, and was buried in Westminster Abbey.

Though Grabe joined the Church of England, he was still inclined towards some of the Romish practices, as prayers for the souls of the dead, anointing with oil, confession and sacerdotal absolution, etc. He was the author of several works, the chief of which was an edition of the Septuagint, which he copied from the Alexandrian manuscript. He also edited Irenæus, parts of Origen, Spicilegium of the writings of the Fathers and heretics of the first three centuries, and other works.

Grace [the English equivalent of the Greek word charis].—There are various senses in which this word is used in Scripture, but the general idea of it, as it relates to God, is His free favour and love. As it respects men, it implies the happy state of reconciliation and favour with God wherein they stand, and the holy endowments, qualities, or habits of faith, hope, love, etc., which they possess. Divines have distinguished grace into common or general, special or particular. Common grace, if it may be so called, is what all men have, as the light of nature and reason, convictions of conscience, etc. [Rom. ii. 4, 1 Tim. iv. 18]. Special grace is that which is peculiar to Christians. They are by God's favour chosen out of the world, redeemed, pardoned, justified [Rom. viii. 28-30]. This grace so bestowed becomes the principle of life, and brings forth good works in those to whom it is given. Consequently the Apostle exhorts to "growth in grace"—that is, to progress in the Divine life. Such growth discovers itself by an increase of spiritual light and knowledge; by the renunciation of self, and dependence on Christ; by growing more spiritual in duties; by being more humble, submissive, and thankful; by rising superior to the corruptions of our nature, and finding the power of sin more weakened in us; by being less attached to the world, and possessing more of a heavenly disposition.

Grace at Meals [Lat. gratias, "thanks"].—From the earliest times Christians have followed the example of Christ, who blessed the food before partaking, and they offer a short prayer before and after meals, praising and thanking God for His goodness in supplying their wants.

Grace, PILGRIMAGE OF, was the name given to an insurrection in 1536, on account of its religious character. A dangerous feeling caused by the introduction of the Reformation into England, which was looked on as heresy in the north, had long been growing up in Yorkshire, and when, in the autumn of 1536, two commissioners, Legh and Layton, were appointed to carry out the Act of Suppression in Yorkshire, while others were appointed in Lincolnshire, Cheshire, and Lancashire, the excitement rose to a head. The rebellion began in Louth, in Lincolnshire, and spread all over the north. The insurgents drew up six petitions to the Crown:—That the religious houses should be restored, the subsidy remitted, the clergy should pay no more tithes or first-fruits to the Crown, the Statute of Uses should be repealed, the villein blood should be removed from the Privy Council, and that several of the bishops who were heretics, should be deprived. The King refused to grant them, and the Lincolnshire rebels subsided. But those in Yorkshire increased daily. They were headed by a barrister, Robert Aske, who seems to have been a good leader, as well as a kind and benevolent man. Lord Darcy, much trusted by the King, and other nobles joined the insurgents, who marched against and took Hull and Henry began to see the danger, and a was sent to the north. The rebels mar Doncaster, but when there found Norfolk the troops ready to oppose them. They disinclined to fight, so a council was the bridge leading into the town, rebels dictated their terms. These were carried up to London, and the King sent answer of general pardon, and the parliament to be held at York. They dispersed, but again rose, and, when they were quelled, Henry, saying they had their treaty, executed Aske, Lord Darcy, and several monks and abbots. When commissioners visited the abbeys in the following year, the insurrection became an act of great cruelty.

Gradual.—An antiphon or sententia in the Communion Office after the Epistle and before the Gospel. It comes from the Latin gradus, "a step." But the term is also applied to other parts of the Eucharistic service such as the Introit, Creed, Gloria in excelsis, Agnus Dei, etc., because they are chanted from the steps of the choir or ambo. It is also called GRADALE or Grail, or Graal, THE HOLY.—There are many explanations of the word, some say it comes from the old French greal; others affirm it to be a corruption of guis regalis, "royal blood," which corrupted into sangreal. The Grail was given to the chalice, said to have been brought from heaven by angels, which Christ used at the Last Supper. During the Middle Ages many legends, probably originated in the twelfth century, were all over Europe. It was said that Joseph of Arimathea took it out of the upper part of the cross. He brought it with him to England, where it gained miraculous powers. King Arthur's knights endeavoured to find it, but none were successful except Sir Galahad, who was the only truly pure knight. The subject of one of Tennyson's idylls, The Holy Grail, holds it to be a parable of the Eucharist, saying that the bread and wine at the Last Supper have been changed into the true body and blood of Christ, and the search after the Grail is explained as an attempt to find the meaning of the sacrament; but there is no foundation for this conceit.

Gratian, born at Chiusi, in the twelfth century, and a Benedictine monk in the monastery of Santa Fina at Bononia. There he wrote his Decretum, or Concordia Canonum, wherein he endeavours to reconcile the seeming contradiction of the texts relating to this purpose he makes use of were several times made to effect a reconciliation, but without success. The Greek Church of the present day remains in doctrine and ceremonial almost entirely as it was at the time of its separation. The chief points of difference from the Roman Church are the omission of the "Filioque" from the Nicene Creed, and the denial of the Papal supremacy. The doctrine of the Trinity and of the Incarnation and life of Christ are exactly the same as those of the Western Church, and the Greeks follow the Romans with regard to the belief in Purgatory and in the Seven Sacraments. They hold the Blessed Virgin and the saints in great reverence, and great importance is attached to the sacred pictures, or icons, which abound in their churches, houses, and streets. Beyond the Nicene Creed there are no doctrinal tests.

The ceremonial of the Greek Church is more elaborate than that of any other, and the number of its services is remarkable; sermons are almost unknown. Threefold immersion is practised in Baptism, the Communion is administered to infants, and in both kinds, and prayer is made standing. In other points there is little difference from the ritual of the Roman Church. The secular priests are obliged to marry once, but not more than once. Monasteries and convents are very numerous, and the monks are under severe discipline. Many Christians spend their lives in wandering from one monastery to another in their pilgrimage, and are always hospitably received.
The largest and most famous of these buildings is Troitsa, which has numbers of churches and a university within its walls.

Gregory I., POPE, called "the Great," born about 550, the son of a Roman senator.
He distinguished himself greatly in logic and rhetoric, and in 573 was made Prefect of Rome, and in 581 Governor of that city. His ascetic turn of mind led him, however, to embrace the monastic life, and he retired into the monastery of St. Andrew, which he had founded, of which he became abbot, and made his monastery very famous by the austerities which he practised. It was while he was still a monk that the incident of the Anglo-Saxon slaves in the market-place of Rome occurred;
and Gregory had obtained permission from the Pope to become a missionary to our island, and had actually started, when the people of Rome insisted that he should be recalled. All his patrimony he spent in founding monasteries. In 582 Pope Pelagius II. dragged him from his retirement, ordained him deacon, and sent him to Constantinople as Nuncio to the Emperor Tiberius. He acquitted himself well in this employment, and while there disputed with the Patriarch Eutychius concerning the nature of glorified bodies, Gregory maintaining that they were not aërial vehicles, but palpable and solid, though supernaturally spiritualised and refined. While there he wrote the greater part of his Magna Moralia, or exposition of the Book of Job. On his return to Rome, he became secretary to Pope Pelagius, and upon the death of this Pope was unanimously chosen as his successor, Sept. 4th, 590. He wished to decline the honour, but was forced to accept it, but he retained his love of monasticism to the end of his days. During his popedom he convened many synods, and endeavoured to restore the discipline of the Church, and was very zealous in checking the progress of heresy and delusion. John, Patriarch of Constantinople, having taken on himself the title of Œcumenical or Universal Bishop, Gregory remonstrated with him on his presumption. For his own title he took that which has since been retained by the popes, Servus Servorum Domini, i.e. Servant of the servants of the Lord. He was very energetic in the propagation of Christianity, and in 596, in pursuance of his former desire, he sent Augustine, Mellitus, and a band of monks, to England to convert the Anglo-Saxons. He reclaimed the Spanish Church from Arianism to orthodoxy, which was proclaimed at the Council of Toledo in 589. In Africa he opposed the Donatists. He was humane to the heathen and the Jews, and laboured, though not very successfully, to check the European slave-trade. He was the first Pope to assume temporal power, his title to which was gained by his beneficent government. He found Rome in a hopeless state of continual warfare, and he procured peace for her. By his influence with Theodolinda, Queen of Lombardy, he effected the conversion of that country. One blot upon the fair fame of Gregory is that in 603, on the death of the Emperor Maurice, he sent congratulatory letters to his murderer, the tyrant Phocas. His able administration and care of his flock at Rome deservedly earned him the title of "Great." He lived in a very frugal manner, and gave the revenues of his See to the poor. His skill in music led him to remodel the whole system of sacred music, and that which he adopted was named after him, "Gregorian." He died in 604. There are several editions of his works: he wrote many homilies: those on Ezekiel and the Gospels are extant. His Dialogues were written during his retirement. His twelve books of Epistles, written during the time when he was pope, furnish rules and prudent decisions on many points of discipline. His accounts of miracles show too much credulity on that point.

Gregory VII., or HILDEBRAND, was born about 1020, at Saona, in Tuscany, and supposed to be of low origin. He spent the first part of his life in Rome, and then became a monk in the abbey of Cluny. On his return to Rome, Gregory VI. made him his successor, but on the Pope's death he once more returned to Cluny, and there remained until he was nominated Bishop of Toul, who was nominated Henry III., passing through France, back to Rome, imagining that he might have a serviceable interest for him in Italy. Under this pope (Leo IX.) Hildebrand gained great influence, and also during the pontificates of his successors, Victor II., Stephen IX., Benedict X., and Alexander II. In a word, he supported the popes, and having taken upon himself the office of Chancellor of the Holy See, he exercised the absolute administration of all affairs ecclesiastical and civil, as well as the disposal of the revenues of the See of Rome. Immediately on the death of Alexander II., Hildebrand was chosen Pope, without waiting the sanction of the cardinals. Hildebrand pretended to have been elected against his will, and sent messengers to the Emperor Henry IV. to inform whether the election had his approval. The German bishops endeavoured to dissuade Henry from giving his consent, but the Emperor perceiving that his refusal would do nothing, Hildebrand having a stronger interest in Rome than himself, yielded to the point, and he was crowned July 2nd, 1058, under the title of Gregory VII.

No sooner had he become Pope than he began about effecting a total reform of the Church, which, indeed, was greatly needed. The times were indeed the dark ages, and the Church had been for some years a syncope that was corrupt. Gregory strove to introduce a strict discipline and residence of the clergy, and to repress simony and pluralities, and determined to remove these latter by depriving the secular princes of the right of disposing of bishoprics in their dominions. He summoned a council at Rome, and on the pain of excommunication, that the secular princes should give the investiture of the bishoprics by conferring the ring and the crosier, and thus began the long quarrel between the Papacy and European princes about the right of investiture. [INVESTITURE] Gregory IV. disregarded these threats, and continued to appoint as before to bishoprics. Gregory summoned him to Rome for this conduct, and for charges against him by some of his dissidents in Saxony and other countries. Indignant at this assumption of temporal as spiritual power, sent the Pope a defiance, and called together a council at Worms, in 1076, which was attended by many bishops and declared Gregory to be deposed. Gregory once summoned a council at the Lateran, which solemnly excommunicated Henry IV. of the Empire, this sentence, in

Gregory, St., surnamed THAUMATURGUS [i.e. "Wonder-worker"], was born at Neo-Cæsarea about 210. He studied under Origen for five years, learning logic, physics, mathematics, ethics, etc., and he also attended the Alexandrian schools for three years. He gained great fame for his rhetorical powers. On leaving Origen he pronounced a "Panegyric" on him which gives a very good account of the way in which studies were carried on then. Gregory returned to Neo-Cæsarea in 238. Origen wrote to him exhorting him to employ all his talents for the service of God, and to study the Scriptures; so he shut himself up in a solitary place in the country. He heard that he was being sought for to receive consecration as Bishop of Neo-Cæsarea, so fled from one place to another, but at last yielded on condition that he should be allowed some time to prepare himself. Cæsarea was a very wealthy, populous town, but full of idolatry and vice; and, according to account, it only contained seventeen Christians. It is from his supposed miracles after his consecration that Gregory gained the name of Thaumaturgus. According to St. Basil, he turned the course of rivers by giving them orders in the name of Christ; he dried up a lake which was the cause of strife to two brothers; and his predictions of the future made him equal to the Bible prophets. There are innumerable stories of the miracles worked by him. When the Decian persecution broke out, it is gravely related that he and his deacon were pursued, but that his enemies found only two trees in their place. Gregory returned to Neo-Cæsarea on the death of Decius, and again busied himself with the conversion of the heathen. A great many were converted by a plague, which, it is said, was stopped, and as some say also brought about, by Gregory as a means of bringing them to renounce their idols. Gregory died probably about 270, leaving, according to tradition, only seventeen infidels in Cæsarea, where he had found only seventeen Christians. He is commemorated Nov. 17th.

Gregory is the author of some "canons" directed against the impiety and disloyalty of those whom he had converted. These and his Panegyric on Origen are his only works, though others have been attributed to him.

Gregory of Betica, St., Bishop of Eliberi, Elvira, or Granada, in Spain, lived in the fourth century, and he became bishop about 357. There are three writers who give very different accounts of Gregory. One is Eusebius of Vercellæ, who praises him for the way in which he fulfils his duties, and specially commends his zeal against all sects, shown at the Council of Ariminum, and against Hosius, who was inclined to Arianism. Another is Gams, the German writer, who states that he fell into heresy at Ariminum, and with Restitutus of Carthage and others signed an Arian formula of belief in 359, while we also hear that he was one of the followers of Lucifer of Cagliari, and was the author of a Luciferian treatise, de Trinitate, which is now found to have been written by Faustinus. Gregory died probably about 384, and is commemorated on April 24th.

Gregory Nazianzen, St., was born in a little town of Nazianzus, in Cappadocia, at the beginning of the fourth century. His father, also named Gregory, originally belonged to the sect of the Hypsistarii, but was converted by his wife Nonna. He became Bishop of Nazianzus in 329, and died in 374. Gregory, the son, was from childhood impressed by a desire to devote himself to the Church. He studied with his brother Cæsarius, first at Cæsarea, in Cappadocia, under Carterius, where he formed a friendship with St. Basil [q.v.], and then in Palestine. Here he remained for some time, and then removed to Alexandria. In 344 he set out for Athens. On the . . . the ship was overtaken by a violent storm, which was the cause of great terror to our saint, as he had not been baptised, and he vowed that if he reached land he would again dedicate himself to God. He studied oratory and rhetoric there for ten years. Soon after his arrival he was joined by Basil, and the friends studied together. Basil left in 355, and in the following year Gregory returned home. It is stated by some that it was at this time that the saint received his baptism, while others place it at his arrival in Athens. He for some time resisted his wish to join Basil's hermit life, feeling that his duty was to remain with his father and mother; but at length he broke with the world, and went to his friend at Pontus. Here he remained for some time, until in 362 he was forced to be ordained priest, and assist his father, then over eighty, in the government of his church. On Easter Day of the next year he preached his first sermon. There were very few present, the reason being that the inhabitants of the town disapproved of his unwillingness to receive Holy Orders. He wrote a long apology for himself, in which he gave four reasons for his reluctance:—[1] Because he was unprepared; [2] because he was attracted by the monastic life; [3] because he was ashamed of some of the clergy; and [4] he knew himself to be unfit to teach others. He then considered the duties of a priest, and concluded with the reasons for his compliance with his father's will:—[1] He longed for the people, and knew they wished for him; [2] his parents were growing old; and [3] because of the example of the prophet Jonah. In 370 the Emperor Valens divided Cappadocia into two provinces. Basil was now Bishop of Cæsarea, which till that time had been the only metropolis in all Cappadocia; but upon the division, Tyana was made the capital of what was called the second Cappadocia. Anthimus that city, called himself the metropolitan, and claimed equal rights with the latter. The latter took this opportunity to create new Sees, among them a small town of Sasima, on the boundary between the two provinces, of which Gregory was made bishop. He for some time refused, and when he was at last persuaded, he was reluctant to visit his bishopric. He was tempting to take possession, Anthimus refused him, and refused to allow him to perform episcopal functions unless he acknowledged himself as his Metropolitan. This Gregory did, and returned to Nazianzus, where he became coadjutor bishop. Early in the year his father died, and he waited on the bishop should be confirmed. After nearly two years, he, fearing he would not be elected, fled to Seleucia, in Isauria, where he spent three years in solitude. When he was here, St. Basil died.

And now came a great change in the city of Constantinople. For many years it had been entirely given up to the Arians, but at the accession of Theodosius the hopes of the orthodox rose, and they looked for some pastor who could help them. Their eyes fell on Gregory, whose virtue, sound doctrine, and eloquence had already made him known, and they invited him to be their bishop. He withheld for some time, but at length prevailed upon, and arrived in Constantinople early in 379. He presided at the session of the church of Anastasi, where only one saved from the Arians, Arius, was present. His preaching. He had many disciples, and cope with, as the heretics joined to denounce him, and sometimes attempted to enter the church where he was performing service. One of the great abuses in Constantinople was the disputes between different sects, and he gave discourses, the first on this subject, and other four on the Being and nature of God and the doctrine of the Holy Spirit. It is from these that he is supposed to have gained the surname of the Divine Gregory. He had done so good a work that many disciples, among whom was Basil, flocked to him. The name of one of his disciples, Maximus, an Alexandrian, in whom he wisely placed great trust, as this man sought to supplant his master and gain the bishopric himself. To effect this he wrote to the Bishop of Alexandria, bringing charges against Gregory. Peter had been written to our saint in warm terms, but now he believed the calumny against Gregory, and sent seven bishops to Alexandria, among them Maximus. The clergy rose up in his favour, and exposed Maximus's wickedness. Soon after, Theodosius came to Constantinople, expelled the Arians, and made Gregory bishop of the chief church. He

to gain permission to again retire into solitude, but did not succeed till the end

He then returned to Namasus, and 389 or 390. He is commemorated in the East Church on Jan. 26th, and in the West on May 9th.

His works chiefly consist of sermons or discourses, funeral orations, letters, and poems.

Gregory, Sr., Bishop of Nyssa, was the brother of Basil the Great. He was born in Nyssa, probably about 336, as he is known to have been several years younger than his brother, whose birth took place in 329 or 330. Gregory received very little education, and was merely to have attended the schools in his native place. He was made a reader in the church, but soon quitted that office and became a student of rhetoric. This step was greatly approved of by his friends, and especially his sister Macrina, a recluse, and by his friend Gregory Nazianzen, who wrote a letter on the subject, which was probably the cause of our bishop's return to the bosom of the Church. He retired to a monastery in Pontus, where he passed several years. Here he tried to mediate between Basil and his uncle Gregory, a bishop in Cappadocia, who had become estranged. Finding their plans of any avail, he attempted to bring about his object by forging letters from Bishop Gregory, desiring reconciliation, but they served to make the breach wider. Basil, made Bishop of Caesarea in Cappadocia, soon after, in 372, he raised his brother to the see of Nyssa, a small town near. A friend intrusted that so great a man should be placed in so small a place, but Basil answered he did not wish that his brother should be famous from his bishopric, but the glory from its bishop. Gregory was very unwilling to accept the office, but was compelled. His troubles soon began. The Emperor Valens was an Arian, and was disposed to persecute Gregory. Demosthenes, the chief of the Arians, had once been checked by Basil, and to revenge himself on Gregory. In a council was called at Ancyra to examine some charges of embezzlement brought against the bishop. Though he knew himself innocent, he thought it imprudent to appear against an heretical council, so did not go. Valens banished him, and another was chosen to fill his place. In 378 the Emperor succeeded Valens, and all the deposed bishops, Gregory among them, were recalled to their sees, and Gregory was received with rejoicings; but his happiness did not long. A series of troubles fell upon him, the first being the death of Basil in 379. Gregory had always looked on his brother as his director and support, so the loss was great. At the end of three years his sister Macrina [q.v.] died. In 380 he was appointed to a Council of Antioch to reform the discipline of the churches in Arabia and Palestine, which had become very bad, and it is said that at Jerusalem it was quite scandalous. In 381 Gregory was present at the Council of Constantinople, and he made funeral orations on Meletius, Bishop of Antioch, and on Pulcheria and Flaccilla, wife and daughter of the Emperor Theodosius. He was again at Constantinople in 394, to decide between the claims of Bagaudius and Agapius to the See of Bostra. He died probably about the end of 396.

Gregory was the author of a work on the Creation, some treatises against current heresies, Commentaries, Lives of the Saints, tracts, sermons, etc. A great many of his letters are still extant, as well as some of his funeral orations.

Gregory, Sr., Bishop of Langres, was born in the fifth century, probably in 449. He was the son of one of the principal senators of Autun, and was when young preferred to the dignity of Count or Governor of the town. On the death of his wife Armentaria he gave up this employment, retired from the world, and was ordained Bishop of Langres [506]. He was noted for his abstinence and devotion. He attended the Councils of Epaon [507] and Clermont [535]. At the beginning of 539 he caught a fever and died, and was buried in a church at Dijon, in which town he had lived.

Gregory, Bishop of Tours, was born of noble parents at Auvergne. Nothing certain is known of his life before he became bishop, which event took place in 573. At this time a civil war was raging between Sigebert and Chilperic, sons of Clothaire I., and it was owing partly to the former, partly to the unanimous wish of all the people of Tours, that Gregory gained his bishopric, as he was on Sigebert's side. In 575 Chilperic assassinated his brother and obtained Tours, which he kept till his death. He behaved with great cruelty, plundering the country and destroying the churches. Gregory had an enemy, Leudastes, who, on failing to bring any charge against him, leagued himself with Riculfus, a declared enemy to Gregory. They charged him with spreading false reports against Queen Fredegund. He indignantly denied this, and his accuser was condemned to death. Leudastes fled, but was afterwards again taken and killed. Gregory died in 594.

His first work was Miracles of the Saints, in which he relates many fabulous stories. His History was written soon after. The first division, containing Books 1-4 and half of 5, was written about 577; the second to the middle of the eighth, in 584 and 585, and the remainder in 591. It is a history from the Creation down to his own time. It has often been criticised on the ground of partiality, but has always been greatly used as a text-book for the events of the sixth century.

Gregory of Utrecht.—When going on his missionary journeys, Boniface, the Apostle of Germany, was always looking out for men whom he thought would prove useful to him in his work. In the year 719 he happened to visit a nunnery in Thuringia, and during the meal a young boy, nephew of the abbess, read aloud to them. Boniface was so struck by the earnestness of his manner, that he asked to be allowed to speak to him. The result was that Gregory, fired by the tales of adventure, and also by the desire of being a disciple of such a man, determined to accompany him. He was most faithful to his master, and went with him on all his expeditions. It was his work to instruct the young people who were desirous of being baptised, and at last he was made abbot of a monastery in Utrecht, which soon became famous under his rule as a missionary college. His patience and zeal in training those under him was wonderful, and several of his pupils did good work afterwards in the missionary field. He laboured on diligently, till in his seventieth year he was seized by paralysis. He lived for three years more, and although unable to carry on his active work, his patient good life taught his disciples many a silent lesson. He died at Utrecht in 781.

Gregorian Tones.—Ancient melodies which derive their name from Gregory the Great, Bishop of Rome in the seventh century, who reformed Church music so thoroughly that almost all the ancient music has been called by his name.

St. Ambrose [384] introduced into his church at Milan four modes from Antioch, derived, as it was believed, from Ignatius. This tradition is very probable, as the modes have a strong resemblance to what remains of the great melodies. The name given by St. Ambrose was Authentic, and they are severally called Doric, Phrygian, Lydian and Mixo-Lydian. They consisted merely of diatonic intervals, and were formed by taking D E F G, in the common scale of c major, with the seven diatonic intervals above each respectively. Thus the Doric scale or mode would consist of D E F G A B C D; the Phrygian of E F G A B C D E, and so on, without sharps or flats. The peculiarity to modern ears is that the place of the semitones varies in each.

St. Gregory enlarged the system by adding four other tones, called plagals, and severally hypo-Doric, hypo-Phrygian, hypo-Lydian, and hypo-Mixo-Lydian. These were formed by taking the lowest five notes of each of the four original scales, and adding three other notes below. Thus the hypo-Doric would be A B C D E F G A. Still later, two more Authentic tones and their corresponding plagals were added, making twelve in all.

The term dominant had not the same meaning in the ancient scales that it has now. It meant the note which was most frequently used, and which was taken as the note in the psalms and canticles. It had also a Final note, on which the written in that tone ought to terminate.

On these tones all Church music of Western, and probably also of the Churches, is founded, and in some churches Gregorians are used as part of a mediæval revival.

Gresley, William, one of the Tractarian party who exerted influence by the use of fiction in teaching his views. He was born at Kenilworth, and went at an early age to Westminster School, whence he went to a studentship at Christ Church. In 1822 he took a second class in law and was ordained in 1825 by the University of Oxford. His first curacy was Bassett, near Tamworth, but he was assistant-curate at Stowe, Morning at St. Mary's, Lichfield, and then the Cathedral. He afterwards went to Brighton for his health's sake, and accepted the incumbency of All Saint Hill, where he remained till his death.

A biography of him in the Tracts for the Times by a personal friend stated:—"A churchman to the backbone in all things, as well as in theology. He held his opinions in the school of Newman and Bull, and remained to the last an Anglican, firmly opposed to Rome, as distinguished from Catholicism, and was one of the original members of the Church Union, and for many years a member, but not feeling satisfied with the course they were taking, withdrew from it, though still allowing his name to be on the list of members."

The first work which brought him into the world was the Portrait of a Churchman, published in 1838. He wrote also The Siege of Lichfield, Ecclesiastical, The Duties of a Christian, Charles Lee, Arden Clement Walton, Bernard Lee, Cloveing, and the Ordinance of Obedience.

Greswell, Edward [b. 1767], born at Denton, near Manchester, Oxford. A very learned writer on Canon Law and on Gospel Harmony. He was Principal of Corpus Christi College, Oxford. He wrote several disputations on the Canon Law and Arrangement of the Holy Gospels, an exposition of the Canon Law in reply to Bishop Colenso, The Ten Commandments and the Threefold Law. Dean Greswell pronounced this the best of all the answers to Colenso's book called forth.

Gretzer, James, a Jesuit, born at Ingolstadt, twenty-five years professor of history, an eminent controversialist of antiquity. He died at Ingolstadt aged sixty-three. He was a very JOHANN JAKOB [b. at Darmstadt, 1812].—A learned scholar of the New Testament. He may be called the critical editor of the New Testament, the impulse, as Canon Westcott proceeding originally from him. —Fall, Walton, and Mill. His text, though sound in his time on existing documents, wanted of evidence which he has succeeding investigations have taken from it. But he has shown all existing manuscripts in the course of ages, and of grouping kindred documents, showing the nature of the variations. Hence Canon Westcott, that his text of the New Testament is worth, declares that it is "venerated above that of any other critic of the New Testament," p. 185], and that if we obtain a secure historical text had been faithfully preserved, most of the difficulties of the text have been removed. His investigations afresh, we find a way not only to make a nearer approximation to the text in our immediate predecessors, but to strengthen the critical bases of our own texts are for the most part. It will be seen that Grisebald's critic, was also cautious and wise exemplar of all who follow him.

WILLIAM.—This devoted and learned minister was born on Sept. 17, 1784, near Preston, being educated in the schools of Blackburn and Lancashire. When eighteen years of age he became a member of Christ's Church, where all the serious religion he had had in his youth was dispelled by the evil influence of those with whom he lived. At his ordination, some revival of religious aspirations took place, and he mingled with all those who were known as worldly men, even when he was at Lathom, in Lancashire. At the age of twenty-six a wonderful change came in his heart, and from that time he laboured incessantly among his people to draw their hearts upwards. He frequently preached thirty times in a week, walking many miles from village to village, so that all might hear the sound of the Gospel. He had been greatly influenced by Dr. Owen's book on Justification, about 1742, and although he never had the advantage of the friendship of any of the earnest men associated with the revival of religion, yet his own preaching about this time became more and more effective, influencing all who heard him. When he was at Haworth, near Bradford, his earnest efforts there seemed marvellously successful in awakening the rough and ignorant people amongst whom he then laboured. His lively, powerful way of impressing the truths of the Bible was so talked about, that for nearly twenty years people flocked to Haworth from long distances, just to hear Mr. Grimshaw. He instituted evening lectures on Sunday, although preaching morning and afternoon. For sixteen years, although enduring an immense amount of fatigue constantly, he enjoyed splendid health, only having one illness in that time. He was truly beloved by his people and family, and when he died, April 7th, 1763, from a fever caught in visiting assiduously the poor who were ill with it, there was a universal mourning. His daily habit was to rise at five, and on awaking he always said the doxology. Another custom he had was to address his family and servants after morning and evening prayer as if they might never meet again, commending them all most earnestly into God's care and keeping. He died at the early age of fifty-five, rejoicing that he had no wealth to leave behind him, having refused all worldly advancement, and making a point of giving away in his lifetime everything that he could possibly do without. His religious biographies were deservedly popular.

Grindal, Edmund, Archbishop of Canterbury, was born at St. Bees in 1519. He studied at Oxford under Bishop Ridley, to whom he became chaplain in 1552. The reign of Queen Mary he spent in exile at Strasbourg and Frankfurt. On his return to England he became Master of Pembroke College, and soon after Bishop of London. He showed himself a warm partisan of the Reformation, but was anxious to bring peace to the Church. Nicholas Guallois, a French writer, in a letter to Grindal, speaks of him as working against the Anabaptists, and states that he "kept the rash and innovating within bounds, repressed the insolent and refractory, humbled the proud, protected the innocent, appeased quarrels and disputes, and made himself a veritable Irenæus and peacemaker." Grindal was preferred to the archbishopric of York, and in 1576 succeeded Parker at Canterbury. He found the diocese in a very unsatisfactory state. A good account of it may be found in the notes of a visitation held a year and a half before Grindal's translation to the primacy. Parker says that about sixty parishes had little or no religious teaching. Grindal accordingly exerted himself to encourage the revival of preaching, and to restore to the Church a learned and faithful ministry. Queen Elizabeth ordered him to stop the meetings for "prophesyings." He refused, and was suspended. She even contemplated his deposition. He died in 1583. His writings, which are unimportant, are published by the Parker Society.

Grossetête, ROBERT, Bishop of Lincoln, was born at Stradbroke, in Suffolk, in 1175, and educated at Oxford and Paris. He surpassed all his contemporaries as a scholar. From the time of his elevation to the bishopric of Lincoln in 1235, he set himself to reform the abuses of the Church, and in this work displayed a fearless love of justice without respect of persons. He began by visiting the religious houses, and insisting that they should provide fit clergy to labour in the parishes whence they drew their tithes. He had, at one time, been a loyal supporter of Papal authority against the King, and several times prevented Henry III. from giving bishoprics to unfit persons; but at last the conduct of Innocent IV., in filling the best benefices in England with Italians who did not even come into the country, but contented themselves with drawing the revenues, opened his eyes as to the unworthy yoke to which he had hitherto submitted. He had gone to Rome to try to get a greater control exercised over the monasteries, which were exempted from the jurisdiction of their bishops, and while there saw how the worldliness of the Papal See hindered the Church reform for which he was labouring, and in 1250, at a Council held at Lyons, he caused a sermon to be read before the Pope and Cardinals, charging them as the authors of the abuses of the Church. In 1253 Innocent commanded Grossetête to appoint his nephew, Frederick de Lavagna, to the first canonry that should be vacant at Lincoln; this the Bishop refused to do, and the Pope, in a fury, threatened him with excommunication. Some say that this threat was carried out, but that Grossetête did not trouble himself about it, and quietly continued his episcopal functions; others aver that his having died under a sentence of excommunication rests on very doubtful authority. He died in 1253, aged seventy-eight, and was venerated by the nation as a saint. Pilgrimages were made to his tomb in Lincoln Cathedral, but he was never canonised, though Edward I. requested that he might be.

Grotius, Hugo, commonly called De Groote, was a native of Delft, in Holland [b. 1583, d. 1645]. He came of a good family, and from his earliest youth display markable capacity for learning; at of eleven he entered the University of and took his degree while only in his year. In 1598 he accompanied the Remonstrant Barneveldt on an em Paris, where he was received with favour by Henry IV. He began this early age to publish some valuable. He remained in France one year, at return to Holland was called to the 1607 he was made Advocate-General Treasury of Holland, and in 1613 Pensionary of Rotterdam. In 161 sent to England to negotiate about fisheries of Greenland, from which Dutch wanted to exclude the Dutch. James received him very well. At this he became very intimate with Barneveldt, whom he supported both writings and his favour; the distance between the Remonstrants and Gomarus at their height in Holland, and Grotius came involved in the misfortunes of. In 1619 he was doomed to perpetual imprisonment in the castle of Loevestein. Mary Reggersburg, shared his captivity by a stratagem she contrived his escape, persuaded her husband to get into a cart which was used for the conveyance of and linen for his use in the castle, and passed the guards, and made his way to the Spanish Netherlands into France, where he was kindly received by Louis XII. Frederic of Orange invited him to Holland in 1631, but he had been there a little while before his enemies contended he should be banished. In 1632 he went to Hamburg, where he remained till then was appointed by the Chancellor, Councillor to Queen Christina of Sweden, and her Ambassador to France, post he held till 1645, in spite of his culties with Richelieu and Mazarin. He went to Stockholm, but the climate did not agree with him, and he tendered his resignation of office to the Queen. On his way towards Lübeck, he was seized with illness and died at Rostock, Aug. 28th, 1645. He was, without doubt, one of the greatest of his time. His works are very numerous, treating of divinity, jurisprudence, literature, and poetry. Amongst them Veritate Religionis Christianæ; de Veritate Christi, written to prove that the Remonstrants were not Socinians; Annales de Rebus Belgicis; many poems in Latin, and Greek. His most important work, however, is de Jure Belli ac Pacis, which has been translated into all European languages, and may be considered the basis of international law.

The honorary works carried on by the different branches and members are chiefly the following:—A home for destitute or orphan boys; schools of various kinds, especially night and Sunday classes, clubs; guilds, and institutes for the young; visiting the sick and distressed; choirs, choir-training, and the formation of church-music societies; special services in churches; lay missions; the Christian burial of the dead, burial societies, etc.; the development of the guild life.

The Kalendar of the English Church Union has a list of many of these guilds, e.g. "St. Alphage," for supplying church furniture and vestments to poor churches; "St. Matthew," to remove the existing prejudices of Secularists; "St. Luke," to promote the Catholic Faith among the medical profession; the "Confraternity of the Most Holy Trinity," for mutual encouragement in theological study; "Confraternity of the Blessed Sacrament," to bear witness to the doctrine of the Real Presence, etc., etc. There is a "Railway Guild," a "Church and Stage Guild," an "Army Guild," etc., etc. Many belong to special districts. There are fifty-six enumerated in the Kalendar. In 1873 was founded the Church Guilds Union, by which all may gather together in an annual meeting. It may be noticed that nearly all these are lay societies.

Guisot, François Pierre Guillaume, a French statesman and Protestant, was born at Nîmes, in 1787. His father was guillotined in 1794, and the widow went to Geneva with her children. François went to Paris in 1806 to study. In 1812 he assisted M. de Montaneau, Professor of History, and soon after himself became Professor of Modern History, which post he filled with great distinction. Upon the restoration of Louis XVIII. his political career began, and he became Councillor of State; but on the return of Napoleon resumed his professorship. In 1820, after the assassination of the Duc de Berri, he and the other Royalists were expelled. His lectures at the Sorbonne were crowded, but he was forced to discontinue them, his outspoken opinions giving offence. They were renewed in 1828. In 1830 he became a member of the Chamber of Deputies, and he did a great deal towards the Revolution of that year, in consequence of which he became Minister of Public Instruction and Minister of the Interior. In the Revolution of 1848 Guizot made his escape, but was allowed to return to France in the next year, and devoted himself to theological and historical studies. He died at Val Richer in 1874. Guizot's early works are all political, but later on he wrote some religious books, all tinged with Calvinism, as The Church and Christian Society, Meditations on the Essence of the Christian Religion. He was the founder of three societies—the Biblical, Primary Protestant Instruction, and Protestant History Societies.

Gundulph, one of the chief earlier English architects, was one of the most distinguished monks of the Abbey of Bec. When Lanfranc was made by William the Conqueror first Abbot of Caen, and then Archbishop of Canterbury, Gundulph accompanied him to both places. In 1077, through his patron's influence, he was made Bishop of Rochester, and shortly afterwards rebuilt his cathedral. [ROCHESTER.] He also built an episcopal residence at Malling, near Maidstone. This residence still exists, and is pronounced by the late Mr. J. H. Parker to be the oldest Norman keep in the world. [When Mr. Parker expressed this opinion, the present writer pointed out to him that in the keep at Falaise is shown the room in which the Conqueror was born. He replied with proofs that that keep could not have been built until after the Conqueror's death.] Other churches in Kent have remains of his work in them, but the most famous is the White Tower, or keep of the Tower of London. Gundulph held the post of Father Confessor to the Queen, and died in 1107.

Gunning, Peter [b. 1613, d. 1684], Bishop, first of Chichester [1669], then of Ely [1674], was the son of Peter Gunning, minister of How, in Kent. He was educated at Cambridge, and soon won a name for industry and learning. When the rebellion broke out against King Charles, he proposed with great vehemence that the University should publish a protestation against the Solemn League, which was afterwards done. Not long after, upon his refusal to subscribe the Covenant, he was turned out of his Fellowship, and the University fell under the power of the Parliament forces, he removed to Oxford. After the fall of the King, Gunning settled and had a constant congregation in at Exeter House, in the Strand, he sometimes conferences with Roman Catholics, Unitarians, Anabaptists, Quakers, &c., in defence of the Church of England. Upon the Restoration he was made Secretary of Canterbury, and Master of College, Cambridge. He was first Professor, and soon after Regius Professor of Divinity, and upon the death of King Charles II. was promoted to the See of Ely, and from thence translated to the See of Ely, where he died in 1684. He possessed almost universal knowledge, was of a devout mind, and had a wonderfully good memory; he was very charitable and by his last will left the remainder of his estate for the Augmentation of poor. His works are:—A Contention for the defence of Infant Baptism; Schism or a late conference between Mr. Gunning and Mr. John Pearson on the one and two disputants of the Roman Church on the other (this book was first published in Paris, in 1658, by the Roman Catholics afterwards twice by the members of the Church of England); The Passover Fast Apostolical and Perpetual, &c.

Gurnall, William [b. 1616, was Rector of Lavenham, Suffolk. author of The Christian in Compleat or a Treatise on the Saints' War with the World which was first published in 1655.

Gurney, Joseph John, a pious Quaker, was born at Earlham, Norwich, in 1788. He studied at Oxford, and in 1818 became a minister of the Society of Friends, in which he became very famous. In the autumn of 1820 he accompanied his sister, Mrs. Fry [see FRY], to Scotland and Ireland to visit the prisons there. From 1837 to 1841 he was in the United States and Canada, and on his return to Europe went to Holland, Switzerland, France, and Germany. His object was to improve prison discipline, and to endeavour to induce Louis XVIII. to abolish the slave trade in the French Colonies. He was also prominent as a temperance advocate. He died in 1847.

Gurney took a prominent part in the anti-slavery and organising several societies. He was the author of several works, as Notions of Discipline; Observations on the Religious Liabilities of the Society of Friends; the West Indies; Essays on the Doctrines, and Practical Operation of Christianity; Puseyism traced to its Root; Water is Best, is well known among love and charity in different parts of France and Italy, being forced to move constantly, in consequence of the persecution of the Bishop of Geneva, whose request that she would go into a convent was refused. In 1686 she returned to Paris, and soon after she was seized, and confined for eight months, when she regained her liberty through an application to Madame de Maintenon. She carried on a correspondence with Abbé FÉNELON [q.v.], which led Bossuet to suspect her,

and commissioners were appointed to examine her writings. After the trial she spent a short time in a convent at Meaux. On her return to Paris she was imprisoned at Vin-

1698, and remained there till 1702, when she was released, but banished to Blois, where she died in 1717.

The poems of Madame Guyon are well known to English readers through the charming translation of Cowper. See a Gymnosophists [Gr. gymnos, "naked;"

and sophos, "wise"].—Hermit philosophers who lived in lonely places, all but naked.
They were originally a Hindoo sect, and are mentioned by Strabo, but found imitators
among Christians when monasticism rose.
There were many on the Upper Nile, who were much resorted to by persons wanting counsel.

Gyro-vagi, or "circuit-wanderers," was the name given to certain monks in the early Christian Church, who were without piety, and who led a wandering, unprofitable life. St. Benedict mentioned them when drawing up his rule, and describes them as being worse than the SARABAITÆ [q.v.].
Augustine and Cassianus wrote against them,
and several synods of Gaul condemned them,
also the synod of Trullo (691), which tried to suppress them by ordering that every monk should spend three years in the same monastery, and that the vagabonds calling themselves hermits—evidently the Gyro-vagi—should be driven into the desert. They seem to have disappeared when the Benedictine rule was generally adopted.

Hacket, John, Bishop of Lichfield, was born in London in 1592. He was educated at Westminster, and at Trinity College, Cambridge. He was ordained in 1618, and became chaplain to James I., and incumbent of St. Andrew's, Holborn, where he was famed for his preaching. In 1631 he was made Archdeacon of Bedford. At the proposal, during the Civil War, to disestablish the bishops, Hacket was chosen to speak in the House of Commons in favour of the bishops. He gained his point, but shortly after the question was raised again and carried. Hacket was imprisoned for a short time, but at the Restoration became Bishop of Lichfield and Coventry. The Puritans had desecrated and pillaged the cathedral, but Hacket, during the eight years of his episcopacy, had it re-built, spending twenty thousand pounds on it, mostly at his own expense. He was very generous, and among his public donations he left twelve hundred pounds to Trinity College, and his books, worth fifteen hundred pounds, to the library. He was a great philologist and divine, and possessed a wonderful memory. He is the author of a Life of Archbishop Williams, and of several sermons. He died in 1670, in his seventy-eighth year.

Hadden, Arthur West, B.D. (b. 1816, d. 1873), a learned and industrious writer of the Church of England. After a distinguished career at Trinity College, Oxford, he took an active part in the Oxford movement, being an intimate friend of Isaac Williams. In the Convocation House he was a keen and indefatigable worker, and preceded Canon Liddon as Bampton Lecturer. His chief work was wrought in connection with the Bishop of Chester, Dr. Stubbs, viz. Councils and Ecclesiastical Documents relating to Great Britain and Ireland. He edited the works of Archbishop Bramhall, and of Thorndike, for the Anglo-Catholic Library, and wrote, in the Replies to Essays and Reviews, on the religious aspect of England in the eighteenth century—perhaps the only article in the volume of permanent value. He also wrote several articles in Smith's religious dictionaries. The last sixteen years of his life were spent as rector of Barton-on-the-Heath, in Warwickshire, where he died.

Haden. [HALL.]

Hadrian, Persecution of.—The Emperor Hadrian reigned from A.D. 117-138. He seems to have had no special feeling against the Christians, considering Jews, Samaritans, and Christians alike as mountebanks and impostors, only worthy of contempt. But his great attachment to pagan superstitions indirectly encouraged the popular hatred, and persecution was rife in his reign. The rage of the Christians stirred up some representations to him, and during a visit to Athens in 122 of his reign he was presented with two apologies, one written by Quadratus of Athens, and the other by Minucius Felix before his conversion, had been a philosopher. The apologies influenced Hadrian's reply to a letter from the proconsul of Asia, Serenus, who drew his attention to the unreasonableness of putting Christians to death for unconnected with any crime, to satisfy the prejudice of the Emperor addressed a rescript to the proconsul of Asia, Minucius Fundanus, (1) that Christians were to have a fair and open trial, in which they were to answer their accusers; (2) that they were to be punished only for actual crimes; (3) that the authors of the charges against them were to be punished as they deserved.

It has been said that Hadrian was so favourable to Christianity that he ordered to be destroyed the images of the gods, and to this end ordered to be built in all cities, however, were probably intended to show his respect for himself, and the other story has no foundation in fact. The currency shows that he was regarded as an active persecutor.

Harosimachus (Gr. hara and simachos, "I fight"). wrote controversial works against the Christians, directed chiefly against Basilides, and the Montanists. The first complete treatise against Gnosticism, written by Irenaeus.

Heretico Comburende, passed in the reign of Henry I. In Queen Elizabeth's reign two Anabaptists, and in James I. Ariens, suffered under this law repealed in the time of Charles II.

Hagenbach, Karl Rudolph theologian, was born at Basel studied at the universities of Bonn and Berlin where he became acquainted with Schleiermacher, whose theological opinions he followed. On his return to Basel in 1842 he was appointed professor of theology, and also influenced his professorship there, which he held 20 years. In later life he gradually rose from Schleiermacher's views. He led a school in theology occupying an intermediate line between supernaturalists and naturalists. He gained a wide influence as a theologian.

He wrote many historical works, the most important being his History of the Reformation of the Church, of the Middle Ages, which he reconstructed into a History of the Church from the earliest times to the nineteenth century.

grapha [from two Greek words "holy" and "writings"].—It was the name given to that division of the Old Testament which contained the Psalms, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, the Song of Solomon, Ruth, Lamentations, the Books of Chronicles, Ezra, Nehemiah. These were also called Ketubim.

scope.—An oblique opening made in the wall of a church to enable the priest to see the altar, who, from his position in the transepts or aisles, could not do so. They are mostly found in the walls of the chancel arch. By some it has been supposed to be made for the priest to see the Host, that he might be able to pronounce the words of consecration at the moment of the elevation of the Host. A popular name for it is Squint.

JES, JAMES ALEXANDER [b. 1761, d. 1842], noted Scotchman, studied at the Royal College and University of Edinburgh, elder brother Robert. He entered the ministry but adopting strong religious views, he returned to Scotland and began preaching. He died at Edinburgh for nearly fifty years. In 1808 he declared himself to be a Unitarian.

JES, ROBERT [b. 1764, d. 1842], brother of the above, was also a deeply religious man. Having a large property, he devoted it to philanthropic plans: he began, to building a large chapel, and a school, at Edinburgh, where James Alexander went to Switzerland, lectured to the theological students, whom, with the help of others, he converted to Evangelical views. He returned to Scotland and died at Edinburgh. He was the author of several works:—The Bible; The Romans; Evidence and Authority; The Inspiration of Scripture.

SIR MATTHEW [b. 1609, d. 1676], Chief Justice of England in the reign of Charles II. He was intended for the law and sent to Oxford as a commoner in 1626, where he remained 4 years, laying a foundation for his great legal knowledge. But having occasion to go to London to see Serjeant Glanville, a famous lawyer, about his patrimonial estate, he was induced by him to turn his attention to law, and accordingly, in 1629, he was admitted a student in Lincoln's Inn, and in course of time was called to the bar. He had gained a considerable reputation by the time the Long Parliament began its sittings, but cautiously refrained from attaching himself to either party; when, however, the Parliament gained the day, Hale signed the Solemn League and Covenant, and sat in the Assembly of Divines. In 1653 he was by writ made serjeant-at-law, and soon after one of the justices of the Common Pleas, in which position he acted with great justice and integrity, though not always to the satisfaction of the Protector. On the Restoration he was made Lord Chief Baron of the Exchequer and knighted; and in 1671 Lord Chief Justice of England, which post he held till his death. Besides his knowledge of the law, he was esteemed a great divine and a profound philosopher. During his career as a judge he leaned to the side of the Puritans, and lived an austere life. Richard Baxter and Stillingfleet were among his friends. John Bunyan was summoned before him for frequenting conventicles. He firmly believed in witchcraft. His works are Contemplations, Moral and Divine, and other religious books. He also wrote some valuable legal books, still of great use; the MSS. he bequeathed to Lincoln's Inn, in whose library they are still treasured.

Hales, ALEXANDER OF. [SCHOOL MAN.]

Half-way Covenant.—The name given to a compromise in the Congregationalist body in America in the seventeenth century, after a controversy on terms of membership. The early Congregationalists recognised baptism as the first condition only of membership, and held that as each person came to years of discretion, proof should be given of repentance from sin and faith in Christ. But as membership involved a large measure of civil rights and political privileges, there were those who called for relaxation as to such qualifications. In the disputes to which this demand gave rise two councils were held at Boston. At the first the stricter rule was agreed upon, but at the second it was relaxed thus far, that all baptised persons were to be looked on as members of the Church, and to be admitted to all privileges of membership except Holy Communion, provided they were not openly of bad life. This was the compromise known as the Half-way Covenant. But there were those who regarded this compromise as opening the way to licence in thought and deed, and Congregationalist writers attribute to it largely the undoubted fact that many of the Congregationalists of Eastern Massachusetts became Unitarians. The preaching of Whitfield was largely instrumental in kindling a warmer enthusiasm, and in consequence of it the Half-way Covenant was in course of time tacitly abandoned.

Hall, JOSEPH [b. 1574 ; Bishop of Exeter 1627, and of Norwich 1640 ; d. 1656], was the son of a brave soldier, the Governor of Ashby-de-la-Zouch, and of a very devout mother—one who never failed to retire daily to her chamber for prayer and meditation, and whose good words and deeds sank deeply into the heart of her son. Under her influence he seems to have had an uncommon belief in God's interference in the events of human life. When he was about fifteen years old he was most anxious to go to Cambridge, but his father having a very large family, could not see how to send him there, and he was just about to sign a bond which would have certainly deprived the youth of all university advantages, and might possibly have robbed the Church of one of her brightest ornaments, when, in the nick of time, a brother, who had returned from a journey by Cambridge, brought home such glowing accounts of the University, that Mr. Hall yielded to Joseph's strong desire, and sent him to Emmanuel. That college was strict, well-ordered, and austere, and there Joseph prospered and became a scholar. He was useful to his college and to the University in divers ways; but all throughout he sighed for another sphere—a country parish. He felt that pastoral care was the occupation most worthy of his powers, and a call to it seemed to come from God. The well-endowed Grammar School at Tiverton needed a master, and the head of Emmanuel urged Hall to accept the post. Hall consented so far as to go and see the Lord Chief Justice, who had the appointment. The Chief Justice had seen Hall and had appointed him to the school, when, as he was in the street, someone plucked him by the sleeve; turning round, he saw a man with a letter in his hand; he broke the seal, and found inside the offer of the living of Halstead, near Bury St. Edmunds. Hall thereupon resigned the school and accepted the living. At Halstead he spent some happy years. The old parsonage being ruinous, he repaired it, and when it was repaired its "uncouth solitariness" seemed unbearable. On Whitsun Monday there had been a wedding, and Hall and a clerical neighbour were repairing from the church to the house where the marriage-feast was spread; at the door of that house stood "a comely, modest gentlewoman," and Hall asked his friend who she was. "She is one," replied he, "whom I have bespoken for your wife." When Hall wished for further information, he was told how well she was endowed with all good qualities, and how Hall's fitness as a husband had been pointed out to her parents. The end of the courtship thus strangely begun was another wedding, and the young woman became, as he says, "his meet help, whose comfortable society he enjoyed years." During his abode at Ha abroad, where he carefully the Roman system in its unchecked. He came home more than ever the Church of England. He at great dangers which environed thoughtless Englishmen in the guard against which he wrote Vadis? An important event was his being called to preaching (though much against his Prince Henry, the eldest son. The prince liked Hall's sermon; he wished to hear him a second favourable impressions were on he made Hall one of his chaplains for him also a small canonry in Church of Wolverhampton. To this, however, Hall resigned; one who took the spiritual over much neglected place. The living being offered to Hall, he accepted it. He speaks with great of its ample revenues (it was with some other accommodation; instead and Waltham he preached the sacred stories, which were condensed into the famous Cor body of excellent reflections incidents narrated in the Old Testament. He says he was engaged work twenty years, and it remained during monument of his piety. King James selected him as one English divines to attend the Synod [q.v.], but, feeling useless, he the assembly, not, however, he earned the regard of the phlegmatic men, who gave him a handsome with a picture of the Synod; a medal Hall wore afterwards with ribbon on his breast. King favoured him, had made him Doctor in 1616, two years before that in 1624 offered him the bishopric. This honour a sense of unworthiness him to decline. Three years another bishopric, that of Exeter, was offered to him, and this time he yielded to pressure. Hall seems to have been by Laud and the High Church reaction. He complained of watchful, cat-like eyes where but his piety and good sense good from being evil spoken of, on his way toiling, rejoicing, thirteen somewhat stormy, which was gradually gathering mighty tempest of the Revolution. One of the bishops who framed containing the famous Eleazar the sight of his faithfulness so impressed those who knew that when many discontented petitions to Parliament against

After five years he had a misunderstanding with his colleague and removed to Cambridge, where he was minister for fifteen years. He had early shown himself to be an orator, though he at first failed through nervousness. He was a fluent, rapid, and impressive speaker, and was liberal but not rationalistic in his religious views. But the chief attraction of his preaching was the evident earnestness and fulness of thought which his sermons showed, and which made a great impression on his audience. In 1804 he was visited by an attack of insanity, which made it necessary for him to give up his post at Cambridge; but in 1807 he went to Leicester, where he remained till 1826, when he returned to his former post at Bristol, and died there in 1831.

Hall suffered the most excruciating physical agony during the greater part of many years; and the manner in which, notwithstanding this, he performed his work and preserved a cheerful temperament, has always been considered one of the most striking examples of Christian submission, courage, and fortitude. He published many of his sermons and other works, as an Apology for the Freedom of the Press, tracts on Terms of Communion, Modern Infidelity, The Essential Difference between Christian Baptism and the Baptism of St. John, etc. His sermons contain some of the very finest passages in English oratory.

Hallel [signifying "Praise"].—Psalms sung at the great Jewish feasts, they all begin with praise. The Greater Hallel is Psalm cxxvi., and the Lesser Hallel the Psalms consecutive from cxiii. to cxviii. It was part of this song of praise which our Lord and His disciples sang at the Mount of Olives.

Hallelujah [i. e. "Praise the Lord"].—A Hebrew expression frequently used in the Psalms and Jewish hymns, from whence it came into the Christian Church. It is still sung at funerals in the Greek Church, but the Western leaves it out in the Burial Service, as not being agreeable to so melancholy an occasion. For this reason Pope Alexander II. ordered it to be omitted from Septuagesima to Easter Eve. When it is omitted in the service of the Church of Rome, it is called "Hallelujah Clausum," i. e. closed, and where the antiphon or responses have Hallelujah at the end, "In eternum" is pronounced instead of it. By a decree of a Council of Toledo it was not sung upon the 1st day of January, because then the Church used to fast and read the Litany, in contrast to the heathen, whose custom it was to indulge themselves in luxury and diversion upon that day, and for this reason also it was not repeated by the Greeks in the Bacchanalian Week. The reason why all Churches, notwithstanding the diversity of their language and offices, have always retained this Hebrew word "hallelujah," is thus stated by Bede: "That by such a conformity of devotion, every Church may be put in mind to persist in an agreement with the rest of Christendom, both in respect to faith and charity, and press forward to the Church Triumphant, when the language for devotion will be the same."

Halley, ROBERT [1796-1876], an eminent Congregationalist minister, first at Huntingdon [1822], and afterwards at Manchester [1839], finally Principal of New College, London, and Professor of Theology [1857]. He retired from it in 1872. He was author of some learned Congregational lectures, and of a History of Puritanism in Lancashire.

Hamel, JOHN BAPTIST [1624-1706].—A distinguished French writer, the son of an advocate of Vire, in Normandy. At the age of twenty-nine he became curé of Neuilly. His earlier writings were mathematical treatises of great depth, and he also wrote with great weight on some metaphysical questions, and his books were much valued by the missionaries to China and Japan, as means by which to enable the learned heathens of those countries to understand the principles of Christian Europe. In 1691 he printed a course of divinity in 7 vols., entitled Theologia Speculatrix et Practica juxta S.S. Patrum Dogmata Pertractata, et ad Usum Scholæ accommodata. Being desired to abridge this work, he published an epitome entitled Theologia Clericorum Seminariis accommodata summarium. It is in 5 vols. In 1698 he published a learned book on divinity, Institutiones Biblicæ, seu Scripturæ Sacræ Prolegomena, una cum selectis Annotationibus in Pentateuchum. In 1701 he published the Psalms; in 1703 the Proverbs of Solomon, Ecclesiastes, and the Book of Wisdom, with notes; and in 1705 he published the whole Bible, with annotations upon all the passages which seemed to require them. All this while he had not forgotten his old scientific pursuits, and wrote a considerable portion of the history of the French Academy, of which he had been secretary. He died peaceably in 1706. Old age had compelled him to resign his cure at Neuilly, but he went every year to see his old parishioners, who kept the day of his coming as a festival.

Hamilton, JAMES [b. 1814, d. 1867], was an eminent Presbyterian preacher and writer. He was born and educated in Scotland, and in 1841 came to London as minister of the National Scotch Church, Regent's Square. His chief books are:—Life in Earnest, The Mount of Olives, The Royal Preacher, The Lamp and the Lantern, and The Prodigal Son.

Hamilton, PATRICK, one of the most prominent precursors of the Scottish Reformation, was born in 1504, the son of Sir Patrick Hamilton and of Catharine Stewart, daughter of Alexander, Duke of Albany, second son of James II. He was educated, and in 1518 was educated at Ferne, in Ross-shire, in order to gain knowledge, and went to Paris, where he took M.A. in 1520, and went on to where he became acquainted with the views of Erasmus. He returned in 1521, and shortly after returned in 1523 he settled at St. Andrews, with him his new notions and he pursued his theological studies gradually to agree with Luther and Erasmus. In 1526 some copy of the New Testament was brought into Scotland, and Hamilton recommended his scholars to Beatoun, the Primate, heard of that Hamilton was "infamously disputing, holding and maintaining heresies of Martin Luther and desired him to be formally put to trial. Hamilton, at the advice of his friends, fled to Germany. He then went to visit Luther and Melancthon at Wittenberg, but the plague was raging, and he went to Marburg University, where he coursed with Tyndall and Luther, who wished him to remain there; and returned to Scotland in 1527, having been absent and remained for some time in the family mansion of Kincauldgow, where he openly preached, but in January, 1528, Beatoun summoned him to St. Andrews to a disputation, and he disputed with Alexander Alesius and with Alexander Campbell in a conciliatory spirit; but after a while the mask was thrown aside, and he was arraigned before the Archbishop for heresy. The trial took place in February, the result being that he was condemned for divers heresies, and delivered over to the power to be punished. The charge against him was that he held that man is not justified by works, that it is not lawful to worship saints, and that it is not lawful for men that have souls to read the Bible without God's help." He was burnt in front of St. Salvador's College on the 29th of Feb. 1528. His death prevented the Reformation in Scotland, even his life could have done it. Mr. Patrick Hamilton," said of his own retainers, "has infected a blow upon."

Hamilton, SIR WILLIAM [1751-1856], the most eminent philosopher of the Scotch school, was the son of a professor in the University of Glasgow, and was educated until he went as a Snell exhibitor to Balliol College, Oxford. Here he was

The Aristotelians of the Middle Ages further declared that nothing can be known of God but what is revealed by an infallible authority. Hume and Voltaire, accepting that doctrine, had rejected the authority; and had logically, therefore, pronounced themselves atheists. And there are many who, professing to accept Hamilton's theory of the unconditioned, declare that any knowledge of God is hopeless, and on that ground rest their doctrine of Agnosticism. [AGNOSTIC; GOD.] We have here the greatest question of our times, and the controversy is even now being earnestly pursued.

Hammond, HENRY, D.D. [b. 1605, d. 1660], was born at Chertsey, educated at Eton, from whence he went to Oxford, where he became Fellow of Magdalen College, Canon of Christ Church, and Orator of the university. His father was Professor of Greek in the University of Cambridge, and physician to Prince Henry, the elder son of James I., who showed his regard to the father by becoming sponsor to the son and giving him his own name. On first going to Eton the sweetness of his disposition, and his love of retirement for prayer and meditation, caused Mr. Bush, the Provost of Eton, to augur that the boy would prove stupid; but his fears were unfounded, as at the age of thirteen he was pronounced fit for the university. It is probable that while at Oxford his friendship with Jeremy Taylor and Sanderson commenced. He was ordained in 1629, and in 1633 was appointed by the President of Magdalen, Dr. Frewen (afterwards Archbishop of York), to supply his place as King's Chaplain and preach before the Court. The Earl of Leicester, who was one of his auditors, was so struck with his powers that he offered him the living of Penshurst, in Kent, which was then vacant; here he became an active parish priest, visiting the poor, and having a daily public worship. He sometimes left his retirement, at the request of the Bishop of London, to preach at Paul's Cross. He was summoned to the memorable convocation which met before the Long Parliament, and he was also nominated by the Parliament a member of the Assembly of Divines; but his loyalty and orthodoxy forbade him to appear. In 1643 he was appointed by Brian, Bishop of Chichester, to the archdeaconry of Chichester. But the rebellion was now begun in earnest, and reached quiet Penshurst, driving away its rector. He was on the way with a friend to take refuge in Winchester garrison, when the news was brought him of the death of the President of Magdalen College, and his own appointment to the post. He therefore returned to Oxford. While here he published anonymously, in 1644, his first work, The Practical Catechism, and also treatises on Conscience, Scandal, Willworship, and Superstition. In December, 1644, he went as chaplain to the Duke of Bedford and Earl of Southampton, who were sent by the King from Oxford with a message of peace to the Parliament; but nothing was done beyond appointing a meeting between the commissioners of the King and the Parliament, which took place at Uxbridge in the following February, and where Hammond took a leading part in the discussion. Meanwhile, a canonry at Christ Church falling vacant, the King gave it to Hammond, and he was soon after chosen Public Orator of the university. In 1645 he wrote A View of the New Directory; and a Vindication of the Ancient Liturgy of the Church of England. [DIRECTOR.] Soon after he wrote his Treatise of the Power of the Keys, or of Binding and Loosing. He was permitted, with other chaplains, to attend King Charles during part of his imprisonment; but this was disallowed after 1647. Hammond returned to Oxford just as Dr. Fell, the Dean of Christ Church, had been imprisoned and deprived for defending the university, and as sub-dean the duties fell on him; but he stoutly refused to affix to the doors of the schools the order for the expulsion of Dr. Fell. News of this being sent to London, orders for his own expulsion from his canonry and oratorship quickly followed, and on March 30th, 1648, the Vigil of Easter Day, an armed guard marched into the hall of Christ Church and seized Dr. Hammond. He was kept a prisoner for nearly three months. During this restraint he formed the design of preparing his Annotations on the New Testament. When he regained his liberty he took up his abode with Sir John Pakington at Westwood, in Warwickshire, fulfilling the office of tutor to his children. On the Restoration, in 1660, Hammond was designated to succeed Prideaux in the bishopric of Worcester, but he was seized with severe illness, and died at Westwood soon after Easter, 1660. His writings are some of the most valuable in our theology for their learning and their vigour of thought. One of his biographers, in speaking of the service he rendered to the Church of England, says: "He adhered to her when her condition was most deplorable, defended her doctrine and discipline by his learned and judicious pen, and adorned them by a conversation strictly virtuous and pious."

Hampden, RENN DICKSON, Bishop of Hereford [b. at Barbadoes, 1793; d. in London, 1868].—He was educated at Oriel College, Oxford, of which he became a Fellow; he took Orders, and in 1828 became Tutor of Oriel, and in 1833 Principal of St. Mary's Hall. In that year the Tracts for the Times began, and Hampden was one of the leaders on the other side, in what Dr. Newman calls "the attack upon the university Observations on Religious Discrepancy Reference to the Use of the University, maintaining the distinct from theological opinion; theological opinion are to be part of the Unitarian doctrine and the Unitarian Church of England is in the spirit. Dr. Newman tells us to him that such principles tend to make shipwreck of the Church of England and that Dr. Hampden had taken towards interrupting that understanding which had passed in the university. Hampden regarded by the rising party feelings of aversion; and published his Bampton Lectures on The Scholastic Philosophy of its Relation to Christian Theology raised against him of Aristotelian the Whig Government in him Regius Professor of Divinity outcry was made, and a census in Convocation was procured; objectors could not overthrow it and Arnold wrote in the Edinburgh Review a powerful article in his favour Oxford Malignants. At the election John Russell nominated him of Hereford. Then the clamour of Thirteen bishops, including Sumner, of Winchester, signified; a swarm of pamphlets on both sides, legal objections tried in the courts, but the cause was decided in 1848. From that time was heard of him, but the ground that Hampden, though his style was awkward, was not open to heresy.

Hampton Court Conference meeting held early in the reign of Victoria at this palace "for the determination to be amiss in the Church." On the 14th, 16th, and 18th of January 1869 was presided over by the Archbishop Whitgift, eight lay dignitaries, represented the Episcopate while the Puritan advocates were Dr. Sparkes, Mr. Knewstubb and Mr. Patrick Galloway. This conference was a request to the Puritans for a reformation of certain ceremonies called the Millenary Petition signed by nearly one thousand. With regard to the Prayer Book for these alterations:—"1. g, THOMAS, was born at Becon- nshire, in 1512, and educated at Winchester, and New College, Oxford, where he was elected Fellow, and in 1542 chosen Hebrew Professor, through the influence of Henry VIII. In the next reign he became a Protestant, and tutor to Lady Jane Grey, whom he instructed in the Reformed faith; but on Mary's accession he turned Papist, took his Doctor's degree, and was made Treasurer of Salisbury. When Elizabeth ascended the throne, Harding stood true to his faith, was deprived of his office, left England and settled at Louvain, entered the Society of Jesuits, and became a zealous champion of his communion. His great polemical controversy was with Bishop Jewel, and his chief works are answers to the bishop. Harding died in 1572.

Hardouin, JOHN, was born at Quimper, in Brittany, in 1647. He was educated by the Jesuits, at an early age entered that Order, and devoted himself to the study of philology and divinity. Hardouin acquired great notoriety by maintaining that the greater part of the classical and early Christian writings were forged by monks in the thirteenth century; he also rejected as spurious all the remains of ancient art; but the Society of Jesuits at last interfered, and he was obliged to retract his strange opinions. In spite of these extravagances he was undoubtedly a great scholar, and his works are very valuable. Among them are an edition of Pliny, Collectio Concilliorum, De Minimis Herodeadum, and a Commentary on the New Testament. Hardouin died in 1729.

Hardwick, CHARLES [b. 1821, d. 1859].—A native of Yorkshire, who "rose from the ranks," and by hard labour secured himself a good education, and graduated at Cambridge in 1842. He was ordained as Fellow, and laboured hard at theological and historical work, was appointed Preacher at Whitehall by Bishop Blomfield in 1851, and two years later Professor of Theology in Birmingham, Divinity Lecturer at King's College, Cambridge, and Christian Advocate, and a few years later Archdeacon of Ely. What promised, however, to be a brilliant career was cut short suddenly by a fall from an Alpine precipice. Among his most important works we find A History of the Articles of Religion, A History of the Christian Church, and Christ and Other Masters. The last he left unfinished.

Hare, FRANCIS, D.D. [d. 1740].—He was born in London, and entered at King's College, Cambridge, in 1688, where he afterwards became Tutor. He was appointed in 1708 to the deanery of Worcester, to that of St. Paul's in 1726, whence he was transferred in the following year to the bishopric of St. Asaph, and in 1731 to Chichester. He earned his chief distinction by his classical and theological criticism, and took an important part in the controversies of the day. Hare published, in 1726, editions of Terence and Phædrus, but their sale was ruined by the publication of the same works by Richard Bentley, the second of which appeared just before his own, and has been described as the most careless work that Bentley ever published. Hare expressed his indignation in his Epistola Critica. He was much interested in the Bangorian Controversy, in which he took part against Hoadly. His other works are Difficulties and Discouragements which attend the Study of the Scriptures in the way of Private Judgment, and Psalmorum Liber in Versiculos Metricè divisus.

Hare, AUGUSTUS WILLIAM [b. 1794, d. at Rome, 1834], grandson of the foregoing, was chiefly noted for his Sermons to a Country Congregation [2 vols.], and for being joint author with his brother Julius of Guesses at Truth. He became a Fellow of New College, Oxford, in 1818, and in 1829 Rector of Alton Barnes, which living he held to the end of his life. A very interesting account of the Hares and their friends will be found in Memorials of a Quiet Life, by A. Hare.

Hare, JULIUS CHARLES [b. 1795, d. 1855], one of the most learned and influential divines of this century, was a brother of the foregoing. He studied at Trinity College, Cambridge, taking his degree in 1816, and becoming a Fellow of his college three years later. In 1832 he succeeded his father as rector of Hurstmonceux, and was appointed Archdeacon of Lewes by Bishop Otter in 1840, and nominated one of her Majesty's chaplains in 1853.

Seldom has there been a more original or profound thinker. Even when taking an active part in the questions of the day he appeared to regard events with the calm impartiality of an historian treating of some bygone age, or, rather, of a philosopher considering the policy of a foreign country. In the Church of England he was regarded by many, and was named in a celebrated article on "Church Parties" in the Edinburgh Review, as one of the leaders of the "Broad Church party." It was a title which Hare would have been the first to repudiate. It was always his wish to belong to no party, but to join with all parties in the Church of England in every good work. Amongst his latest labours was a hearty co-operation in promoting the revival of Convocation. In the Lower House he was a frequent speaker, and he was indefatigable, so long as health allowed, in the committees. The tolerant character of his Biography of John Sterling must have been invaluable in appeasing that odium theologicum which many regard as inseparable from an assembly of the clergy. It would be beyond our bounds to attempt an estimate of Archdeacon Hare's merits as a writer, or an analysis of his works: but we cannot pass over in silence his Archidiaconal Charges, so lofty in thought and eloquent in expression, which, it has been truly said, might well have been delivered from the episcopal seat. Collected, they will form a review of the leading events of their day with special reference to the Church of England.

The name of Julius Charles Hare was first distinguished in the literary world as one of the translators, in conjunction with Bishop Thirlwall, of Niebuhr's History of Rome, which was first published in the year 1828. He had previously published, in 1827, the first series of Guesses at Truth, by Two Brothers, a volume of miscellaneous thoughts and reflections, the joint production of himself and his brother. He was also the author of several sermons and charges, and in 1848 edited the Essays and Tales of John Sterling, with a memoir of his life. "It will be very long indeed," said the Guardian newspaper, "before we see a man of greater disinterestedness; of kindness more genuine, or more universal charity; or more active goodness or a more earnest love of truth."

Harmonists or Rappists. [See HARMONY SOCIETY.]

Harmony of the Gospels.—The four Gospels differ in style, in order of arrangement, and in some degree also in the circumstances narrated. But there is running through them the great unity of spirit which represents the Saviour as the tender loving Guide of His disciples, sympathising with their sorrows and with the sorrows of mankind. The Gospels are portraits of the One Person from different points of view, but have so much in common that we recognise the unity. This is the Harmony of the Gospels to which it is evident that all real importance attaches. But it is also natural that Christian writers from early times should have endeavoured to construct a life of Christ in chronological sequence. They have only in part succeeded. Two only of the four Evangelists give the history of our Lord's childhood, and they select different incidents of it. The one gives the visit of the Wise Men and the flight into Egypt, the other the announcement to the shepherds and the presentation in the Temple. The closer the details are studied, the more it seems probable that the materials needed for an absolute chronological order have been purposely withheld. But an approximation has been arrived at, and the course of the Saviour's life year by year can be traced with considerable accuracy. The first attempt which we know of to construct a Harmony was made in the third century by Ammonius, who divided the Gospel into sections for the purpose. The numbers which mark these Ammonian sections are found in the margin of many of the ancient MSS. of the New Testament. In the next century Eusebius, the n, drew up his "Canons," in which monian sections are so distributed as in a tabular form what portions of the Evangelists correspond to that which stands first in order in each. [See Bishop Wordsworth's Greek Testament, vol. i., pp. 27-35.] Among modern the best harmonists are Griesbach, De Rödiger, Clausen, Greswell, Isaac na, Tischendorf. [See Archbishop on's masterly Essay on The Gospels in the Bible Dictionary.]

Harmony Society.—The founder of community was George Rapp, a weaver from Wittenberg. He was born in 1757, and at the age of twenty-five seceded from the Lutheran body, on the ground that he felt called to regenerate society. With this in view he gathered a few followers around him, who were to live together and have all things in common, in imitation of the first Christians [cf. Acts iv. 34, 35]. His action, however, met with disfavour in his own country; so he, with three friends, emigrated to America in 1803. There they made a settlement in Butler County, Pennsylvania, and called their village Harmony. So well did they prosper that in two years' time no less than 125 families are said to have cast in their lot with them. An association, known as the Harmony Society, was then formed based on the principles held by George Rapp.

In 1815 the community sold their land and migrated to a much larger estate in Ellettsburg, Indiana. Their stay lasted only a few years in their new settlement, at the end of which time they sold their property, and went to a new home in Beaver County, Pennsylvania, where they built the town of Harmony, and where they still maintain themselves by praiseworthy industry. They now number about 4,000. In religious views and practices they do not differ from the Lutherans from whom they seceded. Their founder and pastor, George Rapp, died in 1847, and was succeeded by Jacob Henrich. The government of the society is vested in a council of nine elders.

Harsnet, SAMUEL, was born at Colchester in the sixteenth century. He entered the University of Cambridge, where he became a Fellow and Master. His ability attracted attention, and he was promoted to the See of Exeter, and from there to Norwich, and was made Archbishop of York and a counsellor to James I. He was a strong Puritan, and vigorously attacked the Davenant for preaching upon Predestination.

Harsnet died in 1631, and was buried in the church of St. Andrew, in Essex, where he had built and endowed a grammar school; his library he bequeathed to the Corporation of Colchester for the use of the clergy of the neighbourhood.

Harvest Festival.—This is an institution which has come into almost universal use within our own generation. No fixed day is arranged for such a festival in the English Church; in the American Church it is the first Thursday in November. Though there is no special service in the Prayer Book, the Act of Uniformity Amendment Act enables the Bishop to sanction any service in church which consists of readings from Scripture, prayers from the Liturgy, and hymns. Accordingly, Convocation has drawn up a service which is now very generally used. The Proper Psalms, two or more of which are to be used at the discretion of the minister, are: lxv., lxxxi., ciii., civ., cxliv., cxlv., cxlvii. For the First Lesson one of the following: Deut. viii. 7; xxvi. 1-12; xxviii. 1-15; xxxii. 7-20; xxxiii. 26; Isaiah xxviii. 23; Hosea ii. 14. For the Second Lesson either Matt. xiii. 24-31; John iv. 31-39; vi. 26-36; 2 Cor. ix. 6; or Rev. xiv. 14-19. When there is a Communion Service, the following are the Epistle and Gospel: 1 Thess. v. 14-24; Matt. xiii. 36-44; or John vi. 5-15.

Hatchment or Achievement.—The funeral escutcheon, placed in front of houses to mark the death of one of the inmates. It is in the form of a lozenge, and is drawn up with heraldic precision, so that those versed in the art of heraldry can tell the sex, rank, and circumstances of the deceased. After being hung outside the house for a year it is often hung up in the church, the idea being that of acknowledgment to God, with whose blessing it had been borne.

Hatfield, COUNCIL OF.—A Council was held at Hatfield, in Hertfordshire, in 680, under Theodore, Archbishop of Canterbury, at which all the English bishops were present. It is said that Pope Agatho wished Theodore to attend a Council held at Rome in the spring of the year, but the Archbishop being unwilling to go gathered this Council together. In it Monothelitism, the last wave of EUTYCHIANISM [q.v.], was condemned, and the five general Councils, their canons and decrees, were accepted.

Hatherley, LORD.—An eminent English layman. William Page Wood, the son of Alderman Sir Matthew Wood, was born in London, in 1801. He was educated at Winchester, where he contracted a lifelong affectionate friendship with Walter (afterwards Dean) Hook. He then went to Trinity College, Cambridge, took his degree in 1824, obtained high honours, and won a Fellowship at his college. He was educated for the Bar, entered at Lincoln's Inn, and was called in 1827. He was first an equity draughtsman, but after two years became a Q.C., and at the general election of 1847 entered Parliament for Oxford. He was appointed Vice-Chancellor in 1849, and in 1868 one of the Lords Justices. The same year, on the accession of Mr. Gladstone to power, he became Lord High Chancellor, and was raised to the peerage with the title of Lord Hatherley. After four years he was obliged to give up his post through loss of eyesight. He died at Westminster, in July, 1881. Lord Hatherley, though an extreme Radical in politics, was a great supporter of the Church as an Establishment and of Church education for the poor, etc. He attended the Westminster Abbey services daily, and for many years was a most regular teacher in one of the Westminster Sunday-schools. He is the author of an able work on The Continuity of Scripture, but the beautiful piety of his character is the best memorial of him in the minds of all who know him.

Havergal, FRANCES RIDLEY [b. 1836, d. 1879], authoress of many beautiful hymns, was the daughter of the Rev. W. H. Havergal, a clergyman skilled in sacred music. Her poems were published under the titles of Ministry of Song, Under the Surface, and Under His Shadow. She also wrote some prose works, among which are My King, Swiss Letters, Morning Bells, Little Pillows, etc.

Havernick, HERMANN ANDREAS CHRISTOPH [b. 1805, d. 1846].—An eminent German theologian. He wrote commentaries on Daniel, Ezekiel, and a critical introduction to the Pentateuch and to the Old Testament. His views are of the "orthodox Evangelical" school represented by Hengstenberg and Olshausen. Translations of some of his books are published in Clark's Theological Library.

Hawker, ROBERT, D.D. [b. 1753, d. 1827], was vicar of the church of Charles the Martyr, Plymouth, for fifty years. His Commentary on the Bible, in 10 vols., was very popular for many years, and his Morning and Evening Portions still circulates.

Hawker, ROBERT STEPHEN, grandson of the above [b. 1804, d. 1875], was vicar of Morwenstow, in Devon, and will be long remembered there for his kindly ways, and also for his eccentricities. He was a poet of no mean powers. On his death-bed he was received into the Church of Rome. Some assert that this took place without conscious co-operation on his part, and considerable controversy arose on this question. Two Lives of him were written, one by Mr. Baring-Gould, the other by Dr. F. G. Lee, and they are both full of the quaintest interest.

Healing, SERVICE FOR.—A religious ceremony was used from the time of Henry VII. to that of Queen Anne, for the supposed cure of scrofula, or, as it was formerly called, the King's Evil, by the royal touch, the tradition being that the Kings of England and France had this power, derived from Edward the Confessor. The earliest form on record is that used by Henry VII., in Latin. This was used by Henry VIII., omitting mention of the saints and the Virgin Mary. In the reign of Charles I. the service was altogether in English, and in the shape in which it was republished, with slight alterations, in the reign of Queen Anne. The efficacy of this cure was believed by such men as Hooker, Collier, and Carte; but it was never sanctioned by the Church, though it has been printed in some Prayer Books, being collected in some Prayer Books, being Queen Anne. The form, as it stands in the Prayer Books of Queen Anne, is as follows:

AT THE HEALING.

Prevent us, O Lord, etc.

The Gospel (for Assumption Day), Mark vi 5-6.

Let us pray.

Lord, have mercy upon us, etc.

Our Father, etc.

Then shall the infirm persons, one by one, be sent to the Queen upon their knees, and so be presented, and while the Queen is laying her hands upon them, and putting the gold about their necks, the chaplain (that officiates, turning himself to the sick persons) shall say these words following:

God give a blessing to this work, and these sick persons on whom the Queen's hands, may recover, through Jesus Christ our Lord.

After all have been presented, the chaplain shall say, O Lord, save thy servants, etc. (the Communion Service).

Let us pray.

O Almighty God, who art the giver and the aid of them that seek to thee, we call upon thee for thy help and fully to be showed upon them, they, being healed of their infirmities, unto thee in thy holy Church, Christ our Lord. Amen.

Then the chaplain, standing to the right of the Queen, shall say, The Almighty Lord, who is the Visitation of the Sick, The grace of our Lord, etc.

Heath, NICHOLAS, born in London, educated at Clare, and Fellow of Clare, was Almoner to Henry VIII., first, Bishop of Rochester. Being deprived, he was restored by Mary, and became Archbishop of York. He was a man free from violent opinions between Papists and Protestants, and of Elizabeth's time of the Moderators, he took the Oath of Allegiance, and was deprived, and resided at Cobham, in Surrey, where he died in 1566.

EGINALD [b. 1783, d. 1826], 2nd cutta. He was born at Malpas, ducated at Hawkhurst Grammar in London, until 1800, when brasenose College, Oxford; in he gained the prize for Latin 1803 wrote his prize poem, 1804 he became a Fellow of Ali 1807 he took Orders, and was his brother Richard to the of Hodnet, where he thoroughly discharged his parochial duties. In 1812 he published a volume of Hymns, written with a view to improving the devotional poetry sung in churches. In 1815 he was Bampton Lecturer, and in 1817 a canon in St. Asaph's cathedral. In 1819 he edited the works of Jeremy Taylor, and in 1822 was chosen Preacher to Lincoln's Inn. Having twice declined the See of Calcutta on account of his wife and child, he at length accepted it, January, 1823. The See at that time embraced the whole of India, Ceylon, the Mauritius, and Australasia. Bishop Heber set to work to try and visit throughout his enormous diocese; but he died in his forty-third year, being found dead in a cold bath, which he had taken after holding a confirmation at Trichinopoly. He was deeply mourned, monuments by Chantrey were erected to his memory at Calcutta and Madras, and scholarships bearing his name were founded in Bishop's College, Bombay. The journal of his visitation tour was published in Murray's Home and Colonial Library. His Life was written by his widow in 1830. Among his hymns may be mentioned those so well known: From Greenland's icy mountains, Jesus shall reign where'er the sun, and Hark the glad sound, the Saviour comes.

Hegel, GEORG WILHELM FRIEDRICH [b. 1770, d. 1831].—A famous German metaphysician. He was born at Stuttgart, studied theology at Tübingen, and became Lecturer on Philosophy at the University of Jena in 1801. Here he was associated with Schelling as co-editor of the Critical Journal of Philosophy, and the two men naturally began to interchange their philosophical ideas. The first to write the views with which their names are associated was Schelling, but probably Hegel was the primary author. The philosophy of Hegel is a deep pantheism. Its source must be sought in the sadness of the discovery that the theories of the preceding generation had broken down. Kant had destroyed old opinions, and had attempted reconstruction. But the absolute negation of Fichte seemed to declare that such reconstruction was of no worth, hence Hegel's was a fresh departure. He began with laying down the doctrine that all truth is dual. Life can convey no idea to us unless we can contrast it with death; light is only appreciated when we experience darkness; freedom must be opposed to slavery to be understood; goodness is mere innocence until it struggles with evil, then it becomes a positive virtue. Hence Truth is the mediation between opposites. From this position he passed on to maintain a Trinity, the third element being that which unites and reconciles the two opposites. "I," he said, when realised involves an existence which is not I, and the recognition of the two elements involves their union. Therefore complete man is in himself a Trinity. The body without a soul is a corpse. The soul without the body is unimaginable. The union makes the living man. The next step was, what is true of the spirit of man is true of the Spirit of God. Hence Hegel professed to evolve the doctrine of a Divine Trinity. The following eloquent summary by Dr. Matheson is that of a warm admirer of Hegel, and it must be confessed that it may be called Hegel "evangelically interpreted." Many Hegelians would repudiate it. But the fact remains that Hegel always declared himself a Christian, and to the end of his life was a communicant in the Lutheran Church. "That Divine Spirit which we call the Third Person of the Trinity is in one sense the first, for it is the very personality of God. A human spirit or person is the union of a soul and a body. It must embrace within itself both the Father and the Son—the Father corresponding to the universal soul, the Son being that body, or house, which constitutes the dwelling-place of that soul. The Father could never at any time have been alone. To suppose that at any period the Father dwelt alone, would be to imagine a God unconscious of His own existence, because, without an object of thought, it would be a soul without a body. Therefore, from all eternity, the Infinite Being must have possessed a dwelling-place, a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens; and that house must have been another self, an image of His own glory, a mirror in which the Father could behold Himself reflected—in a word, it must have been at once separate from the Father, and yet a part of His very being, just as the human body is separate from the soul, and yet a part of its being. Christ is the house of God. He is the image of the Infinite Spirit, the glass by which He sees Himself, the body which forms the outward side of His personality. As the Son was afterwards incarnate in the human soul, so it may be said that from all eternity the Father was incarnate in the Son; for He was the place of His habitation, the home of His rest, the embodiment of His thought, the realisation of His existence—in a word, what the sacred writer calls Him, the brightness of His glory, and the express image of His person." The same able writer goes on to give a clear and lucid view of Hegel's theory of the evolution of the Trinity in Time. The Infinite Soul seeking a body, manifested itself in Creation. But the created world was too small to express the mind of the Infinite Soul, hence arose trouble. Man longed to rise to the greatness of which he conceived the possibility; Christ came and fulfilled that longing, and in His perfect Spirit man reached His true dwelling-place. And, again, in the Church comes a fresh evolution. First came the external organisation, the Judaism of Christianity extending to the Reformation;

this Hegel called the age of Peter. was the age of reaction against the letter. As the first age had attempted of the body to exist without so in the second the soul tried to be independent of the body. This was Rationalism, the revolt from legalism of Paul. The age of John, which reconciles these, bringing harmony out, is yet to come. Hegel hoped to inaugurate it. His followers divide themselves into two branches, and to him faith and science were to be melted away. One of his followers on the Conservative side is a prominent member of the bench of English bishops. Martensen was another Hegelian interpreting the Christian creed ex animo in a spirit of ecstatic enthusiasm. But there was also a development in the direction of blank materialism, prominent representative of this Strauss.

Hegesippus, commonly called "Father of Church History," was in the second century. Having converted to Christianity, he travelled to Rome in the pontificate of Anicetus, and stayed there that of Eleutherus—i.e. from 165 to 189 thereabouts. He was the first to write an ecclesiastical history of the time from our Saviour's Passion till his death. It was written, St. Jerome says, in a plain, unornamental style, because he wished to imitate the style of those whose lives he had described. We have nothing of his remaining but some fragments preserved by Eusebius in his Ecclesiastical History. His most remarkable of these fragments are: Account of the Martyrdom of St. James, Bishop of Jerusalem; Of our Saviour's predictions being called for by the Emperor Trajan; A Narrative of the Martyrdom of St. Pionius, son of Cleophas, Bishop of Jerusalem; What happened in the reign of Trajan, when the soul of Antinous being Deified by the Emperor Hadrian; An Account of the Voyage to Rome; of the Election of Simeon to James's See; and Thebutis, the first Schismatic. Others have been ascribed to him, but it is generally agreed that they were written by a man of the same name who lived in the fourth century, Constantine the Great.

Hell.—In the Greek Testament there are two words rendered by this English one, namely Hades [Matt. xi. 23, xvi. 18; Luke
x. 15, xvi. 23; Acts ii. 27, 31; Rev. i. 18,
vi. 8, xx. 13, 14], and Gehenna [Matt. v. 22, 29, 30, x. 28, xviii. 9, xxiii. 15-33; Mark
ix. 43, 45, 47; Luke xii. 5; Jas. iii. 6]. In 2 Pet. ii. 4, a participle is used (tartarōsas) signifying literally "to cast down to Tartarus," but the noun itself does not occur in Scripture. Hades signifies "the lower world," and is probably derived from a, "not;" and idein, "to see," but it is somewhat doubtful (Liddell and Scott's Lexicon). It is the equivalent of the Hebrew Sheol, translated in the Authorised Version variously "hell," "the pit," "the grave," but in the Revised Version left in the original form. The central thought of the word is not Punishment, though it often includes that, but it is Death. Gehenna, on the other hand, always stands for the punishment of the wicked, and Tartarus may be taken as an equivalent for the same word.
Hades, therefore, means that unknown world into which the dead depart, that which hides them from our eyes, and leaves us with the blank feeling of sorrow. Into Hades Christ descended at His death. No one may dogma-tise beyond what is written. He went into the unknown, and wherever He went He carried light. Bishop Heber has expressed the hope which the article of the Creed is intended to express—“Thou art gone to the grave, but we will not deplore thee;

Though sorrow and darkness encompass the tomb,
The Saviour has passed through its portals before thee,
And the lamp of His love is thy light through the gloom.”

For Hades cannot be other than gloomy and dark to human imagination, and when Our Lord tells us that He has “the keys of death and Hades” [Rev. i. 18], He implies that for those who believe in Him its terrors are gone. The prison-house is broken and the captives delivered. It is noticeable that neither of these words is found in St. Paul’s Epistles. Of the twelve uses of Gehenna, eleven are in our Lord’s own speeches. The confusion of the translators in rendering both words by “Hell” is probably owing to the Protestant rejection of the doctrine of Purgatory, with all its abuses. In the first days of the Reformed doctrine a too rash dogmatism pronounced that there is no middle state, and so Hades was confounded with Gehenna. But the words of the Lord to the dying robber seem to dispose of this. We cannot regard His death as being immediately followed by His entrance into Heaven. Consequently we are bound to hold the belief in a middle state, of hope for the faithful, and of fear for the wicked. But beyond this we are in ignorance. To those who die in faith and trust there is the certainty that their hope must be now fulfilled, for the unknown land is brightened by the presence of Christ.

Hell, DESCENT INTO.—The Third Article of Religion says: “As Christ died for us, and was buried, so also it is believed that He went down into hell.” Also we have in the Creed “He descended into hell,” and this doctrine is carried out by several passages in the Scriptures. But there have been many differences of opinion on the subject, partly on account of the two renderings of “hell” [see above] and also because of the doubtful interpretation of 1 Peter iii. 19. Thus this Article has been interpreted in five different ways:—
[1] First, that descended is only meant metaphorically, implying the efficacy of Christ’s death as to the souls departed.
[2] Secondly, that the descent into hell signifies the suffering and torments of the wicked, in the place of those who otherwise must have endured them.
[3] Thirdly, that hell here means the grave; and the passage “Thou wilt not leave my soul in hell” signifies “Thou wilt not leave my body in the grave.”
[4] Fourthly, that by the word “soul” we may understand the nobler part distinguished from the body, or the whole person, both soul and body, or the living soul distinguished from the immortal spirit. And that “hell” signifies merely the condition of men in death, and thus it is a mere repetition of the preceding clause, that He died. [5] It is generally believed in the Christian Church that the soul was the spirit or rational Christ—that which the Jews could not see and hell the place of departed spirits. This view was held by many of the Fathers, who say that He went there to deliver the suffering souls, and translate them to the place of happiness.

Hellenists, THE, included [1] the though Greeks (Hellenes), or foreign birth, had become proselytes of the religion; [2] Jews, who, retaining the Hebrew spirit and mode of thought, the speech and all outward manners and customs of the cosmopolitan and all-Greek nations, through residence in those countries, consequent upon the Diaspora and other causes. Thus the Hellenists stood as the connecting link between the exclusive and self-centred Judaism in Palestine and the outer world of heathendom, and in so far were they instrumental in educating the former in higher literary and artistic tastes, in broader and more liberal sympathies, and generally in that Universal Church which was eventually to spring from their midst. The popular dialect of the Greek language in which the Hellenists spoke and wrote was a Hellenistic (or common) dialect; assimilating Eastern thought and expression to Western dress, and in consequence of its widespread influence (especially through the Septuagint and New Testament) it had upon the subsequent history of the world, the study of its literature, its grammar, forms, and other phenomena, though in a very imperfect and backward state, a quite unique interest and importance.

Helvetic Confessions.—Two of these. The first was drawn up at Basle by delegates from Zürich, Bern, Schaffhausen, and other Swiss cities in 1536. It embodied the general articles of the Reformed faith, and specially on church government. It was in Latin, and was afterwards translated into German. A more complete work was drawn up by Bullinger at the request of the Elector Palatine. It was published in 1564, and was translated into German two years after. The first Confession had been considered too short, and had leaned too much towards Lutheranism, but this one was wholly satisfactory. It was adopted in Switzerland, but also in Germany, Poland, Hungary, and France. It was translated into French by Theodore

g, ERNEST WILHELM.—A theologian, was born in rg, in Westphalia, where his father was a clergyman. He was educated at home till he went, in his seventeenth year, to the University of Bonn. He devoted himself chiefly to Oriental and philosophical subjects, studying Aristotle and Freytag. In his early years he had adopted rationalistic views, but on going to Basle in 1823 he came under influence which overcame this. He found that the Augsburg Confession expressed his views, and joined the Lutheran Church. In the next year he went to Berlin and became Privat-Dozent, and put himself at the head of a party against rationalism. In 1826 he was made Extraordinary, and 1828 Ordinary Doctor of Theology, which post he continued to hold till his death in 1869, exerting an influence over his pupils second only to that of Tholuck. Among his writings, that which had probably the greatest influence on the opinions of the day is the Evangelical Church Journal, which had been planned by Le Coq, and which Hengstenberg edited for forty-two years. Its motto was "God's Word and the Confession of the Church." He was the author of two treatises:—Concerning the Relation of the Inner Word to the Outer, and Concerning Pietism, Mysticism, and Separatism. Among his exegetical works are Christology of the Old Testament, and Commentaries on the Psalms, Song of Solomon, Ecclesiastes, Ezekiel, Job, Revelation, and St. John's Gospel, history of Balaam and his prophecies, lectures on the Passion, contributions to the introduction to the Old Testament, the Books of Moses and Egypt. Of all these latter works there are English translations in Clark's Theological Library.

Henoticon [i.e. "bond of union"].—A document put forth in A.D. 482 by the Emperor Zeno, with the assistance of Acacius, Patriarch of Constantinople, in a well-meant but futile attempt to effect a rapprochement between the various parties and half-heresies that then divided the Church. This it aimed at doing by ignoring the minor difficulties and differences, especially of the Nestorians, Eutychians, and Monophysites, and asserting only the fundamental and more comprehensive points of the faith on the lines already laid down at the Nicene and subsequent Councils. It was, however, satisfactory neither to the orthodox and semi-orthodox nor to the heretics, being condemned by Pope Felix II., and failing everywhere, through sheer feebleness and want of practicability, leaving as it did almost every point still open for disagreement.

Henricians.—A sect in the twelfth century, followers of the monk Henry of Cluny. He preached chiefly against the corruptions of the Romish Church. Lausanne was the first scene of his labours, and from here he went to France, where he formed a band of men into a sort of apostolic society, who went about before their master carrying banners inscribed with the cross. He preached boldly against the vices of the clergy, he rejected the Baptism of Infants, and mocked at many of the ceremonies of the Church. Still, his preaching was very earnest, and attracted many to him. He was allowed by HILDEBERT DE LAVARDIN [q.v.] to preach at Le Mans during Lent, while he was absent at Rome; on his return he found that Henry had completely alienated the people from him. Hildebert requested him to leave the diocese, which he did, and went next to Provence, but was seized by the Bishop of Arles; and the Council of Pisa, held in 1134 under Innocent II., declared him to be a heretic, and condemned him to prison. In a short time he was released, when he for some years laboured in the south of France, and the progress of his sect was so alarming that Pope Eugene III. sent the Abbot Bernard of Clairvaux to preach against him, but without success. Henry was then brought before the Council of Rheims, in 1148, and was condemned to imprisonment for life; he died very soon after.

Henry IV., King of France and Navarre, was born in Pau, in Bearn, Dec. 15th, 1553. He was the son of Antoine de Bourbon and Jeanne d'Albret, daughter and heiress of the King of Navarre, after whose death, in 1535, Antoine succeeded to the throne. Henry was brought up in his native place, after which he was sent to the French Court till 1566, when his mother recalled him to Pau, where she instructed him in the Calvinistic doctrines. In 1569 he joined the Huguenot party at La Rochelle, and from that time he played a conspicuous part in their ranks, on account both of his high rank and military abilities. In 1572, his mother dying (it is said of poison), Henry became King of Navarre. In the same year he married Margaret of Valois, sister of Charles IX. At the massacre of St. Bartholomew it was at first intended that Henry should be one of the victims, but his life was spared on condition that he professed Catholicism. He remained a prisoner in Paris till 1576, when he escaped to the Huguenots at Alençon and put himself at the head of the army, and gained many advantages. In 1589 he was reconciled to Henry III., who on his death-bed named him his successor. Half his subjects were opposed to him on account of his faith, and the Dukes of Lorraine and Savoy, and Philip II. of Spain, all claimed the throne. Henry gained advantages at Ivry and Arques, and at last, in 1593, it was settled he should reign, on condition that he for a second time should renounce his faith. This he did formally at St. Denis. It was not, however, till 1598 that all France submitted to him. Henry at once began to promote the commerce and industry of the kingdom, which had so long been disturbed by civil wars. He established new manufactures, introduced mulberry trees into the country, and promoted the silk trade. He beautifully improved the French roads, and employed men of learning. It is said that in the space of ten years the national debt was reduced from 330 millions to fifty millions. With regard to religion, his conversion was evidently insincere. In his internal policy he was totally impartial, and promulgated the Edict of Nantes to redress the wrongs that the Protestants had suffered. [See EDICT OF.] In his foreign policy his principles were more plainly shown. He was friendly to England, supported the independence of Holland, took part with the Protestants against Rudolph II., and was opposed to Rome and Spain. This was plainly seen by his Catholic subjects. His death was frequently attempted, and he was finally killed by a Jesuit named Ravallac on the 14th, 1610. He was deeply regretted in France. His brilliant qualities, his high spirit, his humanity, and benevolence, made him much beloved, and his memory is still cherished in France.

Henry, MATTHEW.—An eminent Puritan divine, born in 1662, at a place called Broad Oak, in Flintshire, died in a palsy on the way from Chester to London in 1714. He was educated in London, and began the study of the law at Gray's Inn in 1685; but, being desirous of entering the ministry, was ordained in 1687, and became minister in Chester as a Dissenting minister. He afterwards accepted a call to Hackney, but several years after. The work by which he is principally known is his Exposition of the Old and New Testament, which, however, he did not live to finish; it is useful rather than devotional than a critical commentary, for homiletical purposes it still holds its place among the best. It has been much praised by three great Nonconformist ministers, Robert Hall, Whitfield, and A. A. Among his other works we may mention An Enquiry into the Nature of Schism; Catechism; Communicant's Companion; and some Sermons.

Henry, PHILIP [b. 1631, d. 1691] of the preceding, was born at Wrexham (his father holding an office at Chester) and received his early education at Wrexham, whence, in 1648, he proceeded to the University of Church Oxford. He was present at the execution of his father at the beheading of Charles I. He took his B.A. in 1651, his M.A. in 1654, preached his first sermon the following year, and in 1659 became vicar of Wrexham, in Flintshire. At the Restoration he refused to assent to the Act of Uniformity, and in consequence gave up his living, after that lived chiefly at Broad Oak. In 1669, when the violent operation of the Mile Act began to abate, he was a man of remarkable and consistent conduct, of piety. At Worthenbury, where he was named by the neighbouring aimed the epithet of Heavenly

He was created a Baron of the Kingdom and in 1631 a peer of England. At the outbreak of the Civil War he had sided with the Parliament but returned to his allegiance. He died in 1633. Two works were published of his, Examen Dantis in Rerum Insulam, and Reign of Henry VIII. His biography, which was printed by Horace Walpole in 1784. He has left us the result of his speculations in two treatises, de Veritate and de Religione Gentilium. He was far from being a sceptic in the modern sense of the word. His speculations are philosophical rather than critical; he offers solutions rather than starts difficulties; he says religion is founded on an immediate consciousness of God and of Divine things, not on revelation or historical tradition; he makes his own religion of reasoning rest on the following grounds:—"There is a God whom man ought to honour and reverence; a life of holiness is the most acceptable worship that can be offered Him; sinners must repent them of their sins and strive to become better; and after death everyone must expect the rewards or penalties befitting the acts of this life." He was the contemporary of Hobbes or Malinchebury (q.v.), to whose principles he was directly opposed, though they not infrequently arrived at the same results.

Herbert, Gerson, one of the saintliest characters which the English Church has produced since the Reformation, was born at Montgomery, in 1593. On the side of his father, who died when he was four years old, he was connected with the noble house of the Earls of Pembroke, to which connection he owed what little of worldly advancement his short life enjoyed, while to his mother, the daughter of Sir Richard Newport, of High Arch, county Salop, as to a second St. Monica, he was indebted for much of his personal holiness and spirituality. His eldest brother Edward was the above famous philosopher and historian, Lord Herbert of Chesham. George, with two other brothers, was educated at home by a resident chaplain, under his mother's eye, till the age of twelve, when he was sent to the school at Westminster. There he remained for three years, and from thence was transplanted to Trinity College, Cambridge, where he pursued his studies with sufficient diligence to be elected Fellow of that society in 1614, and five years after, when Sir Francis Nethersole was called abroad on the King's business, he was appointed Public Orator to the University—a post which he held for the next eight years. At this period of his life he seems to have looked forward to a political career by preference, and did in fact make such progress in the King's favour at Court as to be rewarded with a sinecure appointment which secured him an income of £120 a year; but the death both of the King and of his two patrons, the Duke of Richmond and the Marquis of Hamilton, put an end to all such hopes, and, his mother's earnest desires at length prevailing with him, he resolved to take Holy Orders. The exact date of his ordination as deacon is unrecorded, but in 1626 he received the prebend of Layton Ecclesia, county Huntingdon—a preferment, however, which did not involve the cure of souls. Nevertheless, he spent a considerable portion of the prebendal estate, which lay in the parish, in restoring its dilapidated church. Next year, to his inexpressible grief, he lost his mother, after a period of great suffering; almost immediately upon which he resigned his post at Cambridge, and in 1629, becoming himself weak in health, went for change of air, first to stay with his brother, Sir Henry, at Woodford, in Essex, and then for a visit to the Earl of Danby, at Dauntsey, in Wiltshire, who was the brother of his mother's second husband. There, by dint of careful dieting and rest from study, he contrived in great measure to recruit his strength. About this time he resolved upon two important steps, viz. marriage and taking priest's Orders. The first he effected in a way somewhat curious for its summariness. A kinsman of Lord Danby's who lived not far away, had frequently before his death (which occurred before Herbert came to Dauntsey), expressed his willingness and even desire that Mr. George Herbert should marry one of the nine daughters with whom Heaven had blessed him; "but rather his daughter Jane than any other, because Jane was his beloved daughter," says Walton in his life. And Jane it was to be; for thus as by invisible bonds they were drawn to one another, even before actual acquaintance, and three days after their first interview ("at which a mutual affection entered into both their hearts, as a conqueror enters into a surprised city"), the lady "changed her name into Herbert." His second resolution was not much longer deferred for its fulfilment. For about three months after his marriage the promotion of Dr. Curle to the bishopric of Bath and Wells rendered vacant the rectory of Bemerton in Wiltshire, which, though pro hac vice in the gift of the Crown, was ordinarily under the patronage of his kinsman, the Earl of Pembroke. Accordingly the Earl asked that the living might be offered to George Herbert, and his request was granted. Herbert hesitated for a while, from his sense of the great responsibility incurred. There seems also to have been a feeling among his friends that the life and duties of a country clergyman (then much degraded) were beneath the dignity of his birth. This idea, though generally rife at the time, was quite foreign to Herbert's pure and lofty conception of the sacred office; and after an interview with Laud, then Bishop of London, his scruples were at length overcome, he assumed the distinctive canonical dress then worn by the beneficed clergy, was inducted with the usual formalities into his living, and at the next Ember-tide received priest's Orders. Here, in this tiny country village, he spent the remaining two years and a few months of his life. A full and exquisitely touching description of his labours as a parish priest during this period is to be found, and should be read by everyone, in the pages of his biographer and friend, Izaak Walton. At Bemerton he died in 1632 (or 3), and under the altar in his own church. A writer and a poet, George Herbert affinities with and shared the faults of those many literary men who numbered among his best friends. Such were Dr. Donne, Dean of St. Henry Wotton, Bishop Andrewes, as Ferrar, of Little Gidding. The wit and fantastic wit, often leading to and frigidity, which characterize of this school and period, are compared perhaps more abundantly in George than in others, by a real beauty and poetic feeling, and by an air of modesty and sincerity which breathes every line that he wrote. Of his prose which are on the whole less stupider in style than his poetry, All Temple is as exquisite and as fine work as was ever produced, and it doubt helped many a clergyman to live more conformably to the Master. His chief poetical work is a collection suggested by the Christian scriptures, entitled The Temple, which throughout with the choicest gems and phrase. Besides these, there are a great number of his effusions in Latin verse, English and Latin. The Jacula Prudentum, this latter of oracular sayings, partly no doubt and partly drawn from various sources.

Herbert, WILLIAM, lived in the 11th century, and had a great reputation. He was born at Oxford, became a monk at Fécamp, in Normandy, but removed on the invitation of William Rufus to the court he lived. He is said to have been appointed to the bishopric of Thetford, for which act he was commanded by Pope Gregory VII. by way of penance, to build seven churches and monasteries. He translated the bishopric of Thetford to Norwich, and built there at his own cost; he also built a scopal palace, two churches at Norwich, one at Lynn, and one at Elmham. He died 1119.

Herder, JOHANN GOTTFRIED, theologian and metaphysician [1744-1803]. He was a friend of Kant, and a disciple of Goethe, and first became a teacher in the cathedral school of Altona, a powerful preacher there. He was appointed Court Preacher at Berlin. By the charm of his writing he was able to press his views on the popular mind. He was one of the writers who established the principle of Biblical exegesis which became as a commonplace, that not one dogmatical system, but a literature of many ages, countries, and languages, each portion of which has to be judged by the light of its historical

The first record of a e is that, about 830, a stone church this purpose by Milfrid, ruler of Anglo-Saxon church lasted for turies. The church was rebuilt Edward the Confessor by Bishop it was very shortly afterwards e Welsh under Algar, Earl of Griffin, Prince of Wales. Then raine, or de Losinga, consecrated ereford in 1079, began to recon- hedral. Bishop Raynelm (1107- d the work, and it was com- obert de Betun (1131-48). It l to St. Mary and St. Ethelbert, the form of a Latin cross, with or the choir, an eastern apse, a central tower, and eight bays for the nave. Bishop de Vere (1186-99) commenced the eastern transepts. The Lady Chapel was built between 1226 and 1246; the clerestory of the choir in 1250. The north transept was begun in the time of Bishop Acquablanca, and completed by Swinfield about 1288, who also built the north porch, the aisles of the nave, the presbytery aisles, and the north-east transept. The central tower was commenced about 1320. Succeeding bishops made additions, and it was completed about 1530 by Bishop Booth, who erected the northern outer porch. The building of the cathedral thus extended over 440 years. On Easter Monday, 1786, the west end fell, and its restoration was unhappily confided to Wyatt, who destroyed the Norman work of the triforium and clere- story, and replaced it with bastard Early English. Wyatt's work at Hereford is prob- ably the ugliest disfigurement which any English cathedral has ever undergone. More alterations were carried out between 1841 and 1852 by Mr. Cottingham, but in 1858 the final work was happily entrusted to Sir Gilbert Scott, and completed in 1863.

King Ethelbert, who was murdered by Offa, is said to have been interred in the first Saxon church on this spot. Hereford cathe- dral contains many fine monuments; the chief is the shrine of Bishop Cantilupe [1275-82], the great saint of Hereford, and the last Englishman canonised before the Reformation. In the cathedral is preserved a most remark- able Map of the World, the work of Richard de Haldingham and Lafford, in Lincolnshire; he was prebendary of Hereford in 1305.

Hereford, Use of. [Usa.]

Heresy [Gr. hairesis, "choice"] signifies a personal choice of opinions contrary to the general teaching of the Church and the Holy Scriptures. It is universally agreed that the fact of holding an erroneous opinion does not make a man a heretic: he may have been brought up in it, and not discerned his error, or may hold it in invincible ignorance. That heresies of a fundamental character, because subversive of Christian truth, and therefore necessarily of Christian morals, have existed in the Church from the beginning, we have Scriptural evidence to show. In the days of the Apostles there were the Judaizers, who denied the sufficiency of the Gospel; the Nicolaists [Rev. ii.], Elymas and Phileas [2 Tim. ii. 17], Simon Magus, Cerinthus. The tenets of the principal heresiarchs who have denied the orthodox faith will be found under their respective names. But the following table will be found useful as a general classification of the principal points concerning which men have departed from cardinal doctrines of the Catholic faith.

I.—REGARDING THE CREATION, AND THE ORIGIN OF EVIL.

The Gnostics and the Manichæans denied that God was maker of Heaven and Earth, and of all things visible and invisible, affirming that matter is eternal and evil in its own nature.

II.—REGARDING THE TRINITY. [See Ath. Creed, v. 2—23.]

The Montanists denied the Trinity in Unity, and Divided the Substance, affirming the separate personality of the Son, and regarding Montanus himself as a Paraclete. They were charged with Trithemism, i.e. holding the Trinity, but denying the Unity.

The Patriarchist Monarchians (Theodotus, Artemon, Paul of Samosata), with the Ebionites, Carpocratians, and the Arians, denied by implication the Unity in Trinity, affirming that God the Father is the only God without the distinction of persons, thus holding the Unity, but denying the Trinity.

The Macedonians excluded the Holy Ghost from the Godhead, and so denied the Trinity, though they acknowledged the Father and the Son.

The Patripassian Monarchians (Praxeas, Sabellius, Noetus), with the Photinians, agreed with the Patriarchist Monarchians in rejecting the distinction of Persons in the Godhead. They denied that there is One Person of the Father, another of the Son, and another of the Holy Ghost, and Confounded the Persons, affirming that the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost are only manifestations of one and the same Person, performing different functions as Creator, Redeemer, and Inspirer.

III.—REGARDING THE PERSON OF CHRIST, Creed, v. 23—28.]

(a) The Divine Nature.

Arius denied that Christ was begotten Father before all Worlds; that He is the Very God, of one substance with the Father the Godhead of the Son and of the Holy one, their glory equal, their majesty with the Godhead, the Glory and the Father, and that the Son and Holy one, eternal, and almighty. He said Christ was made out of nothing by the Father, was only the highest of created beings. [Nicene, A.D. 325.]

The Semi-Arians also denied the co-eternal Godhead of Christ, but they said He is, in a sense, of one nature with the Father, affirming that "the Son is like the Father according to the Scriptures." [Synod of 335.]

The Acedians went beyond Arius, and said "the Nature of Christ is different from the Father."

The Antians went beyond the Acedians, and affirmed that "Christ is unlike the Father in Nature and Will." [Synod of Antioch.]

The Patriarchist Monarchians, with the Carpocratians, denied that Christ was more than man.

(b) The Human Nature.

Valentinus denied that Christ put on the Nature of the Virgin, i.e. that He was of the Virgin Mary and Man of the same mother.

Tatian denied that Christ was Perfecting that His body was of peculiar, heavenly, and not a real human body.

Mani, and all others who were Docetists, denied that Christ in Perfecting.

Apollinarius denied that Christ is Perfecting a reasonable soul and human flesh, saying that the human nature is Christ's reasonable human soul. As Arius said He is of the same nature with God, Apollinarius said He is of the same nature with man.

The Monophysites, who said that Christ is one nature, and the Monothelites, who said He has but one will, though they claimed original perfection of Christ's human nature, denied its present perfection.

(c) The Union of the Two Natures.

Cyrillus and Basilides denied the eternal union, affirming that Christ the Father dwelt in the Man Jesus from Baptism till the Crucifixion.

Nestorius (or his followers) in his view of the Unity of Person in Christ, said He was two, not one Christ. He did not divide the natures, but divided them. [Ephesus, A.D. 451.]

Eutyches, and his followers, the Monophysites, denied that Christ was two whole and perfect natures, they said that He was originally of the Father, they differed from Apollinarius. They Christ as one altogether, by essential union, and did not distinguish the natures of Chalcedon, A.D. 451.] Nestorius, Eutyches, and his followers, the Monophysites, denied that we ought to divide them.

IV.—REGARDING THE HOLY GHOST

Arius had, by implication, denied the Holy Ghost, when he denied that the Father is the Father.

The Macedonians denied the God the Holy Ghost, i.e. that He is the Giver of Life, but some of them did not deny His Personality, affirming that the Holy Ghost denotes no more than an influence from the Father. [Council of Constantinople.]

Kermann, Archbishop of [1477, d. 1552].—A conspicuous figure formation. Recognising the play the Reform movement, the teaching of Luther reification of man, he introduces into his diocese, whilst not to separate entirely from Rome, but to preserve the t. In 1543 he met with such a chapter, as resulted in the Charles V., and the deposition. In 1543 he invited Melancthon to draw up a Scriptural form of worship for his subjects. This is the Consultation of Hermann, of Cologne, and contained public services and administrations, with forms of prayer and also expositions of several and duty. It was published in 1543, in Latin in 1545, and in

We are indebted to this work of our Communion Service, the Absolution, the Words; for the Reformed Mass, which was copied from the Litany, especially for mercy by the Passion

In an early Christian writer, one is found under the title of "the interpreters." Origen, Eusebius, and others claim to be the same that St. Paul. At the end of his Epistle to the Corinthians he calls him Hermes, which gave modern authors to attribute to him Hermes, Pope Pius I.'s name. The ancients name him Hermes, and Jerome observes that the work was a Grecian, and common to the Grecians than which could not be if Pope Paul were author of it. The work is found among the Apostles, called by the general name of Hermeneutæ, and is divided into three parts, entitled Ecclesia, contains the author saw. In the first part he warns him against his neglect of his duty, and the lady explains that the building of the Church in the fourth reveals the trial and is about to come upon men. It relates twelve Instructions delivered by a guardian angel to a grave pastor. They command that we must believe in and avoid detraction, lying, dishonesty, the heart must be sober and prayer must be continual, unintermittent, and that the commands of God are visible. The third part contains precepts which the author was in precepts of happiness and Christianity. The Great Tribulation, mentioned in his fourth vision, is by Dr. Hammond and Dodwell supposed to refer to the destruction of Jerusalem, in which case it must have been written before the year 70, in which that city was sacked and demolished by Titus. Archbishop Wake, however, thinks the reference is to the persecution under Domitian. The book was received formerly in some churches as canonical, and Irenæus, Clement of Alexandria, Origen, and Tertullian, quote it as a book of the Holy Scripture, but it was looked upon by other Churches only as a useful and edifying book. The voice of the Church decided against its canonicity, and some writers have treated it with unmeasured contempt. Wake, as was his wont, gives his judgment dispassionately. He says: "That there are many useful things in it, especially in the second, and as I think, the best part of it, cannot be denied. And for the other two it must be considered that though such visions as we there read of, being no longer continued to these latter ages, may warrantably be despised in the pretenders of the present day, yet we cannot doubt but that at the time this book was written, the extraordinary gifts of the Holy Ghost were very frequent, and we need not question but that such revelations too, among the rest, were communicated to holy men for the benefit of the Church."

Hermeneutæ [Gr. "interpreters"].—They were officers in the Church who had to render one language into another, as there was occasion, both in reading the Scriptures and in the homilies that were made to the people; this office would be chiefly in Churches where the people spoke different languages, as in the Churches of Palestine, where probably some spoke Syriac and others Greek, and in the African Churches, where some spoke Latin and others Punic.

Hermians.—An heretical sect, who, with the Seleucians, refused the use of baptism by water, on the ground that it was not instituted by Christ. Their authority was the words of St. John, "I baptise you with water, but He that cometh after me shall baptise you with the Holy Ghost and with fire;" the very same text which is cited centuries after in Barclay's Apology for the rejection of water baptism by the Friends. They thought that the souls of men consisted of fire and spirit, and therefore a baptism of fire was more suitable to their nature, but what kind of baptism that was, none of the ancients have told us, unless Clement of Alexandria, who tells of some who, when they had baptised men in water, made a mark on their ears by fire.

Hermits, formerly often called Eremites [Gr. erēmos, "a desert"].—The beginning of the solitary or hermit life in the Christian Church is to be traced to the frightful condition of the Roman Empire in its last days. Christianity had reformed individual souls, but the Empire was as a dead carcase, which could not be revived, and must be taken away. Men who discerned the signs of the times, and who expected the fiery judgment of God to fall, fled from the world, to pray and fast and watch alone. They had, indeed, seen Eastern pagans, as well as Jews, doing so before them. Buddha and his followers in India, and the Essenes among the Jews, had retired from the world into solitude; and in Egypt, apparently, first, Christian men and women in the terrible fourth century swarmed out into the desert. Soon news came into the cities of their holiness, their labours, and the wondrous miracles which they wrought, and the life which they led came for a while to be the ideal Christian life, supported, preached, practised by all the great men of the time—men like Athanasius, Basil, Chrysostom, Jerome, Augustine. Of the hermits proper, those whose whole religious life was spent in this form, and who are not otherwise known than as hermits, the most celebrated were St. Antony, his pupil Hilarion, Paul, Arsenius, and Simeon Stylites. The best account of them is to be found in Montalembert's Monks of the West, and there is a very charming volume of biographies of the Hermits among the works of Charles Kingsley. Short notices of the principal hermits will be found under their respective names.

Hermogenes.—A noted heretic who lived about the end of the second century. He was a painter by profession, and is generally supposed to have been born at Carthage. Being unable to reconcile the goodness of God with the existence of evil in His creatures, he held and taught that matter, in itself evil, was eternal; thus he would be styled in our day a materialist. His teaching was the exact opposite to the teaching of the Gnostics on this subject. Hermogenes held that there must be a complete correspondence between the moral character of the Creator and that of the creature, and as this does not exist, his theory of the eternity of matter was put forward to solve the difficulty, and to manifest that God is good, in spite of the evil existing in His world. Tertullian wrote a treatise against Hermogenes. Other writers also opposed this heresy, including Theodoret, Origen, Theophilus of Antioch, and Hippolytus. In all other respects, both Tertullian and Hippolytus acknowledge that Hermogenes was sound in faith, acknowledging Christ as God and man. The late Mr. John Stuart Mill met the same moral difficulty in nearly the same way.

Hernhutter. [MORAVIANS.]

Herrick, ROBERT, a sacred poet, was born in London, in 1591, and educated at St. John's College, Cambridge, with the intention of studying for the law. Eventually he decided upon entering the Church, and through the Earl of Exeter he received the living of Prior, in Devonshire, where most of his poems were written. In 1647 he was expelled by the Parliament from Dean Prior, and then settled at Westminster, but was afterwards expelled by the Royalists. He was expelled on his return to his living at the Restoration. The date of his death is unknown.

Hertford, COUNCIL OF.—An Anglo-Saxon Council, held in 673, under the presidency of ARCHBISHOP THEODORE. The following canons were passed:—

1. That Easter should be kept upon the first Sunday after the fourteenth day of the moon in the month.
2. That no bishop should encroach upon the jurisdiction of another, but content himself with his own jurisdiction.
3. That the monks should not stroll from one monastery to another, nor remove without the consent of their abbot; but pay that submission promised at the taking the Order upon their entry.
4. That no clergyman should quit his diocese without the leave of his own bishop, and ramble at pleasure. No monk should be received into a foreign monastery without letters of recommendation from his bishop, and he happens to be entertained, and refuse to return upon his diocesan's invitation, then he and those that receive him shall be liable to excommunication.
5. That bishops and clerks who are strangers should be contented with the civilities of an guest, and that it shall be lawful for none of the clergy to execute any part of their function without the licence of the bishop of the diocese.
6. That it is convenient a synod should be held twice a year; but because there are some who say why this cannot be effected without the consent of the Fathers agree that a council should be held every year at Clofeshooh upon the last day of the month.
7. That no bishop should have the preference of himself to another, but that in all things of precedence all the prelates should be equal, in the regards of time, and the order of consecration.
8. It was proposed that the number of bishops should be increased in proportion to the number of the laity; but upon this point they were unable to come to a resolution for the present, etc.

Hervey, JAMES, was born in 1731, at Hardington, near Northampton. He was educated at Lincoln College, Oxford, and became acquainted with Wesley at Oxford. He was, for a while, curate of a parish in Hampshire, and afterwards of a parish in London where the congregation were so small that they voluntarily collected each year to raise his stipend. After his father's death he succeeded him in the rectory of Weston Favell, where he died in 1783, having devoted his whole life to benevolence. He belonged to the Calvinistic school. His name is the author of a work entitled Prayers for the Dead, which was first published in 1749, but is now almost forgotten.

ER, D.D., Church historian, near Oxford, in 1600. He studied at Oxford, and gave lectures on history and cosmography in that University. Through the interest of Archbishop Laud, in whose theory of Church and King he believed, he was, in 1629, appointed Chaplain to Charles I., who made him Prebendary and Sub-dean of Westminster, and gave him several livings.

The Long Parliament deprived him of these livings, and also confiscated his property. At the Restoration he again became Sub-dean of Westminster, and died in 1662. He was a voluminous writer, and his controversial works, directed chiefly against the Presbyterians, are very bitter. The most important of these are Aërius Redivivus and History of the Presbyterians [from 1536 to 1647]. Among his other works are:—Microcosmus [1625]; History of St. George [1631]; Examen His- toricum, an attack on Fuller's Church History; Historia Quinquarticularis, a defence of Arminianism; Ecclesia Restaurata; Cyprianus
Anglicus, or a Life of Bishop Laud; Theologia
Veterum; various works against Calvinism, etc.

Hicksites.—An American branch of Friends or Quakers, who took their name from their leader, Elias Hicks. They separated from the old body of Friends in 1828, by whom they were accused of lapsing into deism. Hicks taught that God gave to every man at his birth light and grace sufficient, if obeyed, to save him, without either the help of the Word of Christ, or Christ Himself.
He denied the doctrines of the Trinity and Satisfaction, and also of Original Sin. His teaching spread through the United States, and especially in Pennsylvania, and it is doubtful whether the Hicksites do not still form a majority in the Society of Friends throughout America. [FRIENDS.]

High Church.—A term used to designate that party in the Church which followed the principles of Laud and Andrewes, claiming union with the ancient Church, and attaching essential importance to the Episcopal succession. At the Restoration of the Church and the throne after the Protectorate, this party was in the ascendant in Parliament and in the country. The folly of James II. produced the Revolution, and this was followed by the Nonjuring Schism, the result of which was that the body of the clergy were High Church, while the bishops, being appointed by the Whig Government, were Low. In the days of Queen Anne the High Church party was again in the ascendant, but the time of the first two Georges was entirely Whiggish. The reign of George III. saw a turn of the tide. In that reign the "orthodox," or High Church party, was by far the most numerous, but, as a whole, it was a lifeless body; the other side showed great activity and zeal in promulgating their own

doctrines [EVANGELICAL PARTY], preferring extemporary prayer and preaching, while the High Churchmen professed unbounded zeal for the Prayer Book. But it would be a mistake to identify their views with those of the High Churchmen either of the days of Queen Anne or of Queen Victoria. Though they inherited the traditions of the dominant party of the reigns of the Stuarts, they rested their claim to ascendancy, not on the Divine mission of the Church, but on the fact that it was "by law established." They said nothing, and cared nothing about the apostolic succession, which had been the cardinal doctrine of the Nonjurors. From their security they were rudely shaken by William Cobbett, whose History of the Reformation was written with the intention of destroying the Church of England. It must be confessed that he had too good grounds for casting away his respect for the Church as it then was. The clergy, as the literature of the time displays them, were self-indulgent and slothful, bishoprics were conferred on relatives of Prime Ministers, or simoniacally bought; the investment being a profitable one, inasmuch as the buyers not only enriched themselves, but loaded their children with preferment in a shameless way. No wonder that Cobbett succeeded in making the Church unpopular; and there were many who thought that her days were numbered. But a better spirit arose. The Evangelical party kept alive the spiritual principle that seemed ready to die, until a new power arose, appealing not to the emotional and religious sentiment, but to the great historical traditions of the past. [TRACTS FOR THE TIMES.] Under the leadership of Newman and his friends the High Church movement took new shape. Amongst the names of the High Church party of the present century we have to place not only the Oxford Tract writers and their immediate followers, but also men who were partly influenced by them, as well as some who worked on independent lines. Such were Archbishop Howley, Bishops Marsh, Blomfield, and Lonsdale, Drs. Mill and Molesworth, and Hugh James Rose. Notices of each of these divines will be found under their names. The High Church party, in spite of much discouragement, and many attempts to suppress it, steadily made way, until it became a very prominent party in the Church of England. Some of its members have desired to express its opinions by means of outward symbols, and are known as Ritualists. [RITUALISM.] But the old-fashioned members of the party stand aloof from this, and refuse to be identified with anything which appears to the world in general to approximate to the teaching of the Church of Rome.

High Mass. [MASS.]

Hilarion, St.—A hermit of the fourth century, born near Gaza. St. Jerome, who wrote his life, reports him as working miraculous cures by calling on the name of Jesus, and so making many disciples.

Hilary, St., born at Poitiers, was converted, with his wife and daughter, to Christianity. He was consecrated Bishop of his native place about 354. He was a great champion for the Catholic doctrine against the Arians, and Saturninus, the Arian Bishop of Arles, procured his banishment into Phrygia. In 359 he was called to the Council of Salamis, where he bravely upheld his belief, and he expressed for a public conference with the Arians in presence of the Emperor, but they persuaded him to send their enemy back to Gaul. Upon his arrival at Poitiers, in 360, he convened several Councils for restoring the ancient belief, and in his zeal for the Catholic faith went to Italy in 364 and denounced Auxentius, Bishop of Milan, as an Arian to the Emperor Valentinian, who ordered a conference between Hilary and Auxentius, in presence of ten other bishops; to this Auxentius, after much demurring, was obliged to agree, and, thus pressed, he declared his belief in the Divinity of our Lord. Hilary suggested to the Emperor that his profession was without sincerity; but he, tired of the dispute, would listen no longer, and ordered Hilary to leave Milan. He returned home and died in 367. His festival is kept on Jan. 14th. His works are:—Twelve Books on the Trinity, begun in 346, and finished in his exile; a Treatise on Synods, written during his banishment in 359; Three Discourses of Constantius on Arianism; and commentaries on St. Matthew and part of the Psalms; but these are mostly copied from Origen and Augustine. The best edition of his works is that published by the Benedictines in 1693. They claim for him the authorship of the Te Deum, and Mr. Procter [p. 222] says "there seems little reason to dispute it."

Hilary, St., Bishop of Arles [i. 401, c. 449].—The place of his birth is unknown. He was well educated, and while still very young he followed the example of a friend and relative, Honoratus, and retired to the monastery of Lérins. In 426 Honoratus was made Bishop of Arles, and after much persuasion Hilary was induced to accompany him. Honoratus died in 429, and Hilary was unanimously chosen his successor. He was an eloquent and impressive preacher. Hilary was involved in a contest with Pope Leo I. about a bishop named CHELIDONICUS [q.v.]. The Pope's resentment was implacable, and he deprived Hilary of his rights as a Metropolitan. Hilary, having in vain tried to bring the Pope to a friendly temper, spent the rest of his days in prayer and study. Though he was treated Hilary roughly in his lifetime, he paid a tribute to his piety after his death. His only genuine writings of his extant are his Life of St. Honoratus, his predecessor; and his Letter to Eucherius, Bishop of Lyons. Other visions which were approved by Pope Eugene III. She died in 1181 in the monastery she had founded at Rupertsberg, being eighty-two years of age. She wrote several treatises against the Cathari, a comment on the Rule of St. Benedict, etc. A collection of her Letters was printed at Cologne in 1566.

Hill, ROWLAND, born at Hawkstone, in Shropshire, 1744; died in London, 1833. He was educated at Shrewsbury and Eton, and in 1764 entered St. John's College, Cambridge. While yet an undergraduate he commenced expounding the Scriptures and preaching in the surrounding villages, which roused against him the wrath of the college authorities. In 1766 he made the acquaintance of Whitfield, which strengthened his determination to preach. In 1769 he took his B.A., and looked forward to his ordination; but this was refused him by no less than six bishops, solely on the ground of his "irregular" proceedings at Cambridge. He then visited London and preached in Whitfield's Tabernacle in the Tottenham Court Road, and then wandered about the country in great poverty, preaching in the open air. At length, in 1773, he was ordained deacon by the Bishop of Bath and Wells, and became curate of Kingston, in Somersetshire; but as he continued his open-air preaching, the Bishop refused to admit him to priest's Orders. He became very prominent by the frequent addresses he made to large crowds of people in St. George's Fields during the Gordon riots in June, 1780, and in 1782 a meeting of his friends and admirers assembled to found a chapel for his permanent ministry. This resulted in the building of the Surrey Chapel, where he preached almost to the time of his death, going away, however, all the summer on itinerary preaching. In 1771 he had built a chapel at Wotton-under-Edge, in Gloucestershire, and now he styled himself "Rector of Surrey Chapel, Vicar of Wotton-under-Edge, and Curate of the fields, commons, etc., throughout England and Wales." The service in the Surrey Chapel was conducted according to the ritual of the Church of England, but his pulpit was open to many famous Nonconformist preachers. Rowland Hill was a very eccentric man, full of wit and drollery, which he did not scruple to introduce into his preaching. His chief literary work was his Village Dialogues, published in 1801, a racy book, which showed how closely Mr. Hill observed all classes of society. In 1803, on the passing of the Clergy Residence Act, he published a satirical pamphlet called Spiritual Characteristics. In 1790 he wrote A Warning to Professors, containing Aphoristic Observations on the Nature and Tendency of Public Amusements. He took a warm interest in the British and Foreign Bible Society from the time of its foundation in 1803.

Hillel.—A famous Jewish doctor, born about 112 B.C., of poor parents, and called "the Babylonian" from his birthplace. He left Babylonia at the age of forty, and came to Palestine to study the Law; he distinguished himself so greatly that at the age of eighty he was chosen Patriarch of the nation, and head of the Sanhedrim. He was the pupil of Shammai and Abtalion, but, differing from the former, he set up a rival school, and there was so much opposition between the disciples of these two masters that blows were struck and lives lost in their quarrels. The Jews decided in favour of the school of Hillel, as he was able to quote better authorities on his side than Shammai. He was greatly esteemed as a teacher, and is said to have lived to the age of 120.

Hincmar, Archbishop of Rheims in 845, famous for his learning among his contemporaries. He was born about 806, and educated in the monastery of St. Denis, and became very intimate with Charles the Bald. He ruled his diocese with great firmness, and is noted for vindicating the rights of the Gallican Church; in doing which he acted very bitterly against his nephew, Hincmar, Bishop of Laon. He was strenuous and firm in maintaining that the "decretals of Isidore" were spurious, but on the other hand he upheld the doctrine of Paschasius Radbert on Transubstantiation. He was also violent in the persecution of GOTTSCALK [q.v.]. He was driven from Rheims by the Normans not long before his death, which took place at Epernay in 882. An edition of his works was published at Paris, in 1645, by Sirmond. One of his best books is Annals of Rheims.

Hincmar, Bishop of Laon in the ninth century. He took the Pope's part against the Gallican Church and his King, and for this was deposed at the Synod of Douzi [871], presided over by his uncle, the Archbishop of Rheims. He was sent to prison, and his eyes were put out; but Pope John VIII. re-established him in the Council of Troyes in 878, and gave him half of the bishopric's revenue. A few of his letters are extant in Sirmond's edition of Hincmar of Rheims.

Hindooism.—The religion professed by some 150 to 190 millions in India. Its origin is lost in antiquity. Its earliest books are the Vedas, which probably are taken from still earlier history, and it was originally simple in form, but gradually multiplied gods and advanced in sacerdotalism and complexity of forms. The philosophical speculations of Brahminism were followed by the Buddhist reaction against sacerdotal tyranny. [BRAHMINISM; BUDDHISM.] The most prominent and characteristic institution of Hindooism is caste. The touch, even the shadow, of a low caste man pollutes. Thus Hindooism separates man from man. Woman is treated tyrannically and unjust effect upon Hindooism of the coming of Christianity has been profound, and it is impossible to forecast the result. They do not admire and acknowledge the bearers of the new faith, whilst they still hold their old faith. The Brâhma-Samâj ("Church of God") attempted reconstruction of Hindooism to the work of Rammohun Roy, who wrote a book in praise of the precepts of Jesus, while he denied His Divinity. This was done in England in 1833, but the Samâj progressed, and in 1850 passed a resolution denying the infallibility of the Vedas. Keshub Chunder Sen, full of ideas and had derived from the Bible and writings of Chalmers, put forth yet advanced views, the effect of which was the startling and unheard-of circumstance of the marriage of two Hindoos of different castes in 1864. He has committed many eccentricities since then, all of them showing an intensely eager and active spirit and desire to find a new standing ground, and his followers have lost all faith in him. In his last lecture [Jan., 1883] he advocated the amalgamation of Christianity with other religions of the East, and he has not said my last word about Christianity. He died soon afterwards. He would scarcely have reached the level of Unitarianism. The body which he founded will be the body of the future of Hindooism is still dark. An admirable pamphlet on this subject was published by the Religious Tract Society, Tracts, No. 33.]

Hinds, SAMUEL [b. 1793, d. 1864] educated at Oxford, and went as a missionary to the West Indies, and on his return received several preferments, most of them through the influence of Whately, with whom he warmly sympathised. In 1848, Lord Russell made him Dean of Carlisle, and in 1851 Bishop of Norwich in the following year. He resigned this bishopric in 1856. He was the author of several works, of which the chief are:—The History of the Early Progress of Christianity, and An Essay on the Proof, Nature, and Extent of the Influence of Christianity and into the Authority of the Scriptures.

Hinton, JOHN HOWARD [b. 1775, d. 1845] was a famous Baptist preacher, called the "Student's Preacher." Among other works, The Harmony of Truth and Human Reason, and Man's Responsibility. His son, James, was a very remarkable man, the author of Man and His Dwelling-place, The Pain, etc., etc. He died in 1875, and letters were published three years after his death.

Hoadly, BENJAMIN, Bishop of Winches- ter, the son of Samuel Hoadly, was born at Westerham, in Kent, in 1676. He entered Catharine Hall, Cambridge, in 1691, where he became tutor. He was ordained, and in 1701 was appointed lecturer of St. Mildred, in the Poultry, and in the next year rector of St. Peter-le-Poer. Queen Anne, in 1714, pre- sented him to the living of Streatham. On the accession of George I. he became Bishop of Bangor. In 1717 he preached a sermon from the text, "My kingdom is not of this world," in which he argued that the best way to refute Roman Catholics and Dissenters was to show that Christ had not delegated His powers to any ecclesiastical authorities. This sermon led to the famous BANGORIAN CONTROVERSY [q.v.]. Hoadly afterwards became in succession Bishop of Hereford [1721], Salisbury [1723], and Winchester [1734]. He died in 1761.

Hoadly was the most prominent of those clergymen, of whom there were so many during the eighteenth century, who adopted views more or less inclined to Unitarianism and Rationalism. This can be seen by his works:— A Plain Account of the Sacrament; Discourses on the Terms of Acceptance. He also wrote on the Measure of Obedience to the Civil Magistrate, and Reasonableness of Conformity to the Church of England.

Hobbes, THOMAS, the founder of the English Deists, was born at Malmesbury, in Wiltshire, on April 5th, 1588. He studied at Magdalen College, Oxford, became a B.A. in 1607, and became tutor to Lord Cavendish, afterwards Earl of Devonshire, with whom he travelled in France and Italy. On his return to England he mixed much in the society of literary men, and became acquainted with Bacon, Lord Herbert, Ben Jonson, etc. He delighted much in the Greek and Latin poets and historians, particularly Thucydides, whose works he translated with the help of Bacon, to expose the Athenian democracy. He went abroad with Sir Gervase Clifton, but in 1631 was recalled to be tutor of the young Earl of Devon. He travelled in France and Italy with his pupil, becoming acquainted with GALILEO [q.v.]. He re- turned for a short time to England in 1637, but again left on seeing that things were tending to a civil war. He withdrew to Paris, where he wrote de Cive and The Leviathan. In 1647 he became mathematical tutor to the Prince of Wales, afterwards Charles II. This Prince took a great delight in his com- pany, but on the publication of The Leviathan, hearing that it contained principles contrary to religion and civil government, forbade him his presence, but still continued to favour him, and at the Restoration gave him a pen- sion of £100 a year. Hobbes's books were condemned by the Parliament in their Bill against atheism and profaneness in 1666, and he became notorious all over England. He retired to the Earl of Devonshire's seat, Hardwick Hall, in Derbyshire, where he continued to write until his death, which took place in 1679, in his ninety-second year.

Hobbes was the originator of the modern school of Necessitarians, and an advocate of Erastianism. His works are very numerous. Besides those we have mentioned, he wrote Human Nature and de Corpore Politico, a letter upon liberty and necessity, which led to a dispute with Bishop Bramhall: Decameron Physiologicum; Behemoth, or a History of the Civil Wars from 1640 to 1660, etc. He translated the Iliad and Odyssey, but the work, though popular at the time, is never read now, its style being bald and vulgar.

Hody, HUMPHREY, an eminent divine, was born at Oldcombe, in Somersetshire, on Jan. 1st, 1659. He was educated at Oxford, became M.A. in 1682, and was elected Fellow of Wadham College in 1684. He was appointed domestic chaplain to Archbishop Tillotson, which office he also held under his successor, and was presented to a living in London, and appointed Regius Professor of Greek at Oxford in 1698, and Archdeacon of Oxford in 1704. He died Jan. 20th, 1706. Hody is chiefly noted for his works against the Nonjurors. The first was the translation of a Greek treatise, supposed to have been by Nicephorus, and which was published in 1691. Among the replies to this was A Vindication of the Deprived Bishops, by Dodwell. Hody answered his opponents in the following year by The Case of Sees Vacant by Uncanonical Deprivation. Hody also wrote a work on the Septuagint, The Resurrection of the Body Asserted, etc.

Hohenlohe-Waldenburg, ALEXANDER, PRINCE OF [b. 1794, d. 1849].—A priest of the Roman Church [1816], of desultory education and somewhat eccentric character. After his ordination he laboured hard and conscientiously in Bavaria, and falling in with a peasant who professed to heal the sick by faith and prayers, the prince-priest also began to work miraculous cures. He made an immense sensation, but the authorities were incredulous, and the Pope, being appealed to by him, dared not recognise the miracles. He retired to Hungary and was made bishop in partibus infidelium in 1844, but was expelled by the revolutionists in 1848. His alleged miraculous powers formed the subject of much discussion after his death.

Hohenstaufen.—The House of Swabia furnished to the "Holy Roman Empire" the powerful line of emperors which succeeded the House of FRANCONIA [q.v.]. It took its name from the castle of Staufen, in Swabia. On the death of the last Emperor of the Franconian line, his son-in-law, Frederick of Staufen, aimed to succeed him, but was opposed by Lothar of Saxony, and this being supported by Henry, Duke of the House of Guelph, succeeded in. Under Lothar, German influence grew, the fierce Wends were converted to Christianity, and Brandenburg was added to the Empire. After him came Conrad Hohenstaufen [1138-52], and the Welfs, or Guelphs, and Ghibellines [GUELPHS AND GHIBELLINES.] After his nephew reigned, Frederick II. [1152-90], one of the most heroic of the Middle Ages. He made fierce wars in Northern Italy, with a view of restoring Imperial power there, but did not succeed. He was drowned in Asia Minor on the Third Crusade. Philip of Swabia [1208], his son, was succeeded by Otto of Brunswick, who was supported against Hohenstaufen by Pope Innocent III. Frederick II. [1212-50], also King of Sicilies, was a prince of great gifts, energetic and headstrong. The war between him and the spiritual powers was fiercer than any that had been before, and it ended in the ruin of the House. The tragedy of the remaining members of the family is a touching chapter of history. After the extinction of the House of Hohenstaufen there was a while anarchy in Germany. It was ended by the accession of the House of Habsburg in 1273, under entirely altered conditions. Italy was lost to the Empire, and many nobles had made themselves independent princes. Holy Cross Day.—A black day in the Calendar, Sept. 14th. [CROSS DAY.]

Holy Ghost.—The Third Person of the Trinity. The Holy Ghost is declared in the Creeds to be a real and distinct Person, Godhead; "the Lord (i.e. Jehovah) of life, Who proceedeth from the Father and the Son, Who with the Father and the Son together is worshipped and glorified, and by the Prophets." He is that Spirit which "moved upon the face of the waters" [Gen. i. 2] and caused them to be living creatures. It is His office to make us holy. The Church Catechism says "sanctifieth me and all the elect of God," and the second collect for Good Friday says "by whose Spirit the whole body of the Church is governed and sanctified." God created Adam, He breathed into his nostrils the breath of life; but Adam fell, and then it needed an extraordinary influence to carry on the influence of the Holy Spirit within sinful men. This means the Incarnation of the Son of God, who was born of the Virgin Mary by the power of the Holy Ghost. The Spirit of God came to us through the Son made flesh, sanctifying our sinful flesh by His blood.

the thirteenth century, all the old conditions were changed. The Reformation still further overset the mediæval theory of the Empire. The dissolution of the League of Smalkald seemed to lay the whole country prostrate before Charles V., but suddenly the news came that North Germany was in revolt, and it soon became evident that Germany was divided into two strong parties which no force could weld into one, and that the Emperor was no longer a recognised centre for judicial purposes. And thus the old Germanic State system vanished away. The Emperor sought to further his own ends by alliance with the Jesuits, and the Protest-ants retaliated by making alliance with France. The dissensions of Germany culminated in the THIRTY YEARS' WAR [q.v.], and the Empire declined rapidly. Large territories were lost, some to France, some to Sweden, while Holland and Switzerland were declared independent. But within the Empire also the States had won a far larger independence than they had ever had. Thus the Empire grew to be as feeble as had been the Byzantine in its last days, until at length Napoleon crumbled it.

Holy Rood.—The term "rood" [from the Saxon rode, or rod] anciently signified a cross. [For Holy Rood Day, see Cross.]

Holy Thursday. [ASCENSION DAY.]

Holy Water.—The use of holy water by the Roman Catholics probably takes its origin from the ancient ceremonial of washing the hands, which was an ordinance among the Jews, and also among the heathen a natural symbol of spiritual purification. The priests exorcise water and salt with the idea that all creation has been corrupted by the Fall, and then mix them in the name of the Trinity. Holy water is placed in vessels near the doors of the churches, that people may sprinkle themselves on entering and retiring. It is used at almost every ordinance.

Holy Week, called also the "Great Week," and the "Indulgence Week" (from the great absolution at Easter), is the last week in Lent, in which the Church commemorates Christ's Death and Burial. Its observance is of very early date, and is mentioned by Irenæus in the second century. In the English Church special lessons, epistles, and gospels are appointed for every day in the week, and are taken from the accounts of our Lord's Passion, or from the Old Testament prophecies of it. In the Roman Church the matins and lauds sung on Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday of Holy Week are called TENEBRÆ [q.v.], because of the extinction of candles during the singing of the Benedictus. The Thursday in Holy Week is called Maundy Thursday, a rendering of the old name

Dieu Mandat, which commemorated the "new commandment," or mandatum given by our Lord in connection with the washing of the disciples' feet. It is the custom in the Romish Church for the Pope to wash the feet of thirteen poor priests on this day. This is accompanied by the giving of alms, which custom is carried on in the English Church by the Queen's "Maundy Money." Before the sixteenth century there used to be an evening Communion on this day in memory of the first institution, and penitents and excommunicated persons were reconciled in preparation for the evening Communion. [GOOD FRIDAY.]

Holshausen, Bartholomew [b. in Germany, 1613].—He made good progress in philosophy and divinity at the University of Ingolstadt. In 1640 he went to Salzburg, where he formed a society of secular priests called after him Bartholomaeus. The Elector of Mainz invited him to bring his Order into his diocese, and made him Dean of Bingen, near Mainz, where he remained till his death in 1658. Pope Innocent XI. confirmed the constitution of this Order in 1680. One peculiarity of it was that the brethren never worked singly, but always in pairs. They spread through many German towns, and also in Spain and Poland, but they did not last beyond the eighteenth century. They had under them three sorts of houses, seminaries for the instruction of young priests; houses for beneficed and other priests, and houses for aged people who were past work.

Homilies [lit. "intercourse"].—A very early name for the free and conversational discourses by the bishop, or, less frequently, by his presbyters, for the instruction, or exhortation, of the faithful [See also Sermon.] From one cause or another (e.g. want of time for preparation, or the like) the practice very soon grew up, and was fully recognised by the authorities, of delivering the already published homilies of the Fathers instead of freshly written or extemporary addresses, especially, it would seem, in the Gallican Church. Hence the term "homily" in English has gradually come almost always to signify only such collections of discourses set forth under authority for the clergy's use. At the Reformation such volumes were promulgated in England, one in 1547 and the other in 1539, and the Prayer Book rubric still authorises their use. Of late years a commendable attempt has been made to revive the practice of occasionally reading written sermons for young or over-worked clergy, the principal impulse in this direction having been given by an express direction of the Bishop of Lichfield in 1884 to this effect.

Homologoumena [i.e. "those which are generally accepted"].—An expression used by Eusebius in distinction from Antihomologoumena [q.v.] [i.e. "those which are spoken against"], and applied by him to 6 of the New Testament. He maketh homologoumena to be the Gospels, the 4 Epistles of St. Paul, 1 Peter and 1 Jo Homoöusion.—A Greek term in the Nicene Creed "Of one substance and used by the orthodox in the 4th century to express the essential nature (not person) that exists between Father and God the Son. This term had previously been considered tending to support the identity of 1 and Second Persons in the Blessed Trinity. In the ante-Nicene period much difficulty arises from the free and indiscriminate use of the two phrases, Ötota and Öv [q.v.], and in post-Nicene times 3 very attempts that were made at logical definition of so subtle a process of time a compromise was effected by the proposal to substitute the term Homöousion, "of like nature," Homöion, "like" simply, which might satisfy either the Catholic or the Arian interpretation. But these attempts at conciliation with the usual reward of increased bitterness. [ARIANISM.]

Hone, William [b. 1779, d. 1847] enterprising printer, author of entertaining works, which are still valued, Berry-Day Book, Year Book, Tales &c. happily he professed early in life opinions, in consequence of an anti-Bible, brought on, as he said, having to learn by heart chapters of the Bible for childish faults. On one occasion he threw the volume down stairs, exclaiming, "I am my own master I will never open it." And he kept his word for thirty years.

He came to London early, and all his ups and downs became a poor bookish first came prominently before the public as the author of three parodies on parts of the Prayer Book, in consequence of which he was indicted for blasphemy, and was tried on three separate indictments, in 1817. A shy and timid man, he defended himself with wonderful skill and intrepidity, the legal talent employed against him against the hot partisanship of two. The jury, rightly believing that the defence was solely for his political opinions, acquitted him, and Hone from then suppressed his parodies, in spite of tempting offer of money, lest he should be open to the charge of ridiculing the Bible. One day, stopping as usual at an old stall, he took up Jones on the Canon Law, and found the stories of the "Apocryphal Gospels." He discovered that they were old prints in his possession, and I lection of them, which he published under the title of The Apocryphal New Testament. It consists of certain "Gospels," forms of the early heretics, such as "the Gospel of Nicodemus," "the Gospel of the Nazarene," and of the epistles of Clement, Ignatius, and Polycarp, and the Shepherd of Hermas. Again an outcry was raised against his atheism, and this drove him to break through the neglect of thirty years, and to recommence the reading of the Bible. The result was that, to use his own expression, "a ray of light burst in upon him," and he was led away from his atheism for ever. Some time afterwards he was told that his Apocryphal New Testament had done service to the cause of religion by showing on what ground the Church had proceeded in fixing the canon. He replied with the simplicity of true repentance, "It is true, but I do not so intend it." After some time of fasting and prayer he joined the congregation of the Weigh-House Chapel, and on New Year's Day, 1835, received the Lord's Supper. The rest of his life was spent in quietude. He had always been, and continued to the end, a poor student, bright and cheerful with his books, and apparently unfit for any other occupation. But his doubts were at an end, and his last days were peaceful and happy until his death, which took place early at Tottenham, with the expression of a humble but unfailing hope in the propitiation of Christ.

Honorary Canons. [CANONS, HONORARY.]

Honorius. [POPES.]

Honorius.—A Roman monk, nominated bishop of Canterbury by Pope Gregory the Great, and consecrated at Lincoln by Paulinus, Archbishop of York, A.D. 627. On this occasion it was arranged that upon the death of the Archbishop, either of Canterbury or of York, the surviving prelate should be authorised to consecrate the Metropolitan of the other See, that so, for the sake of the fatigue of travelling to Rome it might be prevented. Honorius consecrated Paulinus, a Burgundian, as Bishop of the East Angles. Archbishop Honorius was the first to divide his province into parishes, the number of which he committed to priests or monks of the second Order. He died about the year 653.

Hood.—The hood as worn in England is partly derived from the monastic caputium, partly from the AMICE [q.v.]. It is an ornament of silk or stuff worn by the graduates of universities to mark their rank. It was formerly, as the name implies, attached to the cope or some other garment, and could be drawn over the head in case of rain or cold. In the universities hoods of the graduates were made to signify their degrees by varying the colours and materials.

The following are the theological and learned hoods of the principal Universities:—

B.A.—Black stuff trimmed with (Oxford, Cambridge, Durham, Dublin) white fur; (Lampeter) white fur with black spots.

M.A.—Black silk, lined with silk; (Oxford) crimson; (Cambridge, Aberdeen, Edinburgh) white; (London) russet brown; (Dublin) dark blue; (St. Andrews and Glasgow) red.

B.D.—Black silk lined with (Oxford, Cambridge, Dublin, and Durham) glossy black silk; (St. Andrews) violet purple silk lined with white satin; (Edinburgh) black, lined with purple silk, bordered with white fur; (Glasgow) black silk, bordered with velvet, lined with red silk; (Lampeter) lining of puce silk.

D.D.—Scarlet cloth lined with (Oxford) black silk; (Cambridge) pink silk; (Dublin) scarlet cloth, lined with black silk; (Edinburgh) black, lined with purple silk; (St. Andrews) violet cloth, lined with white satin; (Durham) scarlet cashmere, lined with purple silk; (Glasgow) black velvet, lined with red purple silk; (Aberdeen) purple cloth, lined with white silk.

D.C.L.—(Oxford) scarlet cloth, lined with pink silk; (Durham) as D.D., only lined with white silk.

LL.D.—(Cambridge and Dublin) scarlet cloth, lined with pink silk; (London) lining of blue silk; (St. Andrews) lining of white satin; (Glasgow) black velvet, lined with Venetian red silk; (Edinburgh) black cloth, lined with blue silk.

The theological colleges have also assumed distinctive hoods, some apparently of their own motion, others by assignment from the Bishops.

By the fifty-eighth canon it is stated that every minister saying the public prayers or ministering the sacraments or other rites of the Church, if a graduate, shall wear upon his surplice at such times such hood as by the order of the university is agreeable to his degree.

Hood, E. PAXTON, an eminent Congregational minister, began his ministerial life in 1852 at North Nibley, Gloucestershire, supporting himself (for his congregation was very poor) by lecturing and authorship. His Lamps of the Temple has passed through several editions. In 1855 he was invited to the pastorate of Offord Road, Barnsbury, and subsequently he had a brief ministry at Manchester, and also at Brighton, last of all settling at Falcon Square Chapel, in the City. On Sunday, June 7th, 1885, he took leave of his congregation, preaching from the text, "Ready to depart on the morrow," and next day started for the Continent in search of rest, but on the following Friday he died in Switzerland.

Hook, WALTER FARQUHAR, Dean of Chichester, was born at Worcester in 1798, his father being Dean there. The brilliant but unprincipled journalist, Theodore Hook, was his father's brother. He was educated at Winchester, and became a student at Christ Church, Oxford. He was ordained in 1821, and was at his father's church of Whippingham, in the Isle of Wight, till 1825, when he became Lecturer to St. Philip's, Birmingham. In 1827 he was appointed Chaplain to George IV., a post which he continued to hold under William IV. and her present Majesty. He remained at St. Philip's for three years, and then went to Coventry, becoming vicar of Holy Trinity. Ten years after he was promoted to the vicarage of Leeds. He at once began to rebuild the parish church at a cost of £30,000, and in 1841 obtained an Act of Parliament to enable him to sub-divide the parish. In the course of twenty-two years he built twenty-one churches, increased the number of clergy from twenty-five to seventy, and displayed a like vigour of organisation in every direction. In 1838 he preached a sermon before the Queen from the text "Hear the Church," which passed through twenty-eight editions, but which is said to have given great offence to her Majesty, as it argued that the power to minister in holy things came from God, and not from the State. In 1859 he was appointed by Lord Derby to the Deanery of Chichester, where he remained till his death, in October, 1875. In views he was a High Churchman of the old school. He was a prolific writer, and many of his books are forgotten, but there are some that will live—his Ecclesiastical Biography, Church Dictionary, Lives of the Archbishops of Canterbury from Augustine to Juxon, Christian Taught by the Church Services.

Hooker, RICHARD, one of the most powerful and valued writers of the Church of England, was born at Heavitree, near Exeter, according to Walton in 1553, but according to Wood about Easter-tide, 1554. His parents were not rich, and he was destined for a trade; but his schoolmaster discerned more than ordinary talent in the boy, and his uncle, John Hooker, then Chamberlain of Exeter, brought him under the notice of Jewell, Bishop of Salisbury, who got him admitted in 1567 to Corpus Christi College, Oxford, where he settled on him a pension, which, with a subsidy from his uncle, enabled him to live comfortably. In 1571 he lost both his patron, Bishop Jewell, and his pension; but two other friends were raised up for him in Dr. Cole, the President of his college, and Dr. Sandys, Bishop of London, who sent his son Edwin to him as a pupil at Oxford. In 1577 he was elected a Fellow of his college, and two years later Deputy Professor of Hebrew. In 1581 he was ordained, and was appointed to preach at Paul's Cross. The next year he made an imprudent marriage with Joan, the daughter of Mr. John Churchman, with whom he lodged on first coming to London; Wood says "she was a clownish, silly woman, and withal a mere Xantippe." His marriage forced him to give up his Fellowship, and he maintained himself as well as he could till the end of 1584, when he was presented to the rectory of Drayton-Beauchamp, in hamshire. The way in which he himself to the ordering of his wife amusing and pathetic. He seems, have had no will of his own, in choice of a spouse or in the management of his household. He tended the sick paddock whilst his servant dined, his wife in household duties, or he rocked his little one's cradle at night when his friends desired his company, or enter into philosophical disputation.

Still it may be questioned whether a good man's meekness and patience were natural to him. They seem rather to have been acquired by a hard struggle with a really impetuous disposition. He was certainly not as childishly ignorant in nature and of the ordinary business of his biographers appear to have imagined. Judging from his works, he was quick to observe and shrewd, although it is quite possible for a man to have one character as an author, and another as a man of the world.

At Drayton-Beauchamp he was his old pupil, Edwin Sandys, who Hooker's poverty to his father, and through him to the Archbishop of York, and through him he was made Master of the Temple. At this time Walter Travers was Lecturer at the Temple, and he was ordained by the Presbytery at Antwerp, and warmly attached to the Geneva divines. He wanted to introduce into the Church of England what he called "the Geneva discipline," it brought him into frequent collisions with Hooker, whom he often opposed in the House of Commons, and who naturally retaliated. It was said, "The forenoon sermon at Canterbury, and the afternoon sermon at the Archbishop Whitgift at length came to be silenced by the High Commission, and then brought the matter before the public. Hooker published an answer, which was inscribed to the Archbishop, and in which he paid him as much reverence and respect as it did neglect and hatred from the Archbishop. In order, therefore, to undeceive and to satisfy the latter, he entered upon his famous Laws of Ecclesiastical Polity, as the foundation and plan of it while he was at the Temple. But he found this insufficient to carry out his design, and he then treated the Archbishop to remove him to a quieter post. In 1591 he was presented to the living of Boscombe, in Wiltshire, the same year made Prebendary of Salisbury Cathedral, and Dean. While at Boscombe he published his books, which were printed in 1594. Queen Elizabeth presented him to the living of Bishopscourt, near Canterbury, and he spent the remainder of his life there. The innocence and sanctity of his life were so remarkable that many turned out of

he lived a life of study, attending his duties as parish priest. He in the forty-sixth year of his age. The fifth volume of his great work. The remaining three did not appear at his death. These are thought to be lost, but there can be no doubt of their works are characterised by a "quiet majesty of style; and more, all, by the deep awe with which they are approached." He introduces classical sketches into the body of his work, the manipulation of which he shows great skill, and his earlier works are not wanting in a humorous touch that bespeaks the kindliness of his heart as well as the wit of the controversialist. Controversious is indeed the term by which his style of himself may be best described. He was brought up in a Puritan atmosphere, and imbued with a sincere dread of what he considered the errors of Rome, he could not but be sensible of the mistakes of Puritanism, and the Catholic opinions and practices which were associated with Romanism refused to throw away the true Catholicism because it had been tainted with the alloy of superstition, nor was he able to overcome his own prejudices. He was right.

Walton is one of the English Bishops. Bishopsbourne is still shown the place where he died, and round the garden of the parsonage is a yew hedge said to have been planted. In the church called, according to the custom "Master Richard Hooker." A monument was set up a few years ago, when Dean Stanley preached one of his sermons.

JOHN, Bishop of Gloucester, one of the first in Queen Mary's reign, died in Somersetshire about 1495, and was buried at Oxford. Here he was converted to the faith of Luther, and in 1540, being apprehended on this account, he fled in disguise first to Ireland and thence to France, where he became acquainted with Erasmus, the pupil and successor of Desiderius Erasmus. On the accession of Edward VI. to the throne of England in 1547, and in 1550 he was Bishop of Gloucester, but for some time he refused to become Archbishop of Canterbury, Bishop of London, refused to do so, as he would not conform to the ceremonial, and he was even sent to the Tower for refusing those who used vestments to be "heretics." But at length, on the request of the king's intercession with Cranmer, he desired him to dispense with the ceremonial, as ceremonies, he yielded, the consequence, and he was settled in his bishopric of Worcester was commended, its Bishop, Heath, being then a prisoner in the Fleet. He preached often, visited his diocese, was hospitable to the poor, and much beloved. As soon as Mary came to the throne, he was sent for to London and committed to the Fleet, where he remained some months, was at length examined several times, and called on to recant his opinions in favour of clerical marriage and of divorce, and against the Mass. Refusing to do so, he was condemned to be burnt, and accordingly conducted back to Gloucester, where he suffered with great courage, on Feb. 9th, 1555. His works have been published both by the Parker Society and also by the Religious Tract Society.

Hopkins, JOHN HENRY, D.D. [b. 1792, d. 1868], Bishop of Vermont, in the United States. He was a zealous High Churchman, and the leader of that party in the American Church, as Bishop McIlvaine was of the Low Church. He is the author of Refutation of Milner's "End of Controversy," letters written to the Roman Catholic Archbishop of Baltimore. It is a work not known in England as much as it deserves to be, for it has great merit. Bishop Hopkins was the presiding Bishop of the American Church at the time of the Pan-Anglican Synod which met at Lambeth in 1867, and he took a leading part in its discussions.

Horne, GEORGE, D.D., Bishop of Norwich [b. at Otham, near Maidstone, 1731; d. 1792].—He gained a scholarship at University College, Oxford, took his B.A. in 1749, and in the following year was chosen Fellow of Magdalen College. He took his M.A. in 1752, and was ordained the next year. He had great powers of preaching, being eagerly listened to, and his sermons are still largely read. In 1758 he was made Junior Proctor of the University, in 1768 President of Magdalen College, 1771 Chaplain-in-Ordinary to the King, 1776 Vice-Chancellor of the University, 1781 Dean of Canterbury, 1791 Bishop of Norwich. In 1760 he entered into a controversy with Dr. Kennicott on the Text of the Hebrew Bible, which the latter wished to collate with a view to a new English version. Horne opposed this on the ground that sceptics and heretics, who were ever busy in finding imaginary corruptions in the Text of Scripture, would be yet more emboldened to cavil and criticise. Horne belonged to the sect of the HUTCHINSONIANS [q.v.]. In 1776 he published a Commentary on the Psalms, a work which had been under his consideration for twenty years. His plan was to give—[1] An analysis of the Psalm, by way of argument; [2] a paraphrase on each verse; [3] the substance digested into a prayer. The style is accomplished, and shows great vigour of mind. His Letters on Infidelity were written to confute David Hume. His Works were edited and his Life written by Jones of Nayland.

Horne, THOMAS HARTWELL, D.D. [1780–1862], received his education at Christ's Hospital, and then became a barrister's clerk. He took Holy Orders in 1819, and for several years was Assistant Librarian at the British Museum. By Archbishop Howley he was ordained, and became a Prebendary of St. Paul's in 1831, and two years later Rector of St. Edmund the King and St. Nicholas Acons, in Lombard Street. His literary talent was great, and he is to be specially remembered as the author of An Introduction to the Critical Study and Knowledge of the Holy Scriptures, a very valuable work, which helped greatly to further the study of the Bible in its day, but has now been superseded by such works as Kitto's and Smith's Cyclopædias, and the Biblical works of Dean Stanley. The Bibliographical Appendix is particularly useful.

Horsley, SAMUEL, an English bishop, was born in London in 1733, and educated at Westminster, and Trinity College, Cambridge. In 1758 he became curate to his father at Newington Butts, and soon after succeeded to the rectory, which he held, together with other preferments, for thirty-four years. In 1767 he became a Fellow of the Royal Society, to which body he was made secretary in 1773. He wrote many scientific books, and brought out, in 1776, a complete edition of Sir Isaac Newton's works. In 1781 he was appointed Archdeacon of St. Albans. A few years before he had started a controversy with Dr. Priestley, attacking his History of the Corruptions of Christianity, and renewed the contest in a Charge delivered in 1783. Dr. Priestley replied, which led to a rejoinder from Dr. Horsley, in Seventeen Letters to Dr. Priestley, which gained for him a great reputation. He was presented with a prebendal stall in Gloucester, and in 1788 he was made Bishop of St. David's. He was translated to Rochester in 1793, and to St. Asaph in 1803. He died in 1806. He was reckoned the most brilliant preacher of his day. Dr. Houghton describes a remarkable scene, on the occasion of his preaching on the 30th of January ("King Charles the Martyr"), 1793, nine days after the death of Louis XVI., in which, after an impassioned description of the scenes through which that hapless King had passed, he went on to say that his own country had set the frightful example, and the whole congregation sprang to their feet in uncontrollable emotion.

Among his religious works we may mention a Commentary on Hosea, Psalms Translated from the Hebrew, Biblical Criticism of Fourteen Historical Books of the Old Testament, and several sermons.

Hosanna.—A Hebrew word signifying "Save now," or "Save, I beseech thee." The Jews call the feast of Tabernacles "Hosanna Rabba," or the "Great Hosanna," because they pray for the forgiveness of all the sins of the people on that day. The branches used at the feast are also

Hospital.—A place where the poor are entertained and supported. In the early days of Christianity the bishop had the care of the poor, and directed the provision for widows, strangers, orphans, and the like. Afterwards, when the Church had its own revenues, a fourth part was assigned to the poor, and houses, now called hospitals, were built on purpose to receive them. In the early times the deacons had the management of the hospitals, and the government of the place, but afterwards they rendered an account of their trust to the bishop. The founders of some of these hospitals gave the government of them to monks, and exempted them from the jurisdiction of their bishops, and thus, as the force of discipline decayed, and discipline was relaxed, the clergy who had the government of the hospitals converted them into benevolence, and rendered no account to their diocesan, the greater part of the income for their own use, so that the design of the foundation was defeated. For this reason the Council of Vienne forbade the giving of hospitals, and the title of benefices to secular clergymen, and decreed that the management of them should be put in the hands of trustworthy persons, who should be bound to render an account to their respective Ordinaries; but the clause protecting the rights of the founders of the Orders and other hospitallers. This was confirmed by the Council of Trent.

The first complete hospital of which we have any record was built by Basil the Great, near Antioch, mostly for lepers. St. Chrysostom speaks much on the maintenance of a hospital. In Constantinople, and it is evident that in the middle of the fifth century there was a well-organised system for providing for the poor. One of the so-called Arabic canons provides that the bishop, by virtue of his office, shall institute hospitals. St. Basil at Nola founded a hospital, and St. Jerome at Bethlehem, and his friend Fulgentius at Carthage. According to him, the founder of the first hospital in Rome. Hospitals existed at the time of St. Remi, i.e. the fifth century. The establishment of many of the hospitals in the northern countries of Europe was due to the Irish missionaries, who for a long time were called Hospitalia Scotorum (Scottish hospitals at this time the Irish); they were closely connected with the monasteries.

Hospitaller. [MILITARY ORDER]

Host [Lat. hostia, "a victim"]—a term used by the Roman Catholic Church in the celebration of the Eucharist. It is a small, thin, and of circular form, and has many mystic signs imprinted on it.

Hot Cross Buns.—Buns with a cross of the cross impressed upon them, l in England for breakfast on Good Friday. The buns are said to be derived from the ecclesiastical Eulogise, or consecrated bread, early bestowed as a token of amity, or to those who were hindered from receiving the Host, and which were marked with an H.

Hours, CANONICAL. [CANONICAL HOURS.]

Housel.—An old Saxon name of the Holy Eucharist.

Howe, JOHN [b. 1630, d. 1705].—He was born at Loughborough, in Leicestershire. His father had been instituted to this parish by Archbishop Laud, but was afterwards ejected out by him for siding with the Puritans, and fled to Ireland, taking his son with him. Being driven thence by the Irish Rebellion, they returned to England and settled at Lancaster, where young Howe received his early education. He then went to Christ's College, Cambridge, and having taken his degree, removed to Brasenose, Oxford. He became Fellow of Magdalen College, where the famous Dr. Thomas Goodwin was a student. He was ordained at Winwick by Bishop Herle, in the days of the Presbyterian dominancy. In 1652 he was called to the rectory at Great Torrington, in Devonshire.

His biographer, Edmund Calamy, goes at length into the description of the services he held, one after another, without any relaxation, on the public fast days, "a sort of sermons that few would have gone through with-inexpressible weariness to themselves and to their auditories." While on a visit to London, Cromwell went one day as a hearer to Whitehall Chapel; Cromwell, whose eyes were everywhere, first noticed him on account of his extraordinary dress, and then discerning something more than ordinary in his face, sent a messenger desiring him to remain and speak with him after the service. Cromwell then desired him to preach before him the following Sunday; Howe pleaded as an excuse the inconvenience which his absence would occasion his family; but Cromwell would take no denial, and after hearing him preach three or four sermons, insisted, much against Howe's inclination, that he should become his domestic chaplain. He was also made Lecturer of St. Margaret's, Westminster, and there was no man who was in an eminent ecclesiastical station in those critical times, and who admitted to the knowledge of so many changes which afterwards succeeded. He was very generous towards those whose religious opinions differed from his own, especially towards Dr. Seth Ward, afterwards Bishop of Exeter, and the celebrated Dr. Thomas Fuller. After the Restoration he returned to Torrington, where under the Act of Uniformity had to give up his post. The Bishop of Exeter pressed him to be re-ordained, but he would not. In 1671 he became domestic chaplain to Lord Massereene in Ireland, where his great learning and Christian temper procured him the friendship of the Bishop of Antrim, who allowed him to preach, without demanding any conformity, in the Public church every Sunday afternoon. In 1675 he was called to minister to a Dissenting congregation in Silver Street, London. In 1685 the prospects of the Dissenters being most gloomy, Howe accepted an invitation to travel with Lord Wharton, and after a time he settled himself with his family in Utrecht; here he was visited by Gilbert Burnet, afterwards Bishop of Salisbury, and he was honoured with several interviews with William, Prince of Orange. In 1687 he was induced by the "Declaration of Liberty of Conscience" to return to England, and at the Revolution in the following year, he, with other Dissenting ministers, brought an address to the Throne, which was most graciously received. Howe took warm interest in the debates which arose among the Dissenting ministers after the Revolution, especially in the controversies upon the doctrine of the Trinity, and about Occasional Conformity. He died April 2nd, 1705, and was buried in Allhallows Church, Bread Street. His published works are very numerous; the greatest is The Good Man the Living Temple of God. His Life was written and his Complete Works published in 1724 by Calamy.

Howley, WILLIAM, D.D., Archbishop of Canterbury [b. 1765, d. 1848], the son of the vicar of Ropley, Hants, was educated at Winchester and Oxford. He became Regius Professor of Divinity at Oxford in 1809, and in 1813 Bishop of London. Next year he published his first charge, in which he spoke strongly against the Unitarians, and was angrily answered by Belsham, who accused him of "enforcing the slavish doctrines of Popery rather than the free and inquiring spirit of Protestantism." His reply was calm and moderate, and the more telling on that account. "The first duty of a Christian," he said, "is to approach the oracles of Divine truth with humble docility, with prostration of the intellect and the will." In 1828 he was nominated by the Duke of Wellington, who was then Prime Minister, to the Primacy, and proved his independence by opposing the Duke on Roman Catholic Emancipation. He afterwards opposed Parliamentary Reform. He was a faltering and hesitating speaker, and, moreover, wrote very little, yet his primacy was an important one. He was a good scholar, and, moreover, a good administrator, and is said to have largely influenced the Court against lax notions of Sunday observance. He was most careful to support the dignity of his office with the outward signs of it, and exercised a hospitality which probably has never been surpassed. Like the munificent prelates of old, he was a great builder. His palaces at Fulham, Lambeth, and Addington were enlarged by him, and great portions rebuilt; so were several parish churches. But better even than these things was his method of distributing the vast patronage which then belonged to his See. He surrounded himself in a way that few of his predecessors had done with the ablest and most learned theologians, men like Hugh J. Rose, John Lonsdale, Drs. Mill and Molesworth, Hartwell Horne. Though a strong Conservative, he co-operated with the Whig Government in the foundation of the Ecclesiastical Commission. In his primacy the Oxford movement began, and all the Tracts for the Times were published; he watched the progress of the movement keenly, and one of his chaplains, Rose, was one of the early writers. But his calm judgment co-operated with the timidity engendered by age, and he took little part in the controversies which arose. Towards the end of his life, however, he issued a pastoral intended as an Eirenicon.

Howson, JOHN SAUL, Dean of Chester [b. 1816, d. 1886]. He was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, where he took a double first-class as B.A. in 1837; M.A. in 1841, and D.D. in 1861. He took Orders in 1845, and in 1849 became Principal of the Liverpool College. In 1866 he was appointed vicar of Wisbech, and in the following year Dean of Chester, which post he held till his death. He was the author of many books, among them The Life and Epistles of St. Paul, which he wrote in conjunction with the Rev. W. J. Conybeare; Hulsean Lectures for 1862; Scenes from the Life of St. Paul; Metaphors of St. Paul; Companions of St. Paul, etc. He edited the Horæ Paulinæ, and was a contributor to Smith's Dictionary of the Bible and The Speaker's Commentary. One of his best books came out the very week of his death, a work on the Collects, Epistles, and Gospels. But probably the work for which he will be most remembered hereafter will be his energetic and successful exertions in establishing the Order of Deaconesses in England. [DEACONESSSES.]

Hubert, Sr., made Bishop of Maestricht in 708, transferred the See to Liège in 721. He afterwards went as a missionary into the forest of Ardennes, where he made many converts. He died in 727. In the eleventh century prayers were particularly addressed to St. Hubert against madness. He is commemorated on Nov. 3rd. Roman Catholic writers say that in his youth he had a great passion for hunting, which caused him to neglect Divine Service, and that he was converted by the appearance in the forest of a stag bearing a crucifix between his horns, and warning him to escape eternal damnation.

Hubert Fitz-Walter, Archbishop of Canterbury from 1193—1207, was born at West Dereham, in Norfolk, in the century. His first considerable post was the Deanery of York, from which he was promoted to the Bishopric of Salisbury the first year of Richard I., who took him with him to the Holy Land, made him executor, and, upon the death of Anselm Baldwin, gave him the direction of the campaign. The King being taken prisoner, Duke of Austria, Queen Anne procured election of Hubert to the See of Canterbury then vacant by the death of Richard Jocelyn, and Hubert, in return, raised marks for the King's ransom, upon the payment of which King Richard returned to England. In 1194, Hubert being furnished with power, had the whole administration of spiritual and temporal affairs, in which, for, besides his archiepiscopal jurisdiction, he was Lord Chancellor and Chief Justice of England. Never (as the old historians report) have these posts been better filled by Hubert Fitz-Walter, for he was distinguished by capacity, temper, and piety, and knew how to please the King without disobliging the people. He was likewise sufficiently firm with spirit to terrify evil men, and to suppress faction and sedition. His suppression of riots raised by Longbeard was an evidence of his ability; another was shown in covering and defeating the conspiracy of Earl John against his brother Richard. Upon King John's coming to the continent, Hubert was at first under disfavour, but, perceiving that he had great credit for Hubert's advice and interest, he committed him to favour, and put the administration of the kingdom into his hands when he was going into Normandy. Hubert died in the manor of Teynham in 1207.

Hugh, Sr. [b. 1140, d. 1200], Abbot of Lincoln. He was born at Avignon, in the diocese of Grenoble, and at an early age entered the priory of Regular Canons. At the age of eighteen he was ordained deacon, and, years later entered the Grande Chartreuse, in Grenoble, and here, after ten years as a Carthusian monk, he gained the office of Procurator. Henry II. of England, when founding a monastery at Winton, in Somersetshire (the first Carthusian in this country), having heard of the fame of Hugh, with difficulty induced him to leave the monastery and become its Prior. In 1155, against his will, he was made Bishop of Lincoln, and he then set himself with earnestness and energy to the discharge of his station. The year before his consecration the Lincoln Cathedral had been destroyed by an earthquake, and Hugh rebuilt a greater and more magnificent one. There was never a more indefatigable prelate; he is famous for his piety, industry, and munificence. He died at Lincoln, and was buried at Lincoln Cathedral in a shrine behind the high altar.

England and Scotland (John met at his funeral, and there were archbishops, nine bishops, and cardinals present. He was canonized as St. Victor in 1220.

Amiens.—So called from his having entered the monastery of Amiens, and at one time came to be made Abbot of Reading; he became Archbishop of Rouen, in 1164. He made a great figure and wrote three books, Contra the way of pastoral instruction and clergy against the heterodoxies

St. Victor.—A famous regular and Prior of St. Victor.

He was born near Ypres, in the province of Saxony as his birthplace. He was called "St. Augustine." He was very much like Bernard of Clairvaux; indeed, it is said that this latter learned the substance of his mystical speculations. He died in 1142, aged forty-four.

Huguenots.—The name given to the Protestants in France in the sixteenth century. The word is supposed to have been derived from the German Eidgenossen, which signifies "fellow-citizens." When first it was used in France it had the form of Hugon, which was changed later into that of Huguenot. The Huguenots first became conspicuous in the reign of Henry II., when they were established for them in France. Inquisition to their party of Calvinism, who afterwards became more numerous, gave them fresh influence; but at the same time, the Cardinal of Lorraine persecuted them with which to root them out of the country. The Pope issued a bull against them as heretics; but so powerful had they become that they dared to refuse to obey.

Henry was very angry, and severe measures tried to carry out his orders. The Huguenots, in order to get help to the Protestants and thus began that long, fierce struggle, of terrible persecution on the one hand and self-defence on the other, which desolated France, and had a share in the Massacre of St. Bartholomew in 1572. With the accession of Henry IV. the publication of the Edict of Nantes, however, the fortunes of the Protestants were reversed. Though terribly lessened in number, they rallied again under the leadership of the Huguenots at the Court. But in 1619, in the reign of Louis XIII., quarrels arose between the Huguenots and the Catholics. The former were expelled from Béarn, and the Protestants of Béarn, oppressed and deprived of political rights, and, as punishment, the Catholic party besieged the town of Rochelle, which in the last reign had been granted, with some others, to the Protestants. The Catholics were defeated, and were obliged to sign the Peace of Montpellier in 1622, in which the Edict of Nantes was confirmed, and the Protestants were allowed to assemble in religious, but not political, meetings. As on previous occasions, however, these engagements were practically ignored by the Catholic monarch. The head of the Catholic party at this time was Du Plessis, who soon after obtained a cardinal's hat and took the name of Richelieu. From that time he proved a most powerful enemy to the Huguenots, and in 1627 planned a siege of Rochelle, still the Huguenot stronghold. James I. sent a small army to their aid, under the Duke of Buckingham; but it returned without accomplishing anything. In 1628 Richelieu laid siege to Rochelle, and another expedition was on the point of leaving England when the Duke of Buckingham, commander of the troops, was assassinated at Portsmouth. They went across the Channel, fired a few ineffectual shots, and returned. At the end of a year the town yielded, on account of the ravages that famine had made among the inhabitants and defenders. In 1629 De Rohan, the head of the Huguenot party, who had led and governed them with great wisdom, was forced to yield, and from that time they ceased to have any military or political power in the State. To the end of the reign of Louis XIII., and through much of that of Louis XIV., they were allowed considerable liberty of conscience, and were accordingly peaceable and submissive to the Government. But Louis XIV. from the beginning of his reign regarded them with dislike, and towards the end of his reign attempted their final and total suppression. Their clergy were forbidden to wear the ecclesiastical habit, or to attend the sick; their professors were not allowed to teach either philosophy or languages; and in 1685, by command of the King, the Edict of Nantes was revoked. This act proved the death-blow of the Huguenots in France. Vast numbers of them, probably nearly a million, including some of the most industrious and skilful of the population, left the country, many settling in London. [NANTES, EDICT OF.] The rest worshipped in lonely places, but they were subject to the most frightful persecutions, and capture exposed their ministers to the fate of being broken on the wheel. In 1787 an Edict of Toleration allowed the registry of Protestant births, marriages, and deaths, and forbade the disturbance of their worship. But the mischief had been done, and it is the opinion of all the best historians that France has never recovered, in national character and other ways, the loss of so many of the most serious, devout, and industrious of her citizens. In 1802 the Reformed Church was recognised by law.

Hulsean Professor and Lecturer. THE.—The Rev. John Hulse, a graduate of St. John's College, Cambridge, who died in 1789, left by will, in trust for that university, a considerable property in Cheshire, which at the present time yields an income of about £1,000 a year. The original distribution, since considerably modified, was fourfold, and ran as follows:—[1] for two scholarships at his own college; [2] for a dissertation prize (now abolished); [3] for founding and supporting the office, once called that of Christian Advocate, but in 1860 altered to Hulsean Professor, who now receives eight-tenths of the whole income; and [4] for founding and supporting a similar office with a similar name, viz. Christian Preacher. This also has been altered into the Hulsean Lecturer, who has to deliver and publish not less than four sermons, nor more than six, during his year of office, upon Christian evidences, or some difficulty of Holy Scripture.

Humanitarians.—Those who acknowledge only the humanity of Christ, and deny His Divinity. This view of the nature of Christ is held by the modern school of Socinians in England.

Humanity, RELIGION OF. [POSITIVISM.]

Hume, DAVID [b. 1711, d. 1776], philosopher and historian, received his education in his native town of Edinburgh, and was intended for the law, but found it uncongenial to his tastes, as he had from earliest childhood conceived a passion for literature. He was then sent to a mercantile house in Bristol, but this he also disliked, and in 1734 he went over to France for three years, and here he began his literary career by writing his Treatise of Human Nature, published in London in 1738. This was a failure, but his Essays, the first portion of which was published in 1742, were favourably received. In 1747 he accompanied General St. Clair, as secretary, in an expedition to the coast of France, and in the next year in an embassy to Vienna and Turin. On his return to Scotland he published his Political Discourses and Enquiry concerning the Principles of Morals. He became manager of the Advocates' Library, which gave him an excellent opportunity of consulting books for his History of England. The first volume, containing the reigns of James I. and Charles I., appeared in 1754; and the second, bringing the work down to the Revolution, followed. Then he went backwards through the Tudor period, and completed the work from the Roman period downwards in 1762. In 1763 he went to France as secretary to Lord Hertford's Embassy, and became acquainted with the Parisian wits and scholars. On his return home, in 1766, he became Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department. In 1775

his health began to fail, and he that his disorder must end, he made his will, and wrote My dignified farewell to the world fixed to his History of England. A clear thinker, basing all his upon what he called the "method," testing everything, knew how, by facts. In the first Enquiry he condemns excessive but in the third part he adopts "mitigated scepticism," on the human understanding is limited city, and therefore we are not establishing conclusions on bases which common life. In thus conceiving and the limitations of philosophy himself the disciple of Locke. As Professor Huxley remarks, he is an agonist of what is now called His history is throughout a plea for plutism, and in this, again, he shows the disciple of Voltaire. That made it his aim to pour ridicule on chivalry and enthusiasm. The love and love of freedom which filled was an offence to him, and he wantonly slandered her memory; to compensate for this, he transferred the national admiration of great men to glorifying Louis XIV. Hume wrote his history in the same spirit. As a key-word is Utility. He writes and clearly always, but never does he come upon questions that transcend worldliness on which his spirit he tosses them away with contempt at the trouble and thought which demands, and turns away to He was so fond of France that often thought of settling there is this predilection which explains his attitude. Hume was a man lover of light literature, impatient of perplexing questions, anxious for a form on which philosophy might rest with easy, polite life and without belief in any interference with affairs of men was an obstacle to such a scheme, and he therefore sought to get rid of it. There is no deeper reason or feeling—what lies at the root of much of our to-day—in Hume's Agnosticism.

Humeral Veil.—An altar cloth of the same material as the vestments, worn by the hands of the acolyte between the offertory and the consecration (as he may not touch it with his hands). The Roman Catholic servile veil is also worn by the priest at the benediction of the sacrament, and by the priests and deacons with the sacrament from one place to another in procession.

He went to the vicarage of St. Martin's in 1855, and held it till his reputation as a theologian was chief publications are:—Commentaries, Hulsean and Boyle Lectures, Theophilus of Antioch and Theology of St. Matthew, a Commentary on the New Testament. S, GILES [b. at Winnenden, in 1550; d. at Wittenburg in 1602] one of the most eminent divines of the Wittenburg Confession. His reputation as a party was so great that when only 25 years old he was made Professor of Theology at Marburg. In 1584 he printed a treatise for the Calvinists, and gained so much credit for it, that in 1592 he was sent by the Elector to reform that electorate, and made Divinity Professor at Wittenburg. He was a member of their ecclesiastical consistory. He was ever on the watch to cover those who did not exactly conform to the terms of the Lutheran company person who refused to sign the Formula of Concord. He was called him by Hunnius and his colleagues reckoned a Calvinist, and had shown him. In 1595 Hunnius was Superintendent of the Church at Wittenburg in which year he had a great dispute with Huber about Election and Predestination.

He was likewise one of the chief opponents of the Jesuits at the conference at Altona in 1602. He wrote many works, De Judaizans, De Persona Christi, gdon, SELINA, COUNTESS OF, one of the springs of the Methodist movement in the last century, was the daughter of John Ferrers, being born in 1707. When young she became the wife of the 9th Earl of Huntingdon. The influence of her husband took place in 1746, and combined with the influence of the preachers under which she was soon disposed to have put the finishing resolution that had gradually grown up in her, to devote herself and to the furtherance of that work. Thenceforward she gradually rose from the gaieties and frivolities of fashionable society, and gathered around her at her various houses and chapels at Chelsea, Bath, and elsewhere, the most intellectual and distinguished men and women of the day, among whom such names as Lord Bolingbroke, Lord Chesterfield, and Horace Walpole may be mentioned. From 1748 onwards she had the support and help in this great but not always successful work, of that moving preacher, George Whitfield, who accepted her chaplain's scarf. It was her custom to set up chapels under her own direct patronage and management in various parts of the kingdom, and she stretched her right as a peeress of the realm to multiply the number of her chaplains far beyond the proper limit, in order to keep these places of worship supplied with ministers. In this way there sprang up what is still known as Lady Huntingdon's Connexion. In 1768 she still further organised this movement by establishing at her own expense a seminary for the training of young men for the ministry at Trevecca, in Breconshire, where a gentleman of like views with herself, named Howell Harris, had some years before set up what he called a "family of love," which proceeded on the Apostolic principle of community of goods; and here she spent the most of her remaining days. It was not till 1781 that the "Connexion" was finally cut adrift from its moorings under the shelter of the Established Church. Then at last a dispute about the status of her chapels and her chaplains compelled her to take refuge under the Toleration Act, and accept the privileges, if not the name, of Dissent—a step which, though inevitable, was much against her inclination. She continued to feel the strongest attachment to the Church of England, and, indeed, to the present day it is often difficult to detect in the dress of the ministers or in the services any divergence from those of an ordinary Evangelical Church congregation. In 1791 Lady Huntingdon ended her pious and active, though rather imperious, career, amid general sorrow. Her chapels and the College were left in charge of trustees. This latter was almost immediately removed to Cheshunt, in Hertfordshire, where it is still in existence, though the college at Trevecca has since been revived by the Welsh Calvinistic Methodist Connexion in Howell Harris's old house. Many of her chapels have since wholly adopted the Congregational system, and even those that retain her name are maintained on Congregational principles.

Huntington, WILLIAM, a wonderfully popular preacher in his day, the leader of an Antinomian sect, was born in 1744, in the Weald of Kent, between Goudhurst and Cranbrook. He was the son of Barnabas Russel by the wife of a day-labourer named Hunt. He was sent to school by Russel, and then was adopted by Hunt, whose name he bore. He became a servant at Battle Abbey and at

Frittenden, where he seduced a tradesman's daughter; and he changed his name to Huntington that he might elude inquiry after him. Somewhat later he added the initials "S.S.," or "Sinner Saved," after his name. He married and settled at Mortlake, and began to attend church. He gives an account of several visions which he saw at this time, in which he was told that he was saved, and all his temptations and sins left him. He now perceived, as he says, that church services were a mockery, and began to preach, and, according to his own account, found fish dead in his master's pond and partridges in the garden, which enabled him to live well. On his dismissal he moved to Thames Ditton, where he gained his living by carrying coals and preaching, and so gained the name of the "Preaching Coalheaver." At last he determined to give up all employment and live by preaching alone. He at first encountered a little opposition, of which he gives an account in the Naked Bee of God, stating that all his enemies were punished by breaking their legs, losing their wits, etc. In another treatise, God the Guardian of the Poor, and The Bank of Faith, he relates how when he wanted any of the necessities of life they were always most opportunely brought him. One day the fact of his having left a child to the parish at Cranbrook became known, but he satisfied his followers by stating that many good men—as Abraham, David, St. Paul, etc.—had sinned, and yet were received of God. At last he resolved to come to London, and soon after built Providence Chapel, all the funds and sittings for which were given by his followers. He then gave up all the arts which he had before used to draw money from his flock, feeling that his pew-rents were enough to live handsomely on. He was attacked by Rowland Hill and also by Timothy Priestley, a zealous Calvinist, who opposed Antinomianism in a treatise called The Christian's Looking-glass, or the Timorous Soul's Guide, to which Huntington responded by The Barber, or Timothy Priestley Shaved, as Reflected from his own Looking-glass, which was full of coarse, bold invective. On the death of his wife Huntington married Lady Haunderson, the widow of a Lord Mayor, and rode about in a carriage, though he had formerly mocked at bishops for doing so. He died at Tunbridge Wells in 1813. His epitaph, which he wrote himself, ran thus:—

Here lies the Coalheaver
Beloved of his God, but abhorred of men.
The Omniscient Judge
At the Grand Assize shall ratify and Confirm this to the Confusion of many thousands;
For England and its Metropolis shall know
That there hath been a prophet
Among them.

Huntington's works were published in 20 vols. That he was a worthless rascal is clear from the details we have given, but that he had also a large command of English is equally plain. A very easy upon him by Southey will be the Quarterly Review, vol. xxiv.

Mupfeld, HERMANN, a great scholar on the Old Testament, was born at Marburg in 1796, and was appointed Professor of Theology there in 1824. He remained there for eighteen years, and then succeeded Gieseler at Halle, where he died in 1861. Though not belonging to the strictly orthodox school of Hengstenberg, he was pious and reverent in his treatment of the Bible, and his funeral oration was preached by Tholke. His chief work is a commentary on the Psalms, and he also wrote on the sources of Genesis, which he regarded as the work of an original Elohist, edited and added to by a Jehovist editor.

Hurd, RICHARD, D.D., an English bishop, was born in Staffordshire in 1720, and died in 1808. He became Fellow of Emmanuel College, Cambridge, and lived there till 1767, when he was presented to the rectory of Thropton, in Leicestershire. In 1768 he was made Preacher of Lincoln's Inn, and in 1770 Archdeacon of Gloucester, by his friend Bishop Warburton. Hurd is best known through his connection with Warburton, whose Life he wrote as an introduction to an edition of his works. He was, however, a very polished scholar. In 1776 he was made Bishop of Lichfield, and in 1781 translated to Worcester. The Archbishopric of Canterbury was offered to him in 1783, but he declined it.

HUMM, JOHN (A. 1373, d. 1415)—His surname came from his native village Hummets, and was also the alias of jean, which caused frequent puns to be made on his name. He was the child of poverty, but his good nature and intelligence gained for him the favour of the monks in an adjoining monastery, and by their advice his mother, who had been early left a widow, resolved to make an effort to bring him up to the Church. In this she had the aid of the feudal lord of the village, Nicholas of Hummets, who gave him his education. Very scanty details have been preserved of his college life in the then brilliant University of Prague, in 1391 he became Dean of the Faculty of Theology. In 1400 he was chosen Preacher at the University Chapel of Bethlehem, which had been endowed by two liberal Bohemians for the preaching of the Gospel in their native tongue. Humm embraced the opinions of Wycliffe, and proceeded to preach so plainly against the abuses of the Church that the clergy, headed by the Archbishop of Prague, appealed to King Wenceslaus to silence him. The King was too indolent to interfere, and, besides this, Humm had a friend in Sophia, the King's cousin.

dangerous a journey, and delegates were ap-pointed to try the matter in Prague. Huss's agents were imprisoned, and in due time he was excommunicated, and the city of Prague laid under an interdict, which was to continue so long as he remained there. The perse-cution of Huss had now begun in earnest. Frequent tumults occurred in the streets between his partisans and those who upheld Papal authority, and, being satisfied that the cause of peace required his departure, he at length retired to his native village, and placed himself under the protection of its feudal lord. Then we find him preaching from village to village, and sparing neither Pope nor Cardinal. At length, on the death of Sbinko, he returned to Prague; his followers were falsely charged with having poisoned the Archbishop, which of course aggravated the hostilities between the parties. Huss next publicly opposed a Bull of Pope John, which had excommunicated Ladislaus of Hungary (one of the claimants to the throne of Naples), and called on all Christians to join a crusade against him. Huss refused, and then pro-ceeded to attack indulgences, and to say that if the Pope abused his power, it became a duty to resist him. With the people Huss lost nothing by this declaration of disobedience, but his interest at Court was considerably damaged. Wenceslaus happened to be just then on ill terms with Ladislaus, and was willing to be backed by the power of Rome. The magistrates anxious to secure public peace, the clergy with a budget of old griev-ances against him, and even the heads of the University, took part with the Court. Huss next appointed a public discussion of two theses on the crusade, and on June 7th, 1412, a great concourse assembled, and a stormy scene followed. Huss's conduct is said to have been marked with moderation, but his friend Jerome was more violent; a furious tumult arose, and some of the Hussites having interfered with the Papal preachers, were imprisoned and put to death. Huss was absent from the city at the time of the exe-cution, but the tragic affair produced the greatest excitement in Bohemia, and from this time Huss's attacks on the Popes and priests increased in violence; the kingdom became more than ever impregnated with his doc-trines, and the opposition of the clergy grew more obstinate. Huss once more withdrew to the country, and while in retirement wrote his work on The Church, which is an epitome of his peculiar views and doctrines.

At this time the meeting of the Council of Constance drew nigh, and Huss was sum-moned to appear before it. The object of this Council was to accomplish what the Council of Pisa had failed to do—the extinction of the schism and the reform of the clergy; but it was also bent on the suppression of heresy, and the alleged heresies of Huss were bruited all over Europe, and so it was deemed necessary that he should be summoned to answer for them. Huss was confined to bed by illness when the summons came, but he rose at once, full of joy at the prospect; and it seems afterwards from his letters that he was fully alive to the possible dangers which his friends immediately foresaw for him. In October, 1414, he took leave of his flock, having received from Wenceslaus a safe-conduct through his dominions; on his way he was met by a safe-conduct also from the Emperor Sigismund. The journey occupied twenty-three days, and was made on horseback, and in his progress he delivered addresses in Latin or German in the towns through which he passed. Arrived at Constance, Huss and his friends took up their abode in the great square near the Pope's residence, at the house of a widow named Fida, who is compared by Huss to the widow of Sarepta. For nearly a month he seems to have been unmolested, and then was summoned before the Pope and Cardinals. By them he was given over to a band of soldiers and placed in confinement near the Cathedral. His friend, John de Chlum, who had accompanied him, hurried off to Sigismund to tell him how his safe-conduct had been violated, and he sent orders to have Huss liberated on the instant; but the order was disobeyed, and instead he was removed on Dec. 5th to a damp vault in the prison of the Dominican monastery. From here he wrote from time to time to his friends in Bohemia, but at length his health gave way; and then the Pope sent commissioners to the prison to examine him on the charges brought against him by his enemies, and he was not allowed to employ any advocate in his defence. He was next removed to the Franciscan prison. His letters at this time are full of sweet resignation, abiding affection, and heroic firmness. His enemies succeeded in convincing Sigismund that he need not keep faith with a heretic, and absolved him from his promise of a safe-conduct. The Pope meantime had fled, and in March, 1415, his officers gave up the custody of Huss, and he was transferred to the Castle of Gottleben, on the Rhine, and placed in chains. His friend Jerome imprudently ventured to Constance, and he also was arrested and thrown into prison. The 5th of June was appointed for the public examination of Huss, though not till after an attempt had been made to get him condemned without a hearing. He was brought back to Constance, his books were shown him and acknowledged to be his; the reading of articles against him was commenced, and when he began to reply, his voice was drowned by an uproar. An attempt was made to induce him to confess and abjure his errors, and to swear never to teach them; but this he refused, and he was remanded to prison. On June 24th it was resolved to burn his books, in the hope of thus inducing him to yield; but it produced no effect. Feeling that his condemnation might come at any moment, Huss employed his time in writing letters of affectionate farewell and exhortation to his friends. On July 6th, the day he completed his forty-second year, he was condemned and burned at the stake. The ceremony of his degradation from the priesthood was first gone through; on his way to the stake he recited some of the Penitential Psalms, and prayed for the pardon of his enemies. Three times while the flames encircled him he was heard to exclaim, "Jesus, Son of the living God, have pity on me!" His ashes were thrown into the Rhine. Jerome of Prague suffered not long after his master, and the two martyrs became saints in the eyes of their countrymen. Their death created a revolt in Bohemia, the Hussites beginning a furious war against the Roman Catholics. Their leader, the terrible one-eyed Ziska, got possession of Prague, and Sigismund, who had succeeded his brother Wenceslaus, was forced to make them some religious concessions. Ziska died, but the war was carried on till the convocation of the Council of Basel, in 1431. More concessions followed, and the Emperor at last agreed to tolerate the Hussite priests. Peace was established in 1437. The Hussites are now merged in the Moravians, Calvinists, and Lutherans. [BOHEMIA].

Hutchinsonians.—A school of English divines early in the eighteenth century, who took their name from John Hutchinson, a layman [b. in Yorkshire, 1654], who held peculiar philosophical and philological opinions. In 1724 he published the first part of his book called Moses's Principia, in which he attacked the doctrine of gravitation established in Newton's Principia. In 1727 he published the second part, containing the principles of his Scripture philosophy. The substance of the Hutchinsonian theory is that all our ideas of divinity are formed from the ideas in nature, that nature is a standing picture, and Scripture an application of the several parts of the picture to draw out the great things of God in order to reform our mental conceptions. To prove this they quote Rom. i. 20 and Pa. lxxxix. 1. We cannot have any idea of invisible things till they are pointed out to us by revelation, and for this reason Scripture is found to have a language of its own, which does not consist in words, but of signs or figures taken from visible things. Of the great mystery of the Trinity, the Hutchinsonians say that the created substance of the air, or heaven, is a threefold agency of fire, light, and spirit, the enigma of the one Essence or one Jehovah in three Persons. The unity of essence is exhibited by its unity of substance; the triunity of conditions, fire, light, and spirit. In proof of this they quote Deut. iv. 24, Ex. xii. 29, John i. 9, Mal. iv. 2, Matt. ii. 1. The philosophic system of the Hutchinsonians

the Hebrew language, which, in its construction and in concealed truths which lie in a typical sense. Thus of God, Elohim, they concur, indicating a plurality of heads, and its connective verb as indicating the Essence under a plurality of persons was explained of Divine construction, or describe, as far as figures of unity united to the Deity. I have had amongst them men—Bishops Horne and Romaine, etc. Their Archdeacon Sharp.

JOHN VON, famous in the Reformation, was born in Hesse-Cassel, in April, 1504, years old he was placed at Fulda, but, disliking this Erfurt in 1504. For he visited several universities became Doctor of Law at Wurtemberg assassinated his family, which stirred rage, and he issued a series of letters against the tyrant. He translated Valla's treatise on the errors of Constantine." He died at the Diet of Augsburg in 1518, setting up a printing-press, against the Roman clergy. von Sickingen, who was in league with the Elector of the Rhine, failing, Hutten fled and died in the Isle of Uffau, in 1523. His best known work is Obacurorum Virorum.

JOHN [b. 1563, d. 1616].—A lawyer at Wittenberg, the most famous university, a voluminous author, a representative of the old school. Among his works are: De Origine et Progressu Ecclesiarum Augustiniana, Rudolpho Haeffolio [Wittenberg, 1614]; Concordia; Collegium Confessionis Augustanae, et Synodus et non fucata concilianda, na; Sadeel Elenchomennus, o Majestate humana Natura against the Church of Rome and Calvinism.

distinct from the Hebrew ones, are probably as old as the first. Their use was restricted to public or but to have extended to private purposes also. Hymns may be taken to include anything sung or recited by way of praise to God, whether in a metrical or simply rhythmical shape. The Te Deum, the Gloria in Excelsis, the Gloria Patria, and the Trisagion may be instanced, among others, as specimens which have come down to us, and are still in use, of the earlier non-metrical Christian hymns. Metrical hymns are a later development. This kind seems to have sprung into existence in the East during the fourth century—first in Syria, through the instrumentality of St. Ephraim, and then a little later at Constantinople, under St. Chrysostom. The latter employed them as convenient antidotes to the Arianism which was then rife, thinking that they would impress the orthodox doctrines firmly on the minds of the faithful. Very similar was the reason of their introduction into the Western Churches, first by St. Augustine, and soon afterwards more effectively by St. Ambrose at Milan. Since that time the singing of metrical hymns has always formed a more or less prominent part of Christian worship. A considerable number of hymns by Ambrose and his school are still extant, and, besides him, Hilary of Poitiers, Prudentius, and Mamertus of Vienna, may be mentioned as early hymn-writers. At the Reformation Cranmer seems at one time to have meditated a translation of some of the grand old Latin hymns for the use of the English Church, and in King Henry's Primer [1545] seven hymns appear, one for each of the hours of prayer, in accordance with the ancient custom; but in King Edward's Primer, as also subsequently in the Reformed Prayer Book, they were discarded, with the single exception of the Veni Creator, which is still retained in the Ordinal. The Methodist movement of the eighteenth century was extraordinarily prolific in the production of hymns for both public and private use. It is needless to do more than mention such names as those of Toplady, Wesley, Newton, and Cowper, these two last the joint compilers of the well-known collection of Olney Hymns. Till comparatively recent times, the only substitutes for hymns at all generally recognised in the English Church were two successive metrical versions of the Psalms, one by Sternhold and Hopkins [1562], the other by Tate and Brady [1696], and metrical versions of the Canticles, the Lord's Prayer, the Ten Commandments, etc., which were allowed by Queen Elizabeth [1559]. The religious revival of the nineteenth century has gradually restored the primitive custom, till at the present time the singing of hymns forms one of the most striking features in most services. In the Scotch Presbyterian churches, a quaint and rugged metrical psalter, together with a small collection of versified paraphrases of Holy Scripture, are still the only forms of hymnody countenanced.

From a volume entitled Anglican Hymnology,

by the Rev. James King, we take some interesting facts concerning hymns current in the Anglican Church. He collected 52 representative hymnals in present use in the Church of England, Ritualistic, High, Broad, and Evangelical, and treated these "as a committee, each member of which could give one vote for each hymn which it used." He thus found that Ken's Evening Hymn received 51 suffrages, and heads the list of what he calls "First-class Hymns," as thus judged by popular suffrage. He places all in the first class which are found in thirty hymnals, and finds 105 of such. The first ten in this order of merit are Ken's Evening Hymn, Hark! the herald, Lo He comes, Rock of Ages, Abide with me, Awake my soul, Jerusalem the golden, Jesu, Lover of my soul, Sun of my soul, When I survey. Of second-rank hymns, i.e. those found in 20 hymnals, he finds 110, and of third-rank, found in 15, he reckons also 110. But, as he points out, many of the hymns have not yet arrived at this full popularity simply because they are new and as yet but slightly known, e.g. Day of wrath, O day of mourning, Dr. Irons' magnificent translation of the Dies Ira, which heads the second rank, but was only published in 1848, or I Veary of earth, in the middle of the third rank, not published until 1856. Of the first-rank hymns he found no less than ten to be the work of Charles Wesley, eight by Watts, seven each by Heber and J. M. Neale, four each by Doddridge and Montgomery, three each by Cowper, Grant, Milman, and Tate and Brady. Of the three ranks taken together, Charles Wesley still takes the lead as writer, contributing 22, Watts comes next with 21, and J. M. Neale third with 17. Mr. King finds 28 authors contribute to first-rank hymns only, 26 to second-rank only, 27 to third-rank only, while 14 contribute to all three ranks. These 14 are Mrs. Alexander, 4 hymns, Caswall 6, Cowper 7, Miss Elliott 6, Heber 12, Keble 7, Kelly 5, Lyte 6, Montgomery 16, Neale 17, Newton 8, Tate and Brady 11, Watts 21, C. Wesley 22.

Hypatia.—A learned lady in the fourth century, daughter of the celebrated mathematician Theon of Alexandria, who gave lectures in Athens and Alexandria, in the Platonic school. She is said to have been very beautiful, and virtuous of character; but her correspondence with the Prefect Orestes made some of the Christians suspect her of doing them ill offices by keeping up the misunderstanding between Orestes and the Archbishop Cyril. Accordingly, one day on her road home from a lecture, a fanatical mob, instigated by Cyril, set upon her, pulled her from her chariot, and dragged her to Caesar's church, where they barbarously murdered her. She is the subject of one of Charles Kingsley's best novels.

Hyperdulia. [Dulia.]

Hypostasis [Gr. hypo, "under," stasis, "standing"].—Substance or essence that which stands under another thing its foundation or ground. Thus, in 1, "Faith is the hypostasis of things for;" in 2 Cor. ix. 4 it signifies firmness, stability. In Heb. i. 3 it is a person. The word occasioned great dispute between the Latin and Greek Church. The Greek Church took it for the Person that there were three hypostases in essence; and the Latin, that there was hypostasis—that is, as they said, but stance in three persons. St. Athanasius conciled them by showing that they same view, but put it in different terms. There are three Persons in the Godhead different modes of existence; there is Essence, because the nature of the Holy Ghost is not different from the Father.

Hypostatical Union.—The Christ of the human and Divine constituting two natures in one Person.

Hypothetical.—The form of a prayer thou art not already baptised, N., thee in the name. . . . It is called hypothetical, because the rubric that is to be used, "if they who bring thee to the church do make such uncertain answers to the priest's questions as that it can be seen that the child was baptised with the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost."

Hypocritarians.—Heretics in the third century who, according to St. Nazianzen, made a mixture of Judaism, and Christianity in their religion. They revered fire with the Pagans, the Sabbath and legal abstinence from meats with the Jews, while they yet adored the Most High God with the Christians. Their doctrines were closely allied to the Eucharists and Memorialists.

Iberians, or the Georgian Church.—A very ancient and interesting religion on the southern slope of the Caucasus. The conversion of that country to Christianity was the work of some form of the ancient Persian religion; but in the fourth century a Christian woman, a nun, being carried thither captive, all hearts by the piety and devoted life. A large party which arose in the East during the eighth and ninth centuries, who were called "Iconoclasts"; klaster, a "breaker"]. This party of Christianity sensitive to the dread that the use of images would lead Christians to heathen usages, for there was among the heathen to offer images and libations to the gods. Hence sculpture was looked upon with an unfavourable eye by many in the early days, who felt like the Jewish system) that all sides by idolatry. When the Church was thus situated, there was a minority of Christians of opinion on this subject in our own day, that images recently used in churches, as it would be to worship, feeling operated towards religious learning. Gregory the Great is accused of destroying the imperial library at Rome, if the accusation is true or not, but he had a great aversion to images and forbade the reading of books affected with mythology.) The prohibition of sculpture decoration among Christians was thus partly the result of idolatry going on in the East and partly also no doubt by that lingering of Judaism by which the Eastern Churches especially were so long influenced. It also seems to have been combined with a reverent fear of debasing our ideas of the object of worship, by what must necessarily be an imperfect representation of it. So the Council of Elvira, in Spain, decreed, A.D. 306, "That no images should be in the church, lest that which is worshipped and adored should be painted on the walls;" and hence the representation of our Lord in the paintings which decorate the walls of the Catacombs under the figure of a lamb, a shepherd, or by some Christian version of a heathen myth, as in the figure of Apollo. Yet, very early, paintings and statues did exist, which show that this feeling was not universal. Irenæus speaks of statues of our Lord (which he supposed to have been executed by order of Pontius Pilate) without any reprobation. Eusebius speaks of bronze statues of our Lord and the Syrophenician woman, which he had seen standing at Cæsarea Philippi; and, though he had some doubt as to their identity, does not even hint that the use of such figures was reprehensible. He also says that he had seen paintings of St. Peter, St. Paul, and our Lord; and the tradition that St. Luke was a painter, and that he had painted portraits of our Lord and of the Blessed Virgin, is as old as the fifth century. In the same century also Paulinus, Bishop of Nola, caused the walls of his cathedral to be decorated with paintings of Scriptural subjects, and Prudentius, the great Christian poet of that age, refers in one of his hymns to similar paintings. There was, however, sufficient ground for opposition to the religious use of sculpture in the opinions of Christians of early ages, to form a large basis for party-quarrelling and fanaticism after the first causes which had influenced these opinions had passed away. Here and there a bishop was found whose personal feelings on the subject overcame his official discretion. Epiphanius, the Bishop of Salamis, in Cyprus, tore down the chancel door-curtain of a church because it was embroidered with "the figure of Christ, or some other saint," he did not observe which, and he thought it was "contrary to the authority of the Scriptures to have the figure of a man hanging in the Church of Christ;" though how he made out his Scriptural justification for his conduct the bishop has not left on record. This was about the end of the fifth century. In the beginning of the seventh we find Severus, Bishop of Marseilles, destroying all the images which came within reach, much to the disgust of his flock; on which Gregory the Great shrewdly told him that to worship images was undoubtedly wrong, and he hoped none of his people would do so; "but," he added, with a touch of gentle sarcasm, "you should have kept the images, brother, and prevented the people from worshipping them."

Party spirit and fanaticism on both sides reached their height, however, in the eighth century. Since the breaking up of the Roman Empire in the West, the Lower, or Greek Empire had been maintained in the East, over which the Emperor Leo III., surnamed "the Isaurian," was reigning in the year 730. This Emperor was so infatuated against the use of images, or was so under the influence of others who were, that his conduct caused Italy, Venice, and Ravenna to relinquish the nominal allegiance which they had hitherto acknowledged to the Greek emperors, and they refused to pay tribute any longer. Even the Patriarch of Constantinople and his clergy remonstrated against his violent edict for the removal of images. Leo, who had been a common soldier, was also very ignorant, and, in consequence of his ignorance, very obstinate; he deposed the Patriarch, slaughtered the people when they tried to preserve the sculptured decorations of their churches, was defeated before Ravenna in his endeavour to recover Italy, and ended by leaving a legacy of bitterness to his family and the Church.

The son of Leo, Constantine Copronymus, was as furious an iconoclast as his father. He assembled a council of Eastern bishops, 338 in number, at Constantinople, which ordered that all images and paintings were to be destroyed; every bishop or clergyman thereafter possessing any was to be deposed, and lay offenders, after being excommunicated, were to be handed over to the civil power for further punishment.

This destructive spirit was fostered by several successive emperors, till at last a recoil took place, when thirty-two years afterwards, in 786, a council on the subject met at Nicæa, which is known as the Second (or Deutero-) Nicene Council. At this council the proceedings of its iconoclast predecessor were reversed, and the defence of images was carried to so extravagant a length as to secure for the Deutero-Nicene Council the unenviable fame of having officially introduced and sanctioned the practice of image-worship. Probably it was carried to this extreme by the desire to avoid the Judaism which so influenced the Eastern Churches, and the Mahometanism which was beginning to overrun them; both Jews and Mahometans exhibiting their bitter hostility to Christ by a special hatred of His image and the images of His saints. The extravagant recoil of the image defenders was resisted by many in the Western world, who wished to maintain that medium course of keeping the images without worshipping them, which had been recommended by St. Gregory. The bishops and nobles of England protested against image worship. Alcuin, the greatest scholar of his age (a Yorkshireman), wrote against it, and influenced his pupil, Charlemagne, to oppose Rome on the subject, and to hold provincial councils at Paris, Frankfurt, Mayence, and other places, in which image-worship was condemned. There is some room for doubting whether the dispute between the Deutero-Nicene Council and those who wished sculpture to be retained in churches was really more than a contest of words, as it seems incredible that hundreds of bishops should agree together in encouraging a usage so distinctly forbidden as the worship of that which is not God. The obscurity which hangs about our own English word "worship" (as in the marine service, "With my body I thee worship," where certainly no idolatry is intended) seems to indicate that there may be room for charity in respect to this council; and the singular passion which multitudes of otherwise good Christians have shown for the use of images and paintings in acts of worship may, perhaps, bear a charitable construction on some analogous ground, if it cannot be explained to our entire satisfaction, as it certainly seems impossible to explain it.

The iconoclast controversy was one of the means by which the last link which Rome had been politically bound to the East was broken; and very little ecclesiastical intercourse was maintained afterwards. It remained for another controversy, that respecting the "double procession of the Holy Ghost," to raise smouldering fire into flame, and to break asunder Eastern and Western Christendom, so that they have again have been wedded together in outward union.

Iconolatry or Iconolaters.—Those who worship images. A name applied by the Iconoclasts. From icon, "an image," and latreuo, "I worship."

Iconostasis.—A screen used in Greek churches corresponding in position to our altar-rails, but so formed as to conceal the altar from the congregation. Only the clergy are permitted to enter within the space thus hidden, in accordance with the Jewish custom of keeping the Holy of Holies so narrow as only to be entered by the high priest. The iconostasis is so called because it is adorned with sacred pictures (Icons). [See GREEK CHURCH.]

Idealists.—That class of thinkers who place the first beginnings of all knowledge in self-consciousness. The dictum of Descartes, "Cogito, ergo sum," is the foundation of idealism, superior to all sensation or reception of the material world. The deductions derived from this principle were many and various. In some cases it led to the belief in an infinite Being in whom all intelligences are centred, man and nature are absorbed in the Being, human freedom is lost in an absolute fate, God Himself loses His personality, and becomes synonymous with the universe.

term applied to the endeabelief in the spiritual truths
th rejection of all the mira-and the greater portion of the rest. The writer who first presented this theory in a complete and systematic form was DAVID STRAUSS [q.v.], who professed to subject the New Testament to an analysis which should precipitate all erroneous matter, and leave the true essence of Christianity in a pure state. Such a method started from the assumption that all miracles are incredible, as contrary both to philosophical principles and to experience. But this assumption being made, the belief in miracles had to be accounted for, and this the Ideologist professed to do. He would rip in pieces the forms in which they were presented, and explain the real significance of the narratives. He had no misgiving that he would not be able to show that the narratives were myths as regards the letter, but were nevertheless to be treated with respect as symbols of true ideas. The facts did not occur, save in inner human consciousness, but were in fact aspirations after, and presentiments of, eternal realities. Now this was a very remarkable contrast to the older sceptical method, which denied the miracles on the very ground that the doctrines which they were declared to attest were repulsive to the moral consciousness. Thus the sceptic denied the doctrine of the Atonement on the ground that it is at variance with the true notion of God; whereas the Ideologist declared that there is in the breast of man such a need felt of atonement, that the death of Christ was invested by human imagination with the attributes of a Divine sacrifice. It was the need felt within the soul of men everywhere which led them to take one noble and beautiful hero, such as Strauss always declared Christ to be, and to attach to him a mythic Incarnation, representing union with God, and in fact all the cardinal beliefs of religion.

Such an admission, that Christian principles are in union with the instincts of human nature, was at least a blow delivered at the very centre of the old scepticism. But it was retorted that there are, and always have been, men who reject Christian doctrines, and therefore they cannot be the invention of the human mind. The very existence of Scepticism is an argument against the first principles of the Ideologist. The Christian doctrine teaches that there is no such thing as chance, that all facts are, as the Materialist contends, the concrete results of some absolute principle, some unseen and general law which cannot be broken. Every event is "a link in a chain, which, according to Materialists, had no beginning, and will have no end; which, according to Theists, is fastened by each extremity to the throne of God." But all men confess that the application of this law is so mysterious that, so far from our being able to foretell the course of events, we are utterly confounded with the sequence of them in secular history, and in personal life. "Nothing is so probable as the unlikely," is a paradox which has become a truism. And the reason is first of all that "the ideal," in the words of Hegel, "is never realised." Or, as Hooker puts it, "All things besides, God excepted, vary somewhat in possibility which as yet they are not in act." The Ideologist is baffled by the contradictions of fact, the Christian finds an explanation of them in the revelation of the Bible. And though it is certain that man could never have discovered for himself the facts and doctrines there displayed, yet, as Coleridge has demonstrated, when they are revealed to us from without, the spirit of man is able to examine them, and to find that they fulfil all the conditions, and to assent to them as true. [See these principles worked out in a masterly manner by Canon F. C. Cook in Aids to Faith, pp. 133-146.]

Idolatry.—The word idol in Greek signified originally an "image" or "phantom," and had no connection with the idea of worship. It was a fancy of the mind, as opposed to a reality [Plato, Phædo]. Lord Bacon uses the word in the same sense in his famous enumeration of the four classes of idols. Secondly, the Greeks used the word to represent a likeness, whether by picture, or sculpture, or stage representation. The Old Testament Septuagint is the first book to take the word in a bad sense—that of an image used as an object of worship. The Second Commandment forbade such worship, and even the making of any image [Deut. iv. 12, 15-18]. The idolatry into which the Jews fell through following the example of the surrounding nations is chronicled for us in the Old Testament. It came utterly to an end after the Babylonish captivity. The word idolatry, which is a Christian, not a classical, word [1 Cor. x. 14; Gal. v. 20; Col. iii. 5; 1 Pet. iv. 3], conveyed to a Jew of the Christian era an idea as hateful as to a Christian. A few centuries elapsed before Christians would have tolerated any images in their places of worship. Then appeared symbols, such as the Dove, the Good Shepherd, as found in the Roman catacombs. Probably the cross was in use from the first, but the crucifix came much later. Whether the use of images in churches leads to idolatry, is a question in dispute between Roman Catholics and Protestants. The use of figures in sculpture and stained glass windows is declared by some to be not compatible with the letter of the Second Commandment, but a Protestant as decided as Dr. Arnold declared that the Incarnation set aside that letter, for God came "in the likeness of sinful flesh." Protestants hold that there is still a great danger in setting up images in churches of superstitious use, and of confusing a symbol, harmless in the abstract, until it becomes a fetish. [ICONOCLASTS.]

for forty years [A.D. 67-107]. A tradition declared him to be the first of our Lord took into His arms [Matt.

About the year 107, soon after the death of St. John, the Emperor Trajan visited Smyrna on his way to Armenia. As he arrived in the city there seems to have been either a sudden alarm or an actual commencement of persecution; and, the apostle practically interpreted the saying of our Lord, "The good shepherd giveth his life for the sheep," by appearing before Trajan and endeavouring, by his own self-sacrifice and martyrdom, to draw off attention from the flock, and so save their lives. Trajan examined the aged saint, accusing him of wickedness in professing a religion contrary to the commands of Cæsar, and in encouraging others to do so to their destruction. Ignatius claimed the name of Theophilus, God-bearer, and said that since he was God within him—doubtless referring to the Holy Spirit—"Stronger is He that is in you than he that is in the world"—wicked spirits he would drive from him, and he ought not to be put to death in such a manner for refusing to worship false gods which were nothing else than evil spirits. When Trajan asked for a confession of "bearing Christ," Ignatius replied, "There is but one God, who made heaven and earth, and the sea, and all things in them; and one Jesus Christ, His only-begotten Son, whose kingdom may never be destroyed." Trajan knew the story of our Lord, and asked, "His kingdom, do you say? He was crucified under Pontius Pilate? Will you carry, then, Him who was within thee?" And when Ignatius replied, "I do, for it is written, I will dwell in them, and walk in them," the Emperor pronounced his condemnation, as he confessed himself a disciple of the apostle, and commanded that he should be sent to Rome, there to be thrown to the lions for the entertainment of the people. The holy man heard his sentence, and said, "I thank thee, O Lord, that Thou hast preserved thus to honour me."

It was a weary journey for an aged man. How long it took we are not sure. Ignatius was so old and hale that the ten soldiers who had charge of him were constrained to make it as easy as they could, and rested for some time on their way. When at Smyrna, the Bishop wrote letters to the Bishops of five other Churches, who had sent him, and all they could—their loving prayers and whom he specially exhorted not to make any attempt to rescue him. At Ephesus he met Polycarp, and after he had rested to gain strength for another stage, Trajan led him on to Troas, where he was met with the good news that no further persecution had taken place at Antioch since he left, and that therefore the purpose had been answered. In spite of the open sympathy with a Christian must have entailed, the of the well-known old Bishop was triumph the whole way. And the warmth of friends, nor this prospect of the pain and expectation of a daunted him. "Whether fire, cross, or the assault of wild beasts let all come," said he, "so that I Christ."

must have been a very short time before he came to Rome. On Dec. 17th, the people were collected in the Amphitheatre (now called the Colosseum) to witness the athletic sports, and gladiatorial fights, in which the Emperor delighted. It was made known that the Emperor had sent them a prisoner of war, and there arose an impatient expectation of the Christians to the Lions," as a signal to be brought out. Then this white-haired harmless old man of eighty or ninety was led into the midst of the arena, and torn to pieces by the uncaged beasts in the eyes of all the ladies and gentlemen. As he had prayed that it might be so, Ignatius died almost instantly, and his friends came in the evening, after the day was over, and the amphitheatre full of spectators, they found only two gnawed bones to gather up and carry to Antioch.

Writings of this Father have been a subject of keen controversy. The translation by Archbishop Wake, and which is accessible through Hone's Apocryphal Testament, comprised seven Epistles, viz., the Ephesians, the Magnesians, the Trallians, the Romans, the Philadelphians, the Smyrnaeans, and to Polycarp. To these were added six others, and this augmentation is called by critics "The Long Recension;" they were "Ignatius to the Romans," "Ignatius to Mary," "Ignatius to the Tarsians," "Philippians," "Anagnostus," "Hero." It has, however, been contended that these were forgeries of the fourth century. But a challenge also raised against the other seven, is that the view of episcopacy of the writer of them holds belongs to a later time than the second century. This is greatly strengthened by the discovery of a Syriac copy, now in the British Museum, which only contains three of the Epistles, viz. to Polycarp, to the Ephesians, and to the Romans, and which was edited and published by the late Canon Cureton in 1845. It is now known as The Short Recension. It has been largely taken up by some scholars, and eagerly repudiated by others, who hold that Cureton's was merely a forgery. In consequence, the present Bishop of Durham, Dr. Lightfoot, has been engaged in a Commentary on

St. Paul's Epistles, turned aside, and gave many years to "the Apostolic Fathers." In 1885 he published the result of his labours on Ignatius and Polycarp in three goodly volumes, and it is probably the most learned and exhaustive critical treatise which has appeared in this century. No mystery is left unsolved, and the genuineness of the seven Epistles, or The Middle Recension, is established beyond controversy.

The central idea of the Epistles of Ignatius may be expressed in the words "One Faith." And that with him is the historical Christianity of the Gospel in continual activity in the lives of men. He quotes the New Testament as of equal authority with the Old, prefacing his quotations with "it is written." The Eucharist is with him the centre of Christian worship. He is the first writer to use the expression "Catholic Church."

In the Anglo-Saxon Calendar, St. Ignatius was commemorated on Dec. 17th; in the Roman it is Feb. 1st.

Ignatius Loyola. [LOYOLA.]

Ignorance, in theological language, is the want of knowledge in one who might have acquired it, and is thus distinguished from "Nescience," which merely implies absence of knowledge. Ignorance is distinguished by writers on casuistry into many grades. Thus a man may hold altogether false opinions through his bad education or through circumstances which are none of his own making. He errs, not because he intends or wishes to do so, but because he knows no better. He does not sin against light. This is defined as "invincible ignorance." But it is clear that in matters so all-important as the soul's health, it is incumbent on every man to learn, as far as he has opportunity, the principles of faith and practice, and therefore he who holds false opinions or possesses evil habits, because he shuts his eyes to facts and arguments which press themselves upon him, is culpable, and hence we have distinctions of "simply vincible," of "crass," of "affected" ignorance. By the latter is to be understood the wilful state of blindness to truth in which a man remains for the very purpose of sinning the more freely, "loving darkness rather than light because his deeds are evil." Such ignorance, far from exculpating, aggravates sin. It is clear that the various kinds of ignorance here named do not all spring from the same root. In some cases it is an intellectual shortcoming. "Want of ideas," or failure to discover the connection of the ideas which we have, or again, of following them out to their conclusions—these are the causes to which Locke traces ignorance, and all these are clearly errors of the intellect; but when the will enters in, and we do not believe because belief would interfere with our pleasure or convenience, that is a sin of the heart. And it is this which men need to be warred of, so prone are we to spiritual anodynes. And no subject is there on which it behoves us to be so wary in our judgments of others. God only can judge where involuntary and culpable ignorance are divided in each case.

Ignorantines was the name given to a community formed in France at the beginning of the eighteenth century by an Abbot, Baptist de la Salle. The object was to give free instruction to the poor, both on secular and religious subjects. When the Jesuits were expelled from France in 1764, the Ignorantines, having adopted their views, continued to teach them till they themselves were expelled twenty-six years afterwards. They did not remain long in exile, but were recalled by Napoleon. It is said that they now number about ten thousand.

I.H.S.—One of the commonest and oldest symbols used in Christian worship. Three explanations have been given of the meaning of the three letters: [1] That they are the initials of the Latin In hoc signo (vincit), the writing which the Roman Emperor Constantine is said to have seen on the cross of light that appeared to him in the heavens. This interpretation may be dismissed at once as unlikely. [2] That they are the initials of Jesus, Hominum Salvator; ("Jesus, the Saviour of men"). This is perhaps the idea generally current, and it may be taken as at least the prevalent interpretation now; but its historical accuracy is not so certain. [3] That they are the first three letters of the Greek ΙΗΣΟΥΣ [Jesus], in which case it will be seen that the middle letter H is really the Greek capital letter ε (long e). The consideration that the other chief monogram, which was what Constantine had inscribed on the labarum (or standard of the cross), viz. Ϟ was in Greek characters, and was taken ✕ from our Lord's other most usual name, viz. Christ, perhaps favours this third view. I.H.S. within a circle of rays, is the favourite device of the Order of Jesuits.

Ildefonsus, Sr., Bishop of Toledo, was born there in 607. He escaped from home to the Monastery of Agli, in 632 was ordained Deacon, and was afterwards made Abbot; in this capacity he attended the Eighth and Ninth Councils of Toledo (653 and 655), and in 657 succeeded Eugenius II. as Bishop of his native place. He died on Jan. 23rd, 667, and is said by his writings to have greatly conduced to the adoration of the Virgin in Spain.

Illuminati ["the enlightened ones"].—[1] In ancient times the baptised were sometimes so called, because in the baptism of adults a lighted taper was put into their hands as a symbol of the light of faith and grace of which they were now possessed. This was not, however, a primitive custom. fanatical sects assumed this name: the first in Spain towards the close of the thirteenth century, the other in France a century later. As is intimated by [2] they both claimed special illumination insight into spiritual and divine [3] The Spaniards included under the name charged by the Inquisition with [4] that by assiduous prayer and [5] and they had become most closely united and that thereby they had attained a degree of perfection that they [6] neither of the Church's sacraments [7] forming good works. Imam signifies in Arabic the Antistes in Greek, a "leader" or "chief." This general signification is supplied by the Mussulmans by way of title to him who is head of their congregation in the mosque, who has supreme authority among the Mahometans both in spiritualities and temporalities. In Turkey, however, subordinate Imams in the mosques represent the chief only in matters of religion. The word of the Mahometans is mufti meaning is always restrained successor of Mahomet, who is of secular and sacred jurisdiction of authority being lodged on. For this reason the Mahometans that their pretended prophet on and legislation given him Moses, and not on that of the declared His kingdom was not consequence of these pretensions took the title and performed the Imam. The Mahometans agreed concerning the dignity. Some hold the Imamate to be a right, and fixed like the throne to one family. The Shiites, however, maintain that it belongs to his family, Ali being the sole heir of Mahomet; so they will choose for the head of religion from his descent in a direct line an Imam. There have been, according to them, twelve Imams, and they look for the more who will be the last. They declare that the office is not tied to genealogy and does not pass from one family to another. Imams belonging to particular families like our parish priests; they perform public liturgy.

Immaculate Conception.—The doctrine of the Church of Rome that the Virgin Mary was conceived and born free of original sin. The Festival of the Conception of the Blessed Virgin is to be observed about the middle of December, but the date of its celebration was not fixed till 1439, when the Council of Florence appointed Dec. 8th for that purpose, said to have been instituted by Archbishop Anselm, in gratitude for the preservation of the Conqueror's crown at the storm; its observance was confirmed by the Council of Oxford, 1221, and retained in our Calendar as a feast of the "Immaculate Conception."

The doctrine of the Immaculate Conception was first taught by Peter Lombard about 1150, and strenuously opposed by St. Bernard. It was recommended as "a pious opinion" by the Council of Basle. It was not an article of faith until 1854, when Pope Pius IX. published the dogma in the bull "Ineffabilis Deus," declaring that the Virgin Mary, at the first Conception, by a singular privilege of the omnipotent God, in her merits of Jesus Christ, the Redeemer, was preserved immaculate from original sin."

[BAPTISM.]

Scripture.—"They are not to be baptized before the Eighth Article of the Church of England, which feigns that the old fathers

[i.e. the saints of the Old Testament] did look only for transitory promises." We shall see immediately that there is good ground for this assertion of the Article. But it is no less true that the doctrine of Immortality takes a very subordinate place in the theology of the early days of the Old Testament. Bishop Warburton, in his Divine Legation of Moses, expressly uses the argument, that Moses was able to attest that his doctrine came from God by appealing to the temporal instincts of the people. Length of life and worldly prosperity were the promised rewards of obedience. But even in the Pentateuch there are not wanting indications of a revelation, though dim, of a glory to be revealed, and certainly of the immortality of the soul. Our Saviour's rebuke of the Sadducees declared that they erred for not perceiving this [Matt. xxii. 29-33]. The prayer of Balaam [Num. xxiii. 10] is capable of no other explanation than that he recognised such a hope. But when we come later, the Psalms of David are distinct enough, not only in such verses as Ps. xvi. 8-11 and xxiii. 4-6, but in the whole tenor, of the hopes and aspirations they breathe after God.

This belief was held unfalteringly by wise heathens, and was expressed in the plainest terms by men like Plato and Cicero. The effect of the doctrines of Socrates and Plato appears strongly in the Old Testament Apocrypha; the writers of Ecclesiasticus and Wisdom had undoubtedly in Alexandria become acquainted with the Platonist philosophy, and the beautiful hopes which they utter must be unquestionably traced to the light which had been thrown for them upon the Old Testament, from the writings of men whom God had been teaching in the far-off heathen lands. The belief is also so widely spread amongst even the most savage races, that it may be almost said to belong to the consciousness of humanity.

When we ask on what grounds such a belief rests, the answer must not be too hastily given. It has been asserted that the very existence of self-consciousness is evidence of indestructible power, that the very ability of "looking before and after," is an indication that the soul is not bound to the material form. But to this it may be replied that the soul loses its consciousness in sleep, in insanity, even through narcotics. Therefore this argument cannot be held of itself convincing. On the other hand the fact of the dissolution of the body, and the absolute disappearance of all further evidence of the soul's existence, is no indication at all of its ceasing to be, because all physical investigation goes more and more to show that the soul is not a simple bodily function, bound to the brain, as materialists have supposed. All physical evidence is against the theory that the soul is a part of the body, and forces the conclusion that it has a peculiar existence of its own.

Consequently we come to this—that physical investigation is baffled in this question, and we have to fall back upon some other form of evidence. Such evidence, Christians hold, was given in ancient times by God by His Voice within, and in some cases by outward revelation as well. Men believed in God because He spake to them and bade them so believe, and they recognised His voice. But the revelation was consummated in the teaching of Christ and His resurrection from the dead. We have seen no physical facts that are capable of refuting that; all investigation of moral phenomena supports it. [EVIDENCE.] The Christian revelation declares that the soul is immortal, and that the body shall rise from the dead and be united with the soul again. To deny that, as St. Paul says, is to give up Christianity itself. [1 Cor. xv. 12-17.] Certainly religion is worthless without it. [RESURRECTION.] We believe, then, and science, though it could not indeed discover the truth, follows it and acquiesces in it as reasonable, that this present consciousness of ours, though it must be robbed by physical death of its power of present manifestation, shall not be lost. The belief in a good and faithful Creator assures us that we are made for something better than a short life of three score years and ten, that the winding sheet is not our rightful vesture, and this beautiful world is something better than a great grave. Because God is love, because He is good and His works are beautiful, He cannot abandon the noblest of His works, which returns His love. In point of fact, those who have any positive faith in a Supreme Being, are also believers in Immortality; but nevertheless the two questions are quite distinct.

Immovable Feasts.—Those feasts which are observed on certain fixed days of the year, as distinguished from the Movable Feasts which vary with Easter. Examples of Immovable Feasts are:—Christmas Day, The Epiphany, and all the Saints' Days.

Immunity.—A law term, implying exemption from public burdens or other legal obligation. The term "ecclesiastical immunities," therefore, refers to the rights and privileges of this kind enjoyed by the Church in any nation. The extent of meaning of the phrase varies, of course, in different countries.

Impanation.—The doctrine of the presence of Christ's Body and Blood in the consecrated bread and wine of the Eucharist. It differs from the doctrine of Transubstantiation in considering that the elements undergo no change of their nature, but remain bread and wine after consecration. It is very similar to the Lutheran doctrine of CONSUBSTANTIATION [q.v.].

Impediment. [MARRIAGE.]

Implicit Faith.—An unquestioning belief in things, on the sole authority of the teacher; belief without examination or reference to the grounds on which a thing to be believed is supported.

Imposition of Hands.—Many of the laying on of hands for spiritual gifts and authority is so. It was practised by Jacob [Gen. by Moses [Numb. xxvii. 18-23 xxxiv. 9], by our Lord himself [M by the Apostles [Acts vii. 17, 18; their successors [1 Timothy iv. and its use in the rites of Confirmation Ordination has continued in the Churches and countries. It is called by of the Epistle to the Hebrews [Heb one of "the principles of the Christ."

Impropriation.—The possession of ecclesiastical revenues by a Imputed Righteousness theological language the righteousness of Christ, which is attributed to every member of Christ I am partaker of His holiness. The idea is beautifully expressed in Dr. Bright's sacramental hymn

"Look, Father, look, on His each
And only look on us as found in Him"

Incarnation.—This was the event which occasioned the most important controversy in the Church during four centuries of its life. The ARIAN, APOLLINARIAN, NESTORIAN heresies all turned up phases of this great doctrine. To found under their respective names remains here to state what is the doctrine of the Christian Church on the subject that the Son of God took upon Himself human nature, and was made man, to accomplish the work of our salvation. He took to Himself a true body and a true soul. The reality of His body by its being subject to the same as our own; He hungered, He was weary as we are. He was born of His body grew from boyhood to manhood; He died and was buried. If He had not taken His fleshly substance of the mother, He would not then have been man and the semblance of His reality have been a deception. He has been eternally the Son of God without ceasing to be God, because of man; true man as He was true God, of flesh and blood, of our kind like ourselves.

ent Methodists. [METHOD-

ents.—The original name, d, of that body of professing v usually known as CONGRE-

GATIONALISTS [q.v.] who differ from Episco- palians in having no gradation of ministry or succession of orders, and from Presbyterians in having no gradation of courts or assemblies exercising any authoritative or judicial func- tions. According to both the Episcopal and Puritan idea, the Church consisted of the whole body of professing Christians; and accordingly, when Romish tendencies began, in and after the reign of Elizabeth, to exercise the minds of Englishmen, the Puritan idea, quite as much as the Episcopalian, was to purify and preserve Christian doctrine by State action: if the rulers refused to act in this way, no other means of action occurred to either. The founder of Independency, ROBERT BROWNE [q.v.], in a tract published about 1580, enforced, on the other hand, the doctrine that, religion being matter of the individual conscience, was not to be enforced or extended or reformed by any political action, or in any way dependent upon it; that "the Kingdom of God was not to be begun by whole parishes, but rather of the worthiest, be they ever so few." This doctrine implied that if the State was neglectful or in error in matters of religion, the individual man or congregation was no less bound to separate from error, and to teach and practise what was true, which indeed Browne clearly incul- cated. But this teaching was too far in advance of the times; to separate from the Church was then to rebel against the State, and was therefore a crime held equivalent to treason. Accordingly, even under Protestant Elizabeth, Thacker and Coppin [1583] sealed their testimony with their blood; and ten years later Barrow and Greenwood (the one educated for a priest and the other for a barrister) also suffered for opinions which now appear the merest truisms. By 1596 at least twenty-four persons had died in prison for holding similar views. Thus hunted out of England, Independency took refuge in Holland, which then occupied in Europe the proud position of being the sole asylum of religious liberty. Here it grew, mainly under John Robinson, to whom fled Mr. Henry Jacob from Bishop Bancroft's persecution; but in 1616 Jacob returned to England, and founded the first regularly constituted English Independent Church. It was thus that In- dependency became so much identified his- torically with the cause of civil and religious liberty; the identification grew gradually out of English Church and State policy com- bined, the Independents being compelled to struggle, from religious motives, for a great deal which is now acknowledged to be elemen- tary civil right.

During the reign of Charles I. Indepen- dency increased a great deal in secret, though Laud kept down the outward manifestation of it so rigidly that converts had to emi- grate to either Holland or America: it is computed that in the twenty years ending in 1640 there emigrated to the New World not less than 25,000 "faithful and freeborn Englishmen and good Christians, constrained to forsake their dearest home, their friends, and kindred, whom nothing but the wide ocean and the savage deserts of America could hide from the fury of the Bishops." [Milton.] The growth of a powerful American community, who had built up a notoriously successful and religious civilisation upon an Independent religious basis, of necessity gave powerful impetus to the system at home, however outwardly repressed; and Laud so strongly felt this, that he actually proposed to send out a bishop, with "forces to compel, if he were not otherwise able to persuade, obedience." [Heylyn's Life of Laud.] All such schemes were however ended by the Civil War, and in the Westminster Assembly the Independents came face to face, no longer with Churchmen but with the Presbyterians. They were but a small minority, but with American prestige behind them they debated matters with some success: in the end, however, they were reduced to plead for bare toleration, and were refused. Toleration was in fact then as alien to presbyter as to bishop. On the other hand, Independents like Roger Williams and John Milton advocated toleration of religious opinion of the most absolute kind; affirming that even if a man were an atheist, so long as he was of moral behaviour and a good citizen, the State, as such, had nothing to say to him. This seems very little to say now; but at that period a few Independents (not quite all even of them) were the only men who dared boldly to avow and defend such views; and even they were defeated in a Puritan assembly. Gradually under Cromwell, however, the Independents came more to the front; but by the Restoration of 1660 all seemed undone. In 1661 the Corporation Act was passed; in 1662 the Act of Uniformity; in 1663 the Conventicle Act; in 1665 the Five Mile Act, forbidding a Non-conformist minister to even come (unless on a journey) within five miles of any town where he had formerly ministered; and in 1670 and in 1673 various of these provisions were made still more stringent. King Charles himself, singularly enough, was more tolerant than his ministers and counsellors, owing to his own Romish proclivities, and published his Declaration of Indulgence in 1672; but he was forced by his Parliament to withdraw this, and men like John Howe and John Owen, the latter of whom had been Vice-Chancellor of Oxford, were forced to hide in holes and corners, only preaching by stealth as they could find opportunity. The long struggle only began to end with the Revolution, which was immediately followed by the Toleration Act of 1689; but since then, by slow degrees, the various civil and religious disabilities of Independents and other Dissenters have been gradually removed.

The cardinal principle of the Independent was to enforce the power, and the responsibility of the individual Church of the individual man: each had to be responsible of others, his or its own duty before God. It would be unjust to represent the struggle, as some have done, as being on merely against the Anglican Church. It was partly so, no doubt; but it was against a feudal system of affairs, of opinions, which then more or less affected the world, and affected religion as it matters. As we have seen, the Presbyterians were equally with the Churchman, though right for the State to regulate all matters and forms of worship, and in that way about as intolerant. This was of the age. The truth is, that real religious opinion was hardly understood those days, and some even of the Quakers who had suffered for conscience sake in England afterwards: indeed the entire Quaker movement was a dogged resistance of the [FRIENDS] had also its share, an important one, in bringing about the recognition of those rights of conscience which the Independents held so dear. Still, according to their light, they did struggle for them, and therein differed radically from the Presbyterians and other Puritans, whose aim was simply to substitute one ecclesiastical system for another. In so doing, these believed their system to be better, of course: but it was to be set up and obeyed; whilst the Independents, on the other hand, contended for the right of every man and every Church to determine that system which approved itself to them, and, after the first excesses of the Brethren (and fierce persecution always does excess afterwards repudiated)—expressly admitted that godly Christians were to be found in various communions, and that Christian fellowship might therefore be maintained with them. [For a brief account of the preparation of the Declaration of Independency in England, see GREGG.]

It only remains to notice some modifications or differences in practice. It is obvious that extreme Independency lead to isolation of individual churches. In America this was never felt, it has always been customary for many Churches in a district to unite in counsel and advice for consultation on general matters, such as ordinations, which latter ceremony amongst them only the character of recognition, conferring no authority or rights upon the minister "ordained." The amount of fraternal union was very great amongst men, nearly all of whom were both in religious belief and the victims of common persecution. There was of it in English Independency from the beginning, owing, as naturally, to the difficulties of communion which severe repression

With greater liberty, however, recognition of the need for fraternal union; and now the Congregational and subordinate County Unions pretty near approach to the term. The larger organizations are strictly fraternal, as against the hierarchical character; have real authority over individual members and even in the case of radical departure from the accepted theology, or from what is termed orthodoxy—as, for example, Unitarianism, which of late has grown up under various preachers in Unitarian Churches—have no remedy but to withdraw from fellowship with the offender: they cannot depose the offender or take any further measures. Careless as it is, however, there are still Unitarians who are jealous of the "union" aspect of Congregationalism. Others, on the contrary, feel that too much individualism still prevails and look for further extension of the system.

Unitarians are the largest religious body in Scotland, and, next to the Methodists, the largest body of Dissenters in England. Including Baptists should be included Unitarians, as the latter hold precisely the same regarding Church order and doctrine and are therefore simply a sect of Independents or Congregationalists without baptism. In the year 1886, when a joint session was held of the two bodies, a recognition of the union which may probably be carried out in the days of comprehension. In Independents were till lately an exception moderately Calvinistic in their views, what is known as the Unitarian school of thought has made less progress among them than in any other religious body, and the same may be said of heterodoxy of various shades, no Unitarian Independent Churches being numerous. It will be indeed manifest that Unitarianism gives great facilities to any man of strong character and eminent talents in acquiring and maintaining a heterodox position which he can only be controlled by the Unitarian Union which has probably become a mere name; the result which may be seen in this way is seen, for instance, in the case of the U.S., which is now distinctly Unitarian. These evils, however, it is considered are outweighed by other considerations; the stimulus given to individualism. A remarkable feature about Unitarianism in England has been its strong Unitarian character, and the large number of men whom it has attracted in comparison with other Dissenting bodies. It is probably connected with the Unitarianism always set by the body upon Unitarian education. Kept out of the Universities, they established at a very early date ministerial schools of a high class (in one of them Archbishop Secker and Bishop Butler were educated) and have always given great attention to this subject. Within the last few years, however, the Universities have been thrown open to Nonconformists, and there is at present a movement amongst Independents for combining their own theological machinery with the University system, which has however hardly as yet taken sufficient shape to be here described.

Independents, Scottish.—The Scottish Independents first appeared during the Commonwealth, but only for a short time. In 1729 Mr. John Glas formed a sect of Independents, which received from him the name of GLASSITES, who are also called SANDEMANIANS [q.v.]. The present sect of Scottish Congregationalists dates from the end of the last century, and JAMES HALDANE [q.v.] and Robert Aikane were very active in preaching among them and in spreading the sect. It is said there are now about two hundred churches belonging to it in Scotland. They held the same doctrines as the English Independents.

Index Expurgatorius.—The result of examination by the Roman Church of all literary works intended for publication, with a view of deciding whether they are dangerous to the State, to morals, or to religion. Such censorship was exerted in early times; thus from the time of the Emperor Constantine, those books which had been censured by the Councils were often prohibited and suppressed by the authority of the prince, which he did, not only in virtue of his being protector of the Canons, but by a purely secular and original right, as reasons of State directed him. The Council of Nice condemned Arius's tenets, and the Emperor Constantine prohibited his books by a severe edict, by which those who concealed them instead of burning them were liable to heavy penalties. In the year 398 the Emperor Arcadius set forth a proclamation against the writings of Eunomius and the Manichæans, at the instance of St. Chrysostom, who, it is supposed, informed him that they had been censured by the Church. Theodosius the younger, after the Council of Ephesus had condemned Nestorius's books, published an edict to have them burnt. The censure of the Council of Chalcedon upon Eutyches' books was confirmed by an order of the Emperor Marcian, which prince two years after condemned the Apollinarian books to be burnt at the request of Pope Leo. Justinian, in 536, prohibited by edict the books of Severus of Antioch and other heretical authors, animadverted upon by the Council of Constantinople, under the Patriarch Mennas. Continued instances of the same kind meet us all through the early history of the Western Church. Thus Popes Leo, Gelasius, and Symmachus, in 443, 492, and 503, ordered the Manichæan writings to be burned. Pope Adrian II. condemned Photius's books to the fire in the year 868, pursuant to a decree of the Council of Rome held under him. Innocent II. ordered the books of Abelardus and Arnold of Brescia to be burnt in the year 1140, after St. Bernard had got them condemned in the Council of Sens. In France the privilege of examining books relating to religion and the discipline and government of the Church was annexed to the episcopal authority, because "bishops are, by virtue of their character and office, the proper judges of these matters." But after the Faculty of Divinity was settled at Paris, the bishops delegated part of their authority to these doctors, but still upon condition of reservation of their own original right. Thenceforward the Doctors of the Faculty of Divinity at Paris looked upon the privilege of examining books before their publication as one of the principal prerogatives of their corporation.

With the printing press and the Reformation such a host of books poured in that it was no longer possible to read and decide on them before publication, so the Church of Rome at the Council of Trent appointed a commission to examine these books and prohibit if necessary. Pius IV. in 1558 issued the first Roman Index. At the last sitting of the Council in 1563 it was determined to put the matter entirely into the hands of the Pope, and Pius V. soon after appointed the Sacred Congregation of the Index, with a Dominican Friar for its secretary, and a certain number of Cardinals with theological professors called Consulters. Its powers were enlarged by Sixtus V. Many editions of the Index have appeared, notably one by Benedict XIV. in 1744. The Congregation is still in operation. It may be noted that, besides a list of books which are prohibited, there is a list of those which may be read when expurgated from the heretical or objectionable passages. Persons who read prohibited books are forthwith excommunicated.

Induction.—The ceremony of conferring the temporalities of a living upon a newly-appointed incumbent. It is performed at the church door. The inductor, who is appointed by the bishop, reads a legal document, and delivers the key of the church to the clergyman. The latter, unlocking the door, enters and signifies his possession by tolling the bell.

Indulgences.—Dispensations granted by the Pope, remitting that temporal punishment of sin, which would otherwise be inflicted, either in this world as penance, or in Purgatory.

The practice of remitting penance arose early. In the Primitive Church the penances imposed on those who disgraced the Christian profession were often very severe, sometimes extending over the whole of life; the bishops frequently exercised the power of abridging the period of penance, and thus wise relaxing its severity. St. Cyprian complained of the laxity of the bishops in this respect, stating that they often gave Letters of Communion without inquiry; and others, as Tertullian, wrote against the practice. The custom afterwards crept up, of commuting penance for a money payment, the money being devoted to the relief of the poor and other pious uses. This, of course, led to abuses, and finally degenerated into the practice of granting indulgences. In 1095 the Council of Clermont granted indulgences to all who should take part in the Crusades, and this offer was confirmed by several subsequent Councils, including the Council of Lateran, Lyons, Vienne, and the Council of Trent. The theory of indulgences was defined by the Decretal of Clement VI. in 1303: "There is left to the Church an infinite treasury of merits and good works, found in Christ Himself, and increased by the merits of the Blessed Virgin and the saints. The dispenser of this treasure is in the hands of the bishops of the Church, but the supreme control by virtue of the Keys, and is able to remit the punishment of sinners, living or dead, by offering to God instead a portion of this treasure as a satisfaction for the sin."

In 1517, Pope Leo X. resorted to the sale of indulgences on a large scale, and gathered funds for rebuilding of St. Peter at Rome. The licence to sell indulgences in different countries were disposed of at the highest bidders, and the purchasers were then at liberty to profit they could out of their purchase. The Archbishop of Mentz, who had a monopoly for Germany, employed Tetzel, a Dominican, to act as his agent, and travel over the country extolling the merits of his pardons. The intemperance of Tetzel, and the moral havoc of his teaching, led Luther to publish his "Theses" on indulgences to the door of the castle church of Wittenberg. This contributed materially to the spread of the Reformation, and in fact originated the movement.

The text of these indulgences follows;—

"May our Lord Jesus Christ have mercy on thee, N. N., and absolve thee by His most holy passion. And I, by the apostolic power which has been committed to me, do absolve thee from all censures, judgments, and penalties which thou mayest have merited, and from all sins and crimes which thou hast committed, however great or small."

and for whatsoever cause, even though had been reserved to our most Holy the Pope and the Apostolic See. I all attainders of unfitness, and all marks any thou mayest have drawn on thee on occasion; I remit the punishment thou must have had to endure in Purgatory; be thee anew a participator in the Sacrament of the Church; I incorporate thee in the communion of the Saints; and restore thee in the innocence and purity which thou wast at the hour of thy baptism; so that, at the hour of thy death, the gate through which is the entrance to the relief from torments and punishments shall be open against thee, and that which leads to Paradise of joy shall be open. And must thou be spared long, this grace shall be immutable to the time of thy last end. In the name of the Father, of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost. Amen.

The view of the Church of England with regard to indulgences is set forth in the 22nd Canon, which declares the Romish doctrine of indulgence "to be a 'fond thing vainly invented, grounded upon no warranty of Scripture, rather repugnant to the Word of God.'"

Indult [Lat. indultum, "that which is granted as a favour"] is a licence from the Pope to a corporation or an individual allowing something which forms an exception to the common law of the Church. For instance, indults used to be granted to kings and princes, giving them the patronage of ecclesiastical dignities and benefices within their realm; and in modern days indults are granted to bishops in inclement countries, allowing them to relax the rigour of the Lenten fast enjoined by the Canons of the Church.

Infallibility is the quality of not being liable to err or fall into mistakes; the quality ascribed in Scripture of God Himself, in whom is no variableness, neither shadow of turning. And this quality has also been claimed by controversialists on behalf of the Church, greatly as they have differed on the question of its locality.

It is claimed by the Church of Rome, regarding herself as "the Mother and Head of all Churches," claims to be infallible in faith and morals, so that whilst no discussion is allowed to her members on matters of opinion, when a definition of faith is once promulgated by her, all controversy is at an end. Thus the Church has defined what books are Scripture and what are not; therefore it is not open to members to challenge the Canon. The sense of Scripture when once decreed, must be accepted, and no doctrine decreed necessary to salvation can be called in question. But this claim is the foundation of a theory which covers a wider field, namely what we may call a second view, namely [2] that the Church Universal is infallible. This is a position which has been taken by some controversialists who deny the exclusive authority of the Church of Rome; and these we may subdivide into those who place the infallibility in the Scriptures, and those who declare that it is in suspense; that the Church being divided into sects has lost the power of formally declaring doctrines, and can only receive it back through a general council of united Christendom. But this latter view seems to involve too remote a period to bring it within practical limits, and the controversy is therefore narrowed to the question, "Has the Church received such power from its Divine Author?" The Infallibility of Scripture belongs to the question of INSPIRATION [q.v.], that of the Church of Rome must first of all assume the special authority of that Church. Now, as a matter of fact, the opinion of Roman theologians has been anything but clearly expressed on this point. No such doctrine was known in the primitive times; but it grew with the centralisation of the Church, along with the assumption based on the forged Decretals. Even when it became a dogma that the Church had an infallible power of discernment, it was not certain whether it rested with a general council or with the Pope as head. The Councils of Pisa, Constance, and Basle asserted their superiority, but the question was left undetermined. Even the Council of Trent did not define the doctrine, and it was a subject of much questioning between the Gallicans and the Jesuits.

Perhaps the ablest exposition of what is substantially the Gallican view is by Cardinal Newman, as given in his Apologia. "Supposing it," he writes, "to be the will of the Creator to interfere in human affairs, and to make provisions for retaining in the world a knowledge of Himself, so definite and distinct as to be proof against the energy of human scepticism, in such a case . . . there is nothing to surprise the mind if He should think fit to introduce a power into the world invested with the prerogative of infallibility in religious matters . . . And thus I am brought to speak of the Church's Infallibility as a provision adapted by the mercy of the Creator to preserve religion in the world, and to restrain that freedom of thought which of course is one of the greatest of our natural gifts, and to rescue it from its own suicidal excesses" [1st edition, p. 382]. Further on he defines, first, the province of this power, then its limits. "This power, viewed in its fulness, is as tremendous as the giant evil which has called for it. It claims, when brought into exercise in the legitimate manner—for otherwise, of course, it is but dormant—to have for itself a sure guidance into the very meaning of every portion of the Divine Message in detail which was committed by our Lord to His Apostles. It claims to know its own limits, and to decide what it can determine absolutely and what it cannot. It claims, moreover, to have a hold upon statements not directly religious, so far as this, to determine whether they indirectly relate to religion, and, according to its own definitive judgment, to pronounce whether or not in a particular case they are consistent with revealed truth. It claims to decide magisterially, whether infallibly or not, that such and such statements are or are not prejudicial to the Apostolic depositum of faith, in their spirit or in their consequences, and to allow them or condemn and forbid them accordingly. It claims to impose silence at will on any matters or controversies of doctrine which, on its own ipse dixit, it pronounces to be dangerous, or inexpedient, or inopportune. It claims that whatever may be the judgment of Catholics upon such acts, these acts should be received by them with those outward marks of reverence, submission, and loyalty which Englishmen, for instance, pay to the presence of their Sovereign, without public criticism on them, as being in their matter inexpedient, or in their manner violent or harsh. And lastly, it claims to have the right of inflicting spiritual punishment, of cutting off from the ordinary channels of the Divine life, and of simply excommunicating those who refuse to submit themselves to its formal declarations. Such is the infallibility lodged in the Catholic Church, viewed in the concrete, as clothed and surrounded by the appendages of its high sovereignty. It is, to repeat what I said above, a supereminent prodigious power, sent upon earth to encounter and master a giant evil" [pp. 388, 389].

"Infallibility cannot act outside of a definite circle of thought, and it must in all its decisions, or DEFINITIONS, as they are called, profess to be keeping within it. The great truths of the moral law, of natural religion, and of Apostolical faith, are both its boundary and its foundation. It must not go beyond them, and it must ever appeal to them. Both its subject-matter and its articles in that subject-matter are fixed. This is illustration; it does not extend to statements, however sound and evident, which are mere logical conclusions from the Articles of the Apostolic depositum; again, it can pronounce nothing about the persons of heretics, whose works fall within its legitimate province. It must ever profess to be guided by Scripture and by tradition. It must refer to the particular Apostolic truth which it is enforcing, or (what is called) defining. Nothing, then, can be presented to me in time to come as part of the faith but what I ought already to have received, and have not actually received (if not) merely because it has not been told me. Nothing can be imposed upon me different in kind from what I hold already—much less contrary to it. The new truth promulgated, if it is to be called so, be at least homogeneous, cognate, viewed relatively to the old truth. It may be what I even have guessed, or it may be included in the Apostolic revelation; at least it will be of such a character that its thoughts readily concur in it or concur with it as soon as I hear it. Perhaps I have actually have always believed it, as a question which is now decided in my mind. It is that I am henceforth to believe that I have only been holding what the Apostles have before me" [pp. 392, 393]. The Pope tells us that the normal seat of the Church is the Pope in Ecumenical Council, and that there have been eight Ecumenical Councils, an average of one to a century. He founds an argument on the fact that the Popes on the whole have not been the greatest human genius; that it has been the great individuals, and not men in the highest sense, who have taken the lead in theology. It has been the special duty, he says, of the Pope, which Providence has called Rome to fulfil, by whilst opinion is growing. When it has grown, when all the matter has been decided, turned over and over, viewed from every side, then authority is called upon to give the decision at which the general mind of the Church has already arrived [p. 393].

This essay was written by the Pope in 1864. Six years later the Vatican Council, after strong opposition, formulated an article on Infallibility in the following language: "Therefore faithfully adhering to the tradition received from the beginning of Christian faith, for the glory of God the Father, the exaltation of the Catholic Church, and the salvation of Christian souls, the Sacred Council approving, we teach that it is a dogma divinely revealed, that the Roman Pontiff, when he speaks ex cathedra, that is, when in discharge of his office as pastor and doctor of all Christians, he defines by his extreme Apostolic authority, a doctrine regarding faith or morals, which is to be held by the universal Church, by the assistance promised to him in the Gospel [Luke xxii. 32], is possessed of that infallibility which the Divine Redeemer willed that the Church should be endowed for defining doctrine in faith or morals; and that therefore definitions of the Roman Pontiff are irreformable of themselves, and not from the consent of the Church. But if anyone, which may be said, presume to contradict this our decree, let him be anathema." [VATICAN COUNCIL, 1864, CHARTER, c. 4.]

The proclamation of this dogma produced some important results. It did not produce deep dissatisfaction within the Roman Church, but it led to the secession of the "Protestant Catholics," and to the German Falk Law, as well as to the bitterness between the Church and the Republic. Probably, however, it the Gallican theory of an inter-mibility, as exercised in an Ec-council. Neither theory can stand

Infant Communion was the common practice of the early Church. For this we have the authority of the Apostolic Constitutions (a work which, though not so old as it claims to be, almost certainly belongs to the ante-Nicene period, and is of great weight), of St. Cyprian in the third century, and of St. Augustine at the beginning of the fifth.
 The practice rested upon John vi. 53, and was indeed only consistent with the primitive view that regular and frequent reception of the Holy Communion was necessary for all believers, except catechumens and excommunicated persons ; and so the very youngest children directly after their baptism were admitted to communion, the bread being very often dipped into the wine for convenience sake. We have, moreover, a continuous stream of authorities to show that the custom lingered on more or less languidly in many parts of Western Christendom till the twelfth century at least. But it was at length formally condemned by the Council of Trent in the sixteenth century. In the Eastern Churches, on the other hand, it would seem still to be practised with certain modifications, for instance, in the Greek Church children under one year old are not communicated except in cases of dangerous sickness. We remark further in passing that this custom obviously dispensed with the need for the rite of confirmation (or laying on of hands), which was in fact originally nothing but the concluding ceremony at holy baptism. [CONFIRMATION and BAPTISM.]

Inferior Orders.—In the early Church, besides the three orders of bishop, priest, and deacon, there were other offices filled by men who occupied a sort of intermediate position between clergy and laymen. These "Inferior Orders," as they have been called, varied in number with time and place. Most frequently there were Readers and sometimes also Sub-Deacons, Exorcists, Ostiarium, Acolytes, and Singers. These orders might be conferred by priests, and were not considered as "orders" in the same sense as the three universal grades of the ministry.

Infidel.—One who is not among the fideles, the latter being one of the names given in ancient times to the disciples of Christ, and still kept in that sense in the Book of Common Prayer—s.g., "the souls of the faithful" in the Burial Service, and "a congregation of faithful men" in the 18th Article. Thus strictly, an infidel, in theological language, is an unbeliever in Christ's religion as a revelation from God. In the Collect for Good Friday it is synonymous with "pagan" or so much obscurity and doubt about the of baptizing proselytes and their t nothing can be proved or argued

"heathen." Jews are not there included, because they do not deny a Divine revelation, nor were Mahometans, seeing that even they acknowledge the God of Abraham as supreme. But in our present language the word is restricted to those who, having heard the proclamation of Christianity, reject and oppose it. The title would not justly be applied by Churchmen to a Unitarian who refused to accept the Creeds, seeing that he holds the faith that Christ was a teacher who came from God, however much may be lamented his interpretation of the Scriptural language concerning Him. Nor can it be fairly given to the natural philosopher, who places science in the forefront of his profession of faith, so long as he does not denounce the Christian faith as being untrue.

Infralapsarianism [Lat. infra, "below;" lapsus, "the fall"].—One of the doctrines held by the Calvinists, namely, that God created the world for His own glory, and chose a certain number for salvation, but, foreseeing the sinfulness of others, doomed them from the beginning to eternal punishment.

Ingham, BENJAMIN, was born in Yorkshire in 1712, and educated at Queen's College, Oxford, where he became acquainted with the two Wesleys. He was ordained in 1735, and began to work in London; but was soon prevailed upon to accompany the Methodists on their missionary journey to America. While there he was brought into union with the Moravians, and on his return to England joined the London Society in Fetter Lane. He finally became head of the Yorkshire Moravians, and preached in fields or barns. In 1740 Wesley was expelled from the society, so the former friends became separated. In 1741 Ingham married Lady Margaret Hastings, sister of Lord Huntingdon, and was thus brought into intimate connection with the COUNTESS OF HUNTINGDON [q.v.]. In 1753 he withdrew from the Moravians, and formed a sect of his own, assuming the position of "general overseer," or bishop. His followers received their members by lot, and required them to declare before the church their experience, that the whole society might judge of the change that had been wrought upon their hearts. About the year 1759 Ingham read the works of Glass and Sandeman [SANDEMANIANS], which impressed him so much that he sent two of his disciples to Scotland to investigate the principles of the sects, and they came back strong Sandemanians. This caused a division in Ingham's societies, which proved so bitter that only thirteen remained faithful to him out of eighty. Ingham died at Aberford in 1772, his end being probably hastened by the desertion of his followers. His sect still survives, but numbers only six societies.

Ingulphus, Abbot of Crowland, in Lincolnshire [b. in London about 1300, d. at Crowland, 1109]. He became in 1065 tary to William of Normandy, who, on accession to the English throne, made him Abbot of Crowland in 1076, and gave him lands and numerous privileges to the north. Meanwhile Ingulphus, had made a pilgrimage to the Holy Land in 1064, and on his return had become an inmate of the monastery of Fontenelle, in Normandy. His works rest chiefly on the supposed authenticity of the Historia Monasterii Croylandensis about 650 to 1091, which was afterwards continued by Peter of Blois to 1117, and by other authors to 1486. It has since been found that the first part, if any of it was written by Ingulphus, has been so largely interpolated that it is quite unreliable as a record. But probably the whole was written by monks of the thirteenth century.

Inheritor.—An heir; one who is to inherit. In baptism the Christian is called an "inheritor of the Kingdom of Heaven," as expressed in the baptismal service: "of everlasting salvation," and "in the Thine everlasting Kingdom."

Inhibition is a writ to forbid a party from further proceeding in a cause upon him. It commonly issues from a higher court to the inferior upon a writ of Inhibition pendente lite, or "during the trial," are notices which the bishop issues to any accused clerk, forbidding him to perform any services of the Church in his diocese till sentence shall have been pronounced. During a bishop's visitation all inferior officers are inhibited from exercising their offices.

Initiated.—A name applied to those who have been baptized Christians, and distinguished from catechumens and outsiders. A person before baptism had to undergo a probation, which, in some Churches, lasted three years. During this time he was forbidden to be present at the celebration of the Holy Communion; and though he was allowed to hear sermons, refer to the higher mysteries of our religion, yet he was made in terms unintelligible to him, so that he could not perfectly understand by the phrase of common occurrence in the service is "the initiated understand what"

Innocent III., Pope (Lotario), Count of Segni and of Tuscanum, member of the noble family of the Counts of Segni, born in 1160. He was educated at Paris, and Bologna, where he distinguished himself in philosophy, theology, and Law. After several preferments he was made Cardinal-Deacon by his successor, Clement III., in 1190. Day.—A festival held on nemoration of the massacre of the children at Bethlehem by Herod. Its origin is very ancient, but it was originally, and until the fifth century, connected with the Feast of the Epiphany. In England it was formerly called Childermas Day, and was celebrated with the use of muffled peals and other signs of mourning and processions of children. The latter were forbidden by a proclamation of Henry VIII. in 1540.

Inquisition, THE.—A tribunal in the Church of Rome for the trial and punishment of heretics. The first foundation of it was laid by Innocent III. in the year 1215, when he commissioned Father Dominic to judge and to deliver to punishment obstinate and relapsed heretics among the Albigenses. The result was that 30,000 persons of every age, sex, and condition were massacred. But the court of the Inquisition was not formally established till the Council of Toulouse, under Gregory IX., in 1229. By this Council a tribunal was erected in every city, consisting of a priest and three laymen, who were charged with the work of seeking out heretics and denouncing them to the bishops. In 1233 Gregory transferred the working of the Inquisition from the bishops to the Dominicans, who discharged their functions with great vigour. In 1263 Urban IV. appointed an Inquisitor-General, to whom reference might be made by his subordinates in all cases of doubt; and in 1542 Paul III., alarmed at the spread of Lutheran doctrine, appointed a committee of nine learned men for the reformation of Church discipline. This committee was reorganised, and its powers extended by Pius IV. in 1564. The new Council consisted of twelve cardinals as Inquisitors-General, and a number of other clergy, called consultors, with a Dominican as commissary, and it had power to appoint provincial inquisitors and to receive appeals. Princes and rulers were commanded by Pius V. to execute its orders. Sixtus V., in 1588, further perfected the organisation by increasing the numbers of the Council, and dividing it into fifteen congregations, to each of which a particular branch was assigned.

Spain, since 1483, had its own Grand Inquisitor, who was nominated by the King and appointed by the Pope. The post was first filled by the famous Tomas de Torquemada, under whom, in the first eighteen years of the Inquisition, 10,220 prisoners were burnt, and 97,321 imprisoned, exiled, or stripped of their property. The Grand Inquisitor named his own assistants, and from him there was no appeal, except to the King, who was bound by his coronation oath to submit to the laws of the Inquisition.

The prisoners of the Inquisition were never confronted with witnesses, but were imprisoned and tortured to make them confess and recant their error. The ceremony of pronouncing sentence, called an Auto da Fè

(Act of Faith) was solemn and imposing, and was performed in public. A procession was formed of the accused in order of their guilt: first came those who were to be discharged, wearing their ordinary dress, and separated from the condemned by a crucifix; then followed the bones and effigies of dead heretics, with inscriptions intimating their crimes; and, finally, the condemned, each clad in a yellow garment, called a San Benito, decorated with significant emblems. St. Andrew's crosses marked those who had escaped with their lives, red flames those who were threatened with burning if again convicted, whilst representations of devils amongst the flames covered the robes of those who were to suffer death. Thus apparelled, the prisoners were led before the Inquisitor, who "reluctantly" handed them over to the secular arm and delivered them to be burned. The Inquisition has been vindicated by the Church of Rome in our own day by the "Syllabus" of 1864, which asserts the right of the Church to use both the spiritual and temporal sword for the reclamation of heretics.

Inscriptions in Churches.—The eighty-second canon appoints "that the Ten Commandments be set up, and other chosen sentences written upon the walls of churches and chapels, in places convenient." The custom is one of great antiquity. In accordance with this canon, it is common to see the Creed, Lord's Prayer, and Ten Commandments painted upon the east wall of a church. The Canon, however, does not limit the inscriptions to any particular spot, and hence texts are sometimes emblazoned in other parts of the church.

Inspiration.—The nature of the Sacred Volume is a subject closely connected with all other theological subjects; the controversy arising out of it turns upon the question, "What are the boundary limits of the Divine and the human elements in Scripture?" or, put in another way, "In what sense is the Bible the Word of God? and how far was Dr. Williams justified when he called the Bible in the second of the Essays and Reviews, 'the devout voice of the congregation'?" It cannot be denied that the views formerly held by the bulk of Christians have been of late modified under two influences—viz. scientific investigation and increased knowledge of historical criticism. Few persons are found now-a-days who hold that the world was created in six days like ours, or that the Flood of Noah covered the Alps or Himalayas, or that the ark held two of each species of animals on the face of the globe. Galileo was condemned for teaching that the earth went round the sun, and many opinions which were held for a long time after him are now abandoned.

But it is no less true that the Bible is probably more revered now than it ever was. Vituperators and blasphemers there are still,

but they belong exclusively to the ignominious and vulgar. Men like Matthew Arnold and Professor Huxley are more or less opponents of current Christianity, but both of them have expressly declared that the religious principle, which is the essential basis of all religion, has been kept up by the use of the Bible.

A volume lying before us, entitled Orthodoxy: a Clerical Symposium, contains a number of essays written by prominent members of the various Christian bodies, published in successive numbers of the Magazine. The writers comprise three members of the Established Church, a Presbyterian, a Congregationalist, a Swedenborgian, a Wesleyan, a Jesuit, and a Roman Catholic bishop. The approximate date of these writers approximate date of having read through the volume, we find three main currents of thought on the important subject:—

[1] What we may call the orthodox view, i.e., the view received by the old religious people of this country, as expressed by the great standard divines: "The Bible is the Word of God." "If we are to judge of the Bible on its own terms, we shall be compelled to confess that it comes to us with Divine authority, as not only containing a Divine message, but as being in some sense the very instrument of that message." [Prof. S. Williams]. The writer we have just quoted presents a strong argument upon the recognition of the New Testament of the authority of our Lord "manifestly accepted the inspiration as a sacred and divine action, which could not in principle be denied, and an important fact be broken down; we cannot conceive Him to have been here without striking at the root of our reverence as the Son of God." He goes on further to argue that in the New Testament we cannot choose what we will, that there is an organic unity, which prevents our setting any part aside. A given his reasons for holding the New Testament to be of equal Divine authority, he concludes that the Bible "is the author of the way in which God communicates His will to man, and is the appointed instrument for making known that will."

[2] In contrast to this we take notice of the Rev. John Page Hopps, a Unitarian preacher. He rejects all idea of Divine inspiration for the writers, and declares that he has disclaimed "the Word of the Lord" as a kind of trivialities, and not a few of them. This, it will be confessed, is somewhat of a language, but in reading the essay we charge the writer with irreverence. He frankly declares that he desires to get rid of the notion that "the Bible is together a supernatural book, and the Word of God;" that it must be submitted to the verifying faculties of reason, of humanity, and our own reverent truth.

By that Spirit of God you will be saved from the tyranny of a dead letter which might not in the least degree make you infallible, or give the least authority to any assertion or yours about points respecting which Christians differ, but He will teach you all things which are necessary for your holiness here, and your eternal happiness hereafter. Your Bible is no homogeneous whole which dropped down from heaven. It consists of sixty-six different books, the work of at least forty or fifty different writers, writing in different languages and dialects, and separated from each other by hundreds of years. It is not a book, but a library of literature. Great parts of it are but the fragmentary wreck of a literature, from various books of which—now

no longer extant—many of its writers quote.
The Old Testament, of which a considerable portion is by unknown authors, extends over a thousand years. It is separated by four hundred and fifty years from the New Testament. The translation of it is not always correct; the exact meaning is not always ascertainable; the text is not always certain;
the meaning is not always clear; and the moral decisions which it contains are not always co-ordinate or comprehensible. But all this is a matter of no essential importance, seeing that in this Book, and above all in the Gospels, which record the life and teaching of the Saviour of the world, and in the epistles of the greatest preachers of that Gospel, you may find, not, indeed, a minute system about which you can dogmatise, or religious opinions which you can force on others with anathemas, but a moral and spiritual guidance which you cannot mistake. The end of the whole book is Christ. If it leads you to Christ its whole function is fulfilled. What is essential for rightly learning the way of salvation is not in the dead letter, which may only kill, but in the spirit, which giveth liberty and life. Do not hear or read it for any other end but to become better in your daily walk, and to be instructed in every good work, and to increase in the love and service of God."

dean, prebendary, or other dignitary in possession of his proper stall in the cathedral.

Institutio.—A book of occasional offices.

Institution.—The act of bestowing the spiritual charge of a parish or other benefice, while induction bestows the temporalities.

"Institution of a Christian Man."

—The title of a book commonly called "The Bishops' Book," published in 1537, as a standard of doctrine for the English Church. It is supposed to have proceeded from the pen of Stephen Coynet, Bishop of Winchester. It contained an explanation of the Creed, the Seven Sacraments, the Ten Commandments, the Lord's Prayer, and the Ave Maria, with articles on Justification and Purgatory. A revised edition was published in 1543, under the title of A Necessary Doctrine and Erudition for any Christian Man.

Intention.—A Dogma of the Church of Rome, asserting that a sacrament is of no value unless administered with the intention of the officiating priest. It is distinctly laid down in the Eleventh Canon of the Council of Trent [1545], which says: "If anyone say that there is not required in the ministers while they perform and confer the sacraments at least the intention of doing what the Church does, let him be accursed." As a consequence of this doctrine, the recipients of the sacraments are exposed to doubt and uncertainty. For example, a person cannot be certain that he has been properly baptised, although he has been through the form of baptism, for the intention of the priest may have been wanting; and a similar insecurity attends the reception of the Eucharist. The doctrine is opposed by the Church of England in the Twenty-sixth Article of Religion, where it is declared that the unworthiness of ministers hindereth not the effect of sacraments, "forasmuch as they do not the same in their own name, but in Christ's, and do minister by His commission and authority."

Interdict.—An ecclesiastical sentence placing a kingdom or district under a ban, forbidding the performance of Divine Service and the administration of the sacraments (except private baptism). Interdicts were invented for the punishment, through their subjects, of princes who were powerful enough to resist excommunication and anathema. They do not appear before the ninth century. In A.D. 869 Hincmar, Bishop of Laon, attempted to lay his diocese under an interdict, but his dictum was set aside by his Archbishop, the elder Hincmar. The first known instance of the actual enforcing of an interdict is that of Alduinus, Bishop of Limoges, who laid his diocese under such a censure in A.D. 994. Ivo of Chartres, who died in 1215, characterises the expedient as a novel one. In the year 1208 all England was laid under an interdict by Innocent III., and the sentence was rigidly enforced. The church bells were silent, public worship was stopped, and the dead were buried without service. The publication of interdicts, however, as time went on became less and less frequent, their use evidently tending to produce ungodliness, and revolt against the authority pronouncing them.

Intercessions.—Prayers half of others. Thus the prayer anthem in morning and evening which we pray for the Queen, clergy, etc., are known as the Prayers. The name is more properly applied to the prayers for others which are accompanied by the words, "beseech Thee to hear us, good Lord."

Interim.—A name given to the Interim of Charles V. concerning the German Church, until a council could be held. There were three such interims. The first was the Interim of a commission held at Ratis in 1541, when Melancthon, Bucer, and the one hand, Eck, Pflug, and the other, had a discussion of the sacrament and the power of the keys. The parties were found to be at variance. The second was prepared at Regensburg in 1548. Pflug, Helding, and others drew up a paper containing points of difference between Catholics and Protestants. It was objected that the use of the cup by the laity, the marriage of the priests, and a few other matters should be conceded to the Protestants, but that in other points they should adhere to "the Universal Church." This was objected to, and was rejected. The third interim was adopted at Speyer Dec. 22nd, 1548, by the Elector Maurice of Saxony. It was a compromise between Catholicism and Protestantism, but adhered to Catholic doctrines, and approved of popes and bishops when not in error. It led to a strife among the Protestants, Melancthon, Bergerhagen, and Major, who rejected the interim, while others were in favor of it.

Interludes.—A term formerly used for the sacred theatricals or miracle plays, only applied to passages of music played between the verses or hymns.

Intermediate State. [1]

Interstices or Interstices.—A term formerly used in ecclesiastical law to denote the spaces of time which must elapse between the degrees of promotion from one order to another. The Canon was fixed by the Council of Sardica, and was followed by the Council of Trent, as the clergy were obliged to pass through the lower orders before attaining to the higher. Later it became customary to pass through the degrees at once, and though the Council of Trent ordained that interstices should be at least a year's duration, the bishops have a power of dispensation.

Intinction.—The mode of administering the Holy Communion in the East. The bread is broken into small pieces, and dipped in the wine, and presented to the communicant in a spoon. The custom is still in use in the East probably since the

But a new school of Intuitionists has arisen in the nineteenth century, to be accounted for by the altered conditions which are the results of fuller historical criticisms and scientific discovery. The believer in the Divine authority of the Church and the truth of the Creeds remains as he was in the conviction that from the very nature of the case no questionings can touch these. But those who deny the binding authority of any external revelation have no such conviction, though those who are religious and desire to see the world made better cannot acquiesce in negations. Hence we have such writers as Emerson and Carlyle, each in his way an Intuitionist of the new school. Carlyle, however, with his historical instinct, put aside his questionings in pursuit of historic facts; Emerson was religious above all things besides, however dreamy and un-practical. According to him, it might be said that man is his own teacher, his own Bible, practically his own God. [EMERSON; PANTHEISM.]

Invention of the Cross. [CROSS.]

Investiture.—The great controversy about investiture which arose in the twelfth century was the question whether a bishop should be installed by the Pope or by the Sovereign of his own country. In early times it had been the custom that the clergy and people of a vacant diocese should elect their own bishop, the election being confirmed by the bishops of the province. Confirmation by the emperors was only necessary in the patriarchal Sees, such as Rome and Constantinople. In France the Sovereigns often took it upon themselves to nominate to vacant Sees. But though unable to consecrate newly-made bishops, the Sovereigns had the power to grant or withhold the estates, titles, etc., without which the bishop was unable to maintain the state which was necessary. Charlemagne introduced the practice of investing him with the staff and ring, which were the symbols of his spiritual office; but Gregory VII. objected to this as uncanonical, maintaining that it was right that all the temporal benefits of the office should be annexed to the spiritual, and that the two should be inseparable. This contest was carried on by the successors of Gregory for fifty-six years, and was not settled until the Council of Worms was held in 1122, when the Emperor Henry V. and Pope Calixtus II. made a compromise, agreeing that the elections should be made in accordance with the laws of the Church, but that the consent of the emperor was necessary. It was also arranged that the Pope should invest the bishop with spiritual power, and the sovereign should confer the temporalities. Until Anselm became Archbishop of Canterbury, the King of England and the Primate had acted in concert as regarded their agreement with the Pope's pretensions; but on Anselm's promotion there came a quarrel, as he requested that he might be invested by Pope Urban II. At this time there were two popes, as the German Emperor had set up a rival at Avignon, and the King had not yet made up his mind which he would acknowledge. This made the King determine that Anselm should not have his will, and the question was finally settled by the Pope's Legate, who effected a compromise by placing the pall on the altar, so that Anselm might take it, neither the Pope nor the King being concerned. Anselm then demanded permission to go to Rome to lay the question before the Pope. William threatened that if he did so he should forfeit his archbishopric; but Anselm persisted, and the threat was fulfilled. Before his return William died, and Henry I. succeeded him. Anselm was welcomed back to England; but, on the proposal of the King to re-invest him with the primacy, he refused, saying that he would not receive his office except at the hands of the Pope. The contest lasted for a long time, and Henry did his utmost to conciliate Anselm, sending embassies to the Pope to find some way of satisfying the conscience of the Archbishop without giving way. To this the Pope replied by a declaration that he refused to permit investiture by the King, intimating, nevertheless, that he would not interfere if Henry chose to take his own course. Anselm was offered the alternative of submitting to his Sovereign or of leaving the kingdom, and he chose the latter, upon which the King took his archbishopric. Anselm was on the point of excommunicating him, but Henry suggested that a compromise should be proposed to the Pope—namely, that the bishops should do homage to their King and take the oath of fealty, but that they should be invested by the Pope with the pastoral staff and ring. This decision was confirmed by a Council held in London in 1107, and thus the question was settled.

Invisibles.—A name given to some of the Reformers who denied the perpetual visibility of the Church, and in answer to the inquiry of Romanists as to the whereabouts of the Church before the time of Luther, asserted that it was invisible.

Invitatory is a short anthem which varies with the season, sung before the 95th (or Invitatory) Psalm, and repeated in whole or in part several times in the course of the Psalm and after the Gloria Patri at the end. In the Roman Offices this Psalm, with its proper invitatory, is said daily at Nocturns as "an invitation to praise God." In the English Church this same Psalm is ordered to be said daily at morning prayer, except on Easter day (and, by a recent Convocation, through the octave), when special anthems are provided; but the Invitatory does not vary, being fixed throughout the year in the form of versicle and response:—"V. the Lord. R. The Lord's name be praised." The origin of this use of the 95th is said to be as old as the Temple serv

Invocation of Saints.—The practice of calling upon the souls of departed saints for their intercession and aid began in the Church about the fourth century. It arose from the great veneration for martyrs. The remains of the old practice, that the souls of the dead haunted the places where their bodies were buried led the faithful first to resort to their graves to beg for intercession; in the course of time the practice of visiting the graves and the cemeteries were discontinued, while the practice of invoking the saints was retained. Invocations of Saints appear in the liturgies of the sixth century, and in all the ancient liturgies to that date, and three of these were incorporated in the English version of the Litany in 1544. The doctrine of the Church on this point is contained in the XXII.

Invocations.—A calling up for prayer. It is generally considered as the first part of that necessary duty, and consists of [1] A making mention of one or more titles of God, indicative of the object of our prayer. [2] A declaration of our dependence on His assistance and acceptance under the merits of His blood. [3] A declaration of our own unworthiness. The Litany is a form of prayer with a separate invocation of each of the Persons of the Trinity, and then an invocation of the whole Godhead, as if to bespeak a merciful God that we may be blessed with His answer to all the petitions which we present.

Iona or Icolmkill, one of the western islands of Scotland, 10 miles in length, and one to one and a half in breadth, is famed for many monuments of antiquity, but especially as having been the residence of St. COLUMBA [q.v.], who came here in 563. There are on the island the ruins of St. Mary's Nunnery, the remains of a great number of chapels, and a great number of churches recently built, some by the Kings and others by the petty kings of the Isles. The Bishops of the Isles resided here until the English had taken the island. Amongst the ancient ruins is a burial place where not only all the nobility were interred, but forty-four Scotch, and eight Norwegian kings.

Ireland, CHURCH OF.—The origin of an organised Church in Ireland is due to St. PATRICK [q.v.]. It seems little doubt that Christianity existed still earlier. He began his mission in 432, and in 472 he made Armagh the seat of an archbishopric, and in 492, he left a body of carry on his work. The Church was essentially monastic, to be famous down to the day for the number of pious men to which it gave birth, being a source from which light burst forth to illuminate the world of Europe. Bede tells us in the seventh century many of the clergy and nobles came to instruction; and Burgundy, the Netherlands all owed knowledge of Divine truth to them. Until after the eleventh century the Church remained independent, though many attempts had been made to bring her to Papal authority. But the power of the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Romanising tendency of MALACHY [q.v.] was just then in its influence, and by his means he was elected at Wells in 1152, where he asserted a stricter diocesan jurisdiction against Romish practices. Three years later [1155] the only English Pope, Adrian IV, assumed the right of authority and issued a Bull by which he subjected Henry II. on condition of the union of the Irish Church to Rome. Henry completed his conquest and called a council of the Irish clergy at Cashel, at which it was agreed that the rites and ceremonies of the Church should be ordered so as to agree with the Church of Rome. Henceforth the established doctrine was Roman, continued till the time of the Reformation. For two centuries before the Reformation contests were carried on between the Irish clergy and the English, the two parties struggling for supremacy in ecclesiastical matters. The English occupied vacant Irish Sees mostly with Englishmen, and the Irish acted as if they were to be delivered from allegiance and owe submission to the Pope in the reign of Henry VII. English settlers carried over with them their Catholicism, but they did not lose their English soil.

Henry, having obtained the compliance of his subjects with his conduct, resolved to extend it also to Ireland. He called together the clergy and laity in view of getting them to acknowledge the King's supremacy over the Church. It was not such an easy matter to do; the Irish looked on it as a usurpation of the power which they claimed for themselves. Their opposition they were met by the Archbishop of Armagh. The first letter of the King was George Abbot, Bishop of Dublin, who, for a long time, had been teaching doctrines subversive of Papal authority, and by whose advice Henry summoned a Parliament to enforce his wishes. This Parliament met at Dublin in 1536, when the Royal Supremacy was sanctioned, and Protestantism declared, by law, to be the religion of Ireland. Several of the chieftains headed an insurrection to oppose it, but without avail, and they had to remain passive during the remainder of Henry's reign. With the accession of Edward VI., and the pressing on them of the new Liturgy, they made fresh struggles, but all vacant charges were promptly filled by Reformed ministers, and thus the Protestant influence was strengthened. When in Queen Mary's reign the Roman Catholic Faith was restored, the Protestants did not suffer the same persecution as in England. In 1560 Queen Elizabeth summoned an Irish Parliament to re-enforce Protestantism, the Act of Uniformity obliged the use of the Book of Common Prayer, and it was forbidden to hold Divine Service in the Irish tongue. The Reformation took no hold on the feelings of Irish churchmen, and the reign of Elizabeth is the history of a series of rebellions, which were abetted by the Pope, but proved unsuccessful. When James I. succeeded, the Romish party in Ireland fancied that he was secretly attached to their Church, and proceeded to exercise their form of worship openly in defiance of the established law; but James ordered all Roman priests to leave the country, unless they chose to conform. The northern chiefs rebelled, and their land in Ulster was confiscated to the Crown; James took advantage of this to introduce Scotch settlers there, and thus laid the foundation of the Presbyterian Church in Ireland. He called together an Irish Parliament in the hope of putting an end to the religious dissensions in the country, and while it was sitting a convocation of clergy was held in Dublin, and in 1615 a public confession of faith for the Established Church of Ireland was drawn up by Archbishop Ussher of Armagh. Ussher desired, in common with others, that some points not mentioned in the Thirty-nine Articles of the Church of England should be mentioned in the Confession of the Church of Ireland, and that other points should be mentioned more fully, and they considered this might be done without breach of agreement. Accordingly Ussher drew up these new Articles, numbering no less than one hundred and four, containing passages from the Homilies and the Catechism, besides others not found in either. Thus they declare that the Pope is the man of sin spoken of by St. Paul in 2 Thessalonians. After quoting our 11th Article on justification, they add: "Christ is now the righteousness of all them that truly do believe in Him. He for them paid the ransom by His death. He for them fulfilled the law in His life: so that now in Him and by Him every true Christian man may be called a fulfiller of the Law." The 7th Article, on election to eternal life, is supplemented by the additional doctrine of reprobation to death. These Articles are now mere matter of history, for whatever force they may have had as long as the Church of Ireland remained a separate body—that is, down to the year 1800—this authority passed away when the English and Irish Churches were united. But, in fact, this authority soon received a severe blow from the hands of Ussher himself; for during Strafford's Viceroyalty, Laud being anxious to bring the Irish Church into the strictest conformity with the English, prevailed on Ussher to receive the Thirty-nine Articles as the Irish Confession, the latter, however, retaining the Irish Articles as a commentary on the Thirty-nine, and in his own diocese requiring his candidates for orders to pass an examination in them.

Charles I.'s government of Ireland was very vacillating; the people at heart were devoted to the Church of Rome, and at length, in 1641, an alarming rebellion broke out among the Papists, and they massacred the Protestants in the north. The survivors, who were mostly Scotch, applied to the Church of Scotland for a supply of ministers, and this led, in June, 1642, to the holding of the first Presbytery of the Presbyterian Church of Ireland. Many of the episcopal clergy joined the Presbytery. Meantime the Romanists held a counter-meeting in Kilkenny, and adopted resolutions for securing the exercise of their religion, and they resolved to carry on the war in Ulster under General O'Neil. Charles being distracted with troubles at home made terms with them, which gave them the impression that he secretly favoured their views. Then, in 1644, came an order that all should be made to subscribe to the Solemn League and Covenant. Throughout the remainder of Charles's reign the history of the Irish Church and of Ireland herself is one long series of struggles and misery. In 1649 Cromwell went over to Ireland, and for a time things were more satisfactory; the Presbyterians gained the upper hand, and though Cromwell forbade them to celebrate Mass, the Roman Catholics were not persecuted. During the short time that Henry Cromwell governed Ireland much was done to promote the tranquillity of the Church, and the Presbytery of Ulster took the opportunity of this unusual quietude to settle ministers into vacant posts. Charles II.'s policy undid much of this; he restored prelacy and the Liturgy, denounced the Covenant, and refused toleration to Nonconformists. The bishops chosen by him took possession of their Sees and turned out the Presbyterian ministers. In 1672, however, Charles granted small pensions to these ejected ministers. James II., who succeeded in 1685, was bent on establishing Popery once more in Ireland; and to encourage the established clergy to the Church of Rome, they were allowed their benefices, even after leaving the Established Church. Then James issued a declaration of Liberty of Conscience, which afforded relief from persecution to the Presbyterians. When the Revolution of 1688 took place, the Presbyterians of Ulster, William and Mary with great joy, standing that King James had landed in Ireland and commanded all the Roman Catholics to interest. The Protestants were driven towards till Derry was their only city, and here they maintained their ground for one hundred and five days against the army until they raised the siege. William conferred on the Presbyterians of Ulster many privileges. After the death of the Boyne, in 1691, a treaty was concluded at Limerick, by which the Roman Catholics were secured all rights which they had enjoyed under Charles I. The Protestant Episcopal Church was jealous of the Presbyterians, and consequently opposed them, and called in question the legality of the services performed by them, and urged that they should be forced to use the Burial Service of the Liturgy. The King expressed his disapproval of this conduct, but without producing any effect. He died in 1701, and Anne put herself into the hands of the Church party, who were strongly opposed to the Presbyterians of Ulster. Then a Bill passed, requiring all persons in office, civil or ecclesiastical, to take the oath of abjuration, and this was done by most Presbyterian ministers; but some refused, and were called Nonjurors. Next came a Bill to prevent the progress of Popery, one of its clauses required all persons in office to receive the Sacrament according to the Established Church within three months from their appointment, and this excluded the Presbyterians from holding public office. This was called the Seven Years' Test. But, in spite of all opposition the Presbyterian Church continued to exist, though the penal laws were vigorously enforced. The accession of George I. was welcomed by the Presbyterians as it secured them civil and religious freedom, and they appealed to have the Test Act removed, to have an Act of Toleration granted. Irish bishops prevailed against this, and in 1719, however, a Toleration Act was passed in order to provide for the admission of Presbyterians into the army, as they felt that they were needed in the event of a landing in Ireland of the Pretender. In 1727 the Presbyterian Church was divided by a split in her party; the Presbyterians of Antrim, after much discussion, refused to sign the Westminster Confession, which had hitherto been its standard, and an immense emigration of the aged population took place to America: 1

Irenæus.—The greatest Christian writer of the second century. The date and place of his birth are unknown, but from his letter to Florinus, a Presbyter at Rome, it is gathered that he was an Asiatic Greek, and was taught in his childhood by St. Polycarp and by Papias, who had both been disciples of St. John. He became a presbyter in the Church of Lyons, and on the martyrdom of the aged Bishop Pothinus was elected his successor, A.D. 178. [LYONS, MARTYRS OF.] The controversy respecting the time of keeping Easter was going on at this period; and there is extant a letter from Irenæus to Victor, Bishop of Rome, remonstrating with him for his want of charity in excommunicating those who disagreed with him.

But the chief work of Irenæus is his book against heresies. He saw the Church deeply afflicted by them, and he classified them as a physician would diseases, preparing the remedies with care that his heretical patients might be healed, whilst they suffered as little as possible. His five books, entitled A Refutation and Subversion of Gnosis, falsely so called, was originally written in Greek, of which the original is lost except in many quotations of subsequent Fathers, but a Latin translation has come down to us. The first book is wholly occupied with a statement of the various heresies which are confuted in the remainder. Much information concerning ancient Church government is contained in this work. There are many noble sentences well worthy of remembrance, e.g. "Ever speaking well of the deserving, and never ill of the undeserving, we attain to the glory of God." He is also the author of a letter to Florinus Concerning Monarchy, in which he proves that God is not the author of evil; and of another to Blastus On Schisms; besides a treatise On Knowledge, addressed to the Gentiles, and several "dissertations." Irenæus died in the reign of Severus, in the beginning of the third century. He is generally supposed to have been martyred.

There was another Irenæus, Bishop of Sirmium in the fourth century. He was tortured and beheaded in the Diocletian persecution, A.D. 304.

Irene, Empress of Constantinople, wife of Leo IV., was born in Athens about 752. It is said that she poisoned her husband, having been banished from court for trying to bring in the worship of images. Her son, Constantine VI., was only nine years old at the death of his father in 780, and she was appointed regent during his minority. In 787 she procured at the Council of Nice the re-establishment of image worship. Constantine, in 790, being of age, would no longer endure that his mother should reign with him, and for seven years he ruled alone; but the Empress, enraged at this affront, got her son seized by craft and put out his eyes—an action so barbarous that, according to Theophanes, the heavens themselves seemed amazed at it, the sun being obscured for seventeen days over the city. She reigned till 802, when Nicephorus, having proclaimed himself Emperor, banished her to the island of Mitylene, where she died the following year. She was a politic woman, and, fearing the growing power of Charlemagne, gave him hopes of a marriage, by which means the Empire of the East would have come into his hands; it is said his ambassadors were at Constantinople at the time of her banishment.

Irenicon [Gr. irene, "peace"]. — A work written with the object of restoring broken unity. The title has been given to several works in different periods of the Church, and the object aimed at should be dear to all Christian people—the unity of spirit of Christian men, if their organic reunion cannot be compassed. An irenicon aims to set forth all common grounds, and to minimise differences or to show their comparative unimportance. The German Kirchentag, the Evangelical Alliance, the Home Reunion Society, the Association for the Promotion of the Unity of Christendom, are all indications of the yearning of Christians to find peace after warfare, to unite in the bonds of one brotherhood in Christ against the sin and oppression and selfishness which are the real enemies of mankind. The well-known saying, "In necessariis unitas, in dubiis libertas, in omnibus caritas," has done much good in softening asperities, and the more we learn to act upon it, the brighter will the hope grow that our differences will, in God's good time, disappear.

Irons, WILLIAM JOSIAH, a learned divine of the Church of England [b. 1813, d. 1883], was the son of a celebrated Congregational minister at Camberwell, was educated at Queen's College, Oxford, ordained in 1833, and became D.D. in 1854. He held two incumbencies before he became vicar of Brompton, where he began a distinguished literary career. Among his most important works are The Church of all Ages, The Bible and its Interpreters, a Defence of the Church of England, addressed to Dr. Newman, and many controversial pamphlets. For some years he was editor of the Literary Churchman. He became rector of St. Mary Woolnoth, City, in 1872, and ceased not from zealous work until prostrated by illness in 1882. His line was that of the old-fashioned High Churchman, and he viewed with deep dislike any approach to Rationalism. He was one of the promoters of the Cleric against Essays and Reviews. But better remembered in coming times is his familiar translation of the Dies Irae. In many other well-known hymns during his dying hours he begged that any one should feel free to make use of any of his hymns on the condition of making no alteration in

Irving, EDWARD [b. 1792, d. 1834] was one of the most celebrated preachers of the nineteenth century. His birthplace was Annan, in Dumfriesshire; he was educated at the University of Edinburgh, and in 1811 appointed to the mathematical school at Haddington. In the following year removed to Kilmarnock to instruct the higher classes. Having completed his curriculum for the ministry, he was ordained in 1819, assistant to Dr. Chalmers, in the parish of Glasgow. Here he gained a high reputation, and on a vacancy occurring in the ministry of the Caledonian Church, Cross Street, Hatton Garden, he was called to undertake it. Here he soon attracted large congregations, not less by the eloquence of his discourses than by the singularity of his appearance and manner of delivery, that his chapel was crowded by the aristocracy of rank and fashion to such a degree that it became necessary to admit every one on a ticket, and carriages reached through the streets. This tide of popularity, however, decreased almost as suddenly as it had risen when the novelty began to wear. His style, expressed in the manner of Jeremy Taylor, and the old divines, embellished with the metaphors of philosophers, was very ornate, and fresh piquancy by means of personal allusions and homely truths. Irving's more ardent admirers built him a church in Cross Street, Regent Square, which was opened in 1829, but before that time his popularity was gone; already his more discreet friends seem to have discerned an appearance of a reality, of sensationalism in his career. The publication of his Oracles of God, and that he was more indebted to his powerful powers of delivery than to original matter. Hardly was he established in his new pulpit, when his peculiar tenets urged him to the adoption of doctrines which caused him to be charged with heresy, and at a meeting of the Presbytery of London, Nov. 29th, 1830, the report of a committee appointed to examine his Christ's Humanity was read. Irving was charged with holding Christ guilty of actual sin, and denying the doctrine of the Atonement. For eighteen months the proceedings were prolonged, during which he adopted a fresh novelty, that of "known tongues." [IRVINGITES.] The trustees of his church completed their report on May 3rd, 1832, and he was depos-declared with great eloquence that the super- natural nature of the manifestation was obvious, full of majesty and grandeur, and such as those which astonished the witnesses of the first Pentecost. Meanwhile Irving was deposed from the ministry of the Scottish Church, and removed, with such remains of the congregation as still held to him, first to a room in Gray's Inn Lane, and afterwards to one in Newman Street, which had once been the studio of Benjamin West. Here the "Catholic Apostolic Church" was organised. The room was fitted up in obedience to what were supposed to be inspired utterances. Instead of a pulpit there was a raised platform, to contain about fifty persons, the ascent to which was by several steps. In front of it were seven seats; that in the centre was for the angel, the others for six elders. Below these were seven other seats for prophets, four of whom were women. Below these, again, were seven deacons. But the great feature was that the utterances commanded the appointment of twelve apostles, several of whom were prophets. The angel ordered the service, exposition was the work of the elders, after whom came the prophets speaking in utterance. There were sixty evangelists, antitypes of the sixty pillars of the tabernacle. Soon after the completion of the arrangements Irving died. He had been an angel, but not one of the twelve apostles. An angel was appointed in his place, and there was no break in the new Church. In 1835 other congregations had been formed in London to the number of seven, and the analogy of Rev. ii. and iii. was pronounced complete. At first an utterance bade the apostles go into all the world to preach, but afterwards they were ordered to go to Albury, near Guildford, for study and consultation. In 1836 they presented their "testimony" to the Archbishop of Canterbury, then to the King and the other Sovereigns of Europe, then to the Pope. In 1838 the apostles, in obedience to another utterance, went on the Continent for two years, but were recalled in 1840 to settle some disputes which had arisen in the council. The end of it was that they suspended the council, which has not met since. One of the apostles seceded; the others, all but one, have since died. In 1842 a liturgy was published, "combining the excellencies of all preceding liturgies." It is founded on that of the Church of England, but is much more elaborate. Thus, while there are three forms of Communion Service, there are also forms for "Removing the Holy Sacrament," for the "Benediction of Holy Water," "Before a Council," "Before a Visitation," thirty-seven services for special occasions, and twelve for private occasions, such as the "benediction of a house," "of a ship," "of holy oil," etc. The anointing of the sick with oil was not introduced until 1847, and the Reservation of the Sacrament in an appropriate tabernacle to be taken by the angel and

"proposed before the Lord at morning and evening service," not until 1850. The latest addition was in 1852, when two lights upon the altar, and seven before it, were ordered, and incense was to be burnt during prayer. It will thus be seen that the ritual of this Church is of an elaborate and imposing character. The dress, as every other part of the worship, is highly symbolic; thus the prophets wear blue stoles, typical of the skies, the source of their inspiration; the evangelists wear red, to represent the blood of the cross, which forms the basis of the gospel which they preach. Each congregation is presided over by an angel or bishop, the two offices being held to mean the same thing, and under him are the priests and deacons. They have a magnificent church in Gordon Square, to which the Newman Street congregation removed in 1853, and their churches generally are handsome. The members belong, for the most part, to the wealthy classes, the movement having made but little progress among the poor. They are remarkably zealous and eager to proselytise, and their consistency to their opinions, in regular attendance on their worship, as well as in their self-denial and deeds of charity, is such as members of any communion might rejoice to emulate. They regard it as a sacred duty to pay a tithe of their substance to the service of God. In any place where there are a certain number of members they build a church, but in other places they are among the most constant and devout members of the Church of England congregations. The often deferred announcement of Christ's Advent will probably account for the non-increase of their numbers, but the zeal to gather fresh members seems to be as strong as ever in the most fervid. They are numerous in Germany, and there are also congregations in France and Switzerland, as well as in America. The last census of religious worship [1882] returned forty-seven registered places of worship in England and Wales.

Isidore, St., of Alexandria, was a celebrated hermit, born in Egypt A.D. 318, and renowned for his learning and austerities. A disciple of St. Athanasius, who had ordained him priest, he was a strenuous opponent of Arianism. He became the friend and confidant of Theophilus, Bishop of Alexandria, who wished to advance him to the Bishopric of Constantinople in opposition to St. Chrysostom. It was probably the same Isidore who, in 401, occupied the post of Hospitaller at Alexandria, an office which charged him with the relief of the poor and of strangers. He incurred the displeasure of Theophilus by opposing him in the attempted misuse of a sum of money dedicated to the poor. The Bishop was vindictive, and accused the old man—now over eighty years of age—of crimes said to have been committed years before, and supported the charge by the evidence of a paper which he professed had been mislaid for eighteen years. Isidore fled into the desert of Nitria with a number of monks, but the relentless Theophilus followed him, and they were compelled to seek a refuge in Palestine, whence they were also dislodged. Finally they placed themselves under the protection of Chrysostom at Constantinople. Chrysostom's efforts to bring about a reconciliation, combined with the jealousy of Theophilus against the See of "New Rome," to draw the anger of the latter upon himself, and led at last to his banishment. Isidore died at Constantinople in 408.

Isidore, Abbot of Pelusium, a great ascetic and church reformer, died about the year 480. Two thousand of his letters are extant.

Isidore of Seville succeeded his brother Leander as Archbishop of that city in 578. He gained an extraordinary reputation for learning, and wrote a large number of books, which were widely read throughout Europe. The Venerable Bede was engaged on a translation of Isidore's works at the time of his death. His chief works were—an encyclopedic compilation in twenty books; a chronological compendium, from the Creation to 626; a history of the Goths; a book on ecclesiastical writers, and several commentaries. To him were formerly ascribed the "Isidorian Decretals," on which so many of the extravagant claims of the Popes were based. But it has now been proved conclusively that they are forgeries. Italian Architecture.—Gothic Architecture [q.v.] began to lose its purity about the end of the fifteenth century, when Classical features were introduced, attributable to the revival of Pagan learning in Europe. The change was less marked in England than on the Continent, where the Classical style obtained preeminence, and Michael Angelo adopted it for the magnificent Cathedral of St. Peter's. Italian architecture became from that time the prevalent style until the revival of Gothic in our own century.

"Ite, missa est" [literally, "Go; it is a dismissal"], the formula which was anciently used to dismiss the catechumens before the Holy Mysteries were celebrated. In some Liturgies the formula is, "Let us go on in the peace of the Lord." [MASS.]

Itinerary.—A form of prayer which is used by Roman Catholic clergy when about to start on a journey. It consists of the Benedictus, an antiphon, preces, and two collects which are taken from the Gregorian Sacramentary. The itinerary is not found in the older Breviaries, but in an ancient Pontifical there is one similar to, but rather longer than that used at present.

A sect which arose in the ear 450. They held the Monophysite doctrine, i.e. that there is but one nature in Christ, the human nature being so absorbed into the Divine that Christ was not perfect man. This heresy was condemned at the Council of Chalcedon in 451, and Dioscorus, Patriarch of Alexandria, its originator, deposed. But on the death of the Emperor Marcian, who had taken the side of the orthodox, a Monophysite named Timothy Œluerus, called also "The Cat," caused himself to be consecrated Patriarch of Alexandria in 457, and ever since the Monophysites have maintained their possession of the Patriarchate. Proterius, the orthodox patriarch, was savagely murdered by the mob. At the same time the Monophysites set up a succession of bishops throughout Palestine, and gradually outnumbered the orthodox Christians in both countries; they spread rapidly also in Armenia. The tenets of the sect were modified somewhat by Timothy, and again about the year 520 by Severus, who taught that the human nature in Christ was not altogether lost, but rather amalgamated with the Divine, retaining certain of its qualities, but still not a perfect human nature. These modifications, however, caused divisions, and the sect was much weakened and depressed in consequence. But a great leader and propagator of their opinions arose in Jacobus Baradaeus, Bishop of Edessa [541—578]. Principally by his exertions the sect spread rapidly throughout Syria and Egypt, and henceforth they took their name from their great leader and were called Jacobites. At the conquest of Egypt by the Mahometans they were established as the recognised Christian Church of that country; they are known in Egypt also under the name of Copts. At the present time they possess three patriarchates, viz. Alexandria, Antioch, and Armenia. The Church of Abyssinia holds communion with the Coptic Church of Egypt. With the exception of their views regarding the nature of Christ, the Jacobites are in general agreement with the orthodox Eastern Church. [See also EASTERN CHURCH, MONOPHYSITES.]

Jacobson, WILLIAM [b. 1803, d. 1883], Bishop of Chester. His father was a mercantile clerk at Yarmouth, and was lost at sea when his son was an infant. The boy was brought up as a Nonconformist, but his views were of such a character that he was advised by the Principal of Mill Hill College, Birmingham, to study for the ministry of the Church of England. He went to Exeter College, Oxford, being befriended by a rich and liberal banker of Yarmouth, Mr. Dawson Turner, a member of the Society of Friends. He afterwards married Miss Dawson Turner. Among his earlier friends was Frederick Denison Maurice, who was indebted to Dr. Jacobson for timely pecuniary aid, proffered with the utmost delicacy and good feeling at a critical period of his life. In 1848 Dr.

Jacobson, who had held the office of Public Orator for six years, was appointed Regius Professor of Divinity. To this chair was attached a canonry at Christ Church, and also at that time and for some years afterwards the rectory of Ewelme, in Oxfordshire, though in the latter case a separation has since been effected. Dr. Jacobson was Regius Professor till 1865. His lectures were remarkable rather for solidity than brilliancy, and the honourable epithet of "Judicious," which belongs of right to a father of the English Church, would probably best represent the impression he made on the successive generations of candidates for holy orders who attended his lectures in the Latin Chapel of the cathedral. He was however, the active and astute chairman of Mr. Gladstone's Election Committee in 1865, when that gentleman was defeated by Mr. Gathorne-Hardy, and went away "unmuzzled" to Lancashire. Very shortly afterwards Dr. Graham, Bishop of Chester, died, and Lord Palmerston nominated Dr. Jacobson to the see. Lord Palmerston himself died in the October of the same year [1865], and Dr. Jacobson, therefore, was the last of his Episcopal appointments. Dr. Jacobson administered his diocese with discretion, moderation, and tact, and conferred on it in troublous times the distinction, so coveted by nations, of an uneventful history. To make no enemies, to stand aloof from controversy, and to retain the attachment of all his friends was his happy fortune. His reputation was firmly established in the kindly memories of many generations of Oxford men long before he became Bishop of Chester in 1865. He belongs to the generation which witnessed the Tractarian movement from its earliest beginnings to its tragic catastrophe, and he was one of the few men who lived through that tremendous time without being perceptibly affected by its dominant influence. It would be very unfair to say that Dr. Jacobson was an old-fashioned bishop, though it is true that his name and personality were not so much before the world as those of many of his younger brethren. A man who becomes a bishop at past sixty, and whose previous life for many years has been an example of studious retirement and practical quietism, may well be excused if he prefers to be a bishop rather of the older scholarly than of the newer energetic type. But Dr. Jacobson was never unmindful of the spiritual needs of his populous diocese. It needs a bishop of energy and perseverance to carry into practical effect the subdivision of his See, necessitated by the incessant growth of population; and, therefore, the constitution and endowment of the bishopric of Liverpool deserves to be recorded as a testimony to Dr. Jacobson's episcopal activity. His health giving way, he retired from his See in 1883, and died a few months later. He was the editor of Nowell's Catechism, The Letters of SS. Clement of Rome, Ignatius, and Polycarp, a new edition of The Oxford Paraphrase and Annotations on the Epistles of St. Paul, The Collected Works of Bishop Saunderson; and author of Fragmentary Illustrations of the History of the Book of Common Prayer, a Speech in the Convocation of York on The Athanasian Creed, three Charges, contributions to the Speaker's Commentary, and a volume of sermons.

Jacomb, THOMAS [b. 1622, d. 1687], was a London Nonconformist who was ejected from his living by the Act of Uniformity in 1662. He is chiefly noted for his sermons on Romans viii., and he also continued Poet's Annotations.

Jacoponi da Todi, an Italian hymn-writer, was born at Todi in 1240. He studied law at Bologna, where he became noted for his talents. He spent a wild youth, but his life was changed by the sudden and violent death of his wife. He determined to become a monk, and in 1278 entered the Franciscan Order of Minorites. He composed poems against Boniface VIII., and in 1297 framed a plot to depose him, which was discovered, and Jacoponi was imprisoned till the Pope's death. The monk died in the monastery of Collayone in 1306.

Jacoponi wrote many hymns, the best known of which, Stabat Mater dolorosa, has been translated into English, At the Cross her station keeping. It is said that he also wrote Stabat Mater speciosa, Stood the glad and beauteous mother, but this is doubtful. The Stabat Mater has been also ascribed to Gregory the Great, Innocent III., and others, but tradition has for long attributed it to Jacoponi, and most probably it is his. It has often been set to music, the best known composition being by Rossini.

Jago - Compostella, Sr. — This is a corruption of Sanctus Jacobus Apostolus, "St. James the Apostle," and is the Spanish name of the shrine of that Apostle, who is regarded as the patron saint of Spain. The Spaniards say that after Christ's ascension James preached the Gospel in Judea, then travelled over the whole world, and at last came to Spain, where he made few converts, but one day the Virgin appeared to him on the top of a pillar of jasper on the banks of the Ebro, commanded him to build her a chapel on the spot, and prophesied that all the province would become Christian. James built the famous Church of Our Lady of the Pillar, and founded the faith, and then returned to Judea, where, as is told in the Bible, he was beheaded by Herod Agrippa. His disciples took away his body, and, not daring to bury it for fear of the Jews, carried it to Joppa, and placed it on board a ship. Angels directed the coast for the coast of Spain, and they landed on the coast of Galicia, where the saint was buried. During the invasion of the barbarians the on art and general literature. She was born in Dublin. Her maiden name was Murphy. She married a barrister named Jameson, and went with him to Canada, but they were separated shortly after. Her earliest publica- tion was the Diary of an Ennuyée, published in 1826; this was followed by various works on general subjects; but we mention her here on account of the great influence some of her publications have had on sacred art. These are:—Sacred and Legendary Art [1848]; Legends of the Monastic Orders [1850]; Legends of the Madonna [1852]; Scriptural and Legendary History of Our Lord as Represented in Art. The first volume of this was published the year of her death [1860]; the second volume was finished by Lady Eastlake, and published two years later.

Jansenists.—The questions raised by Luther concerning the salvation of man, the doctrines of grace, of free will, of human merit, profoundly stirred the whole Christian world, far beyond the persons who broke away from the Roman Church. These ques- tions had, in fact, been in agitation from the days of Augustine to those of Thomas Aquinas; there had been many searchings of heart, and yearnings after more light, long before Luther appeared. So mighty was the effect which his preaching produced, that there were some of the most ardent upholders of the Papal power who did not cease to declare that that power must be upheld by a fuller preaching of the justification of sinners through the finished sacrifice of Christ. Men like Cardinal Pole, and even Bishop Gardiner, maintained that Lutheranism could only be stopped by firm opposition to Pelagian error, by the full statement of the grace of God and the merits of Christ as the ground of accept- ance. To oppose this view was one of the first works of the newly risen Order of Jesuits. The Council of Trent was convened, and Lainez, who had succeeded Loyola as General of the Order, gave to the society its tone and direction. Loyola had been the founder; Xavier had given to it a wonderful prestige by his enthusiastic labours in the East; but to Lainez, more than to any one else, should we attribute the character and principles which we associate with the name of Jesuit- ism. At Trent, then, when Pole, with the Archbishop of Sienna and a few others, en- treated the Council not to reject a doctrine simply because Luther had taught it, but to ascribe justification simply and solely to the merits of Christ through faith, Lainez led the opposition, and procured the adoption of the Tridentine canons and anathemas. But this was only a step. In 1588 MOLINA [q.v.] carried his views to the extent that free will, without the aid of grace, can elevate itself so far that a man shall so merit the favour of God that He shall bestow grace on account of Christ's merits, whereby he shall experience the is was demanded not only but (which was altogether men engaged in tuition of any kind. Persecution now began in earnest, and the Bastile was crowded with those who refused to violate their conscience by subscribing. It was a strange state of things. On one side was the most absolute king in Europe, all the resources of Rome, the powerful Jesuit body ; but, nevertheless, a few weak women at Port Royal resolutely held their ground, supported by One who ruleth the raging of the sea and the strivings of the people.

In 1668 a change came, known as "the pacification of Pope Clement IX." Such representations were made to him, that he accepted the Jansenist subscription to the condemnation of the five propositions, without reference to Jansen's writings, and with reservation of all senses laid down by St. Augustine. Then the prison doors were opened, a Jansenist was no longer of necessity a heretic, and the principles of the Jansenists became widely diffused. They now busied themselves in circulating the Scriptures in French. But in the death of the Duchess of Longueville in 1679 they lost a strong friend ; a few weeks later the Jesuits procured the expulsion of the Port Royalists ; the Jansenists were oppressed anew, Fénelon was banished, and the Jesuits triumphed everywhere.

Among those who had received some Jansenistic doctrines were the French Benedictines. That learned and laborious body had commenced the publication of their splendid edition of St. Augustine in 1679, and men were astonished to find that the great Father was even more of a Jansenist than had been expected. For the Benedictines had published the genuine text, which it was found had been again and again falsified to make it more in accordance with Roman teaching, so that even Jansen himself had not known the full force of Augustine's doctrines. The Jesuits furiously charged the Benedictines with falsification of documents ; but the charge recoiled upon themselves.

Amongst those who had preached the doctrines of grace was QUESNEL [q.v.]. His writings had been strongly recommended by De Noailles, Bishop of Châlons ; but he, on becoming Archbishop of Paris, was forced by the Jesuits to eat his words, and to condemn Quesnel. It caused him the most poignant and bitter remorse afterwards, and he endeavoured to repair the mischief which he had done, but the Jesuits were implacable. The publication of the Bull Unigenitus by Pope Clement XI. (Sept. 8th, 1713), in which a hundred and one propositions of Quesnel were declared heretical, was the culmination of their triumph. But the Jansenists, though there was no longer a united body like the Port Royalists to act as their focus, were numerous though scattered, and these oppressions and persecutions created a great sympathy in their favour : so much, that several French bishops solemnly appealed from the Papal Bull to a General Council. Unfortunately the Jansenists had placed themselves in a false position by submitting at all. It would have been better had they appealed to the Scriptures in the beginning, instead of identifying the Papal decision with the voice of the whole Church of Christ, and endeavouring to make a saving clause of "accepting so far as their conscience would suffer them." They became stronger when they were driven to repudiate Papal Infallibility altogether. Ranke says, "We find traces of them in Vienna, in Brussels, in Spain and Portugal, and in every part of Italy. They disseminated their doctrines in every part of Christendom." In Rome, however, the Jesuits had it all their own way, until their tyranny so manifested itself that a clamour arose for their suppression. Pope Benedict XIV. would probably have restrained them, but he died. Clement XIII. favoured them, but in the beginning of 1769 ambassadors came from Naples, Spain, and France to renew the cry for suppression. The Pope convened a Consistory, and died the evening before it should have met. Clement XIV. was tinged with Jansenist sentiments. He abolished the Order [July 21st, 1773], and for doing so the Jesuits are charged with poisoning him. In an evil hour Pope Pius VII. restored it [Aug. 7th, 1814]. [JESUITS.]

Meanwhile the Jansenists, hated and proscribed, found shelter in Protestant Holland. The Roman Catholics of that country were reputed to comprise 330,000 Jansenists. The Jesuits were powerless here to set open persecution on foot, so they called on the Pope to appoint Jesuits to places of authority. Holland had formerly belonged to the ancient See of Utrecht [WILLIBROOD], but in 1559 Pope Paul IV. had erected that See into an archbishopric with the five Suffragan Sees of Haarlem, Deventer, Leeuwarden, Groningen, and Middelburg. When Protestantism became the religion of Holland, after the emancipation from Spain, and only Utrecht and Haarlem remained faithful to Rome, the Suffragan Sees were suppressed, and in the Catholic district the Chapter of Haarlem was joined to that of Utrecht. The See became vacant in 1686, and the Jesuits persuaded the Pope to overrule the election of the Chapter in favour of M. van Heussen, a holder of Jansenist views. A miserable series of intrigues followed. The Chapters firmly asserted their undoubted rights, but endeavoured, without compromise, to arrange the differences with Rome. After appealing many times in vain, during which the See of Utrecht remained vacant, and the Church was administered by Vicars-General, they took a decided step. They elected Cornelius Steenhoven Archbishop of Utrecht in 1721, and petitioned the Roman Pontiff for his consecration. Their letters one after another remaining unanswered, then an appeal to the bishops of the dioceses, on whom, according to precedent, the duty of consecration devolved. Then the Holy See broke silence, mandating the bishops to take no consecration. In 1724 the Chapter to Dominic Varlet, the Bishop "in partibus," who had been discharged of his episcopal functions in opposition to the Bull Unigenitus, replied with their prayer, and Steenhoven Oct. 15th, 1724. A letter was sent to the Pope, who replied to them. Steenhoven appealed to the Council, but died in a short time. The Chapters elected Johannes Barthelemy, and him also the Bishop consecrated. He received letters of communion from many bishops, which he received at Utrecht. This Archbishop died, and again a third and fourth time of Babylon consecrated. The fifth bishop restored two Suffragan Sees of Deventer and Leeuwarden—so securing the succession. They consecrated the fifth Archbishop of the Jansenist Church of Holland. An appeal was made by Napoleon when he was in the nation, like the rest of the Continent for a while prostrate at his feet, to supply by putting forward the claim to regulate worship, but the attempt failed, and the Jansenist Church in Holland still holds its ground, having thus been in existence 160 years. Each bishop notifies his election to the Pope and craves confirmation; but the Pope continued to reject all advances; the result is the curious phenomena of professing to recognise the primacy of the Papal See, but rejecting its tyranny, and making the Pope to be head of the Church subject to the authority of a General Council. The recent promulgation of the dogma of the Immaculate Conception of the Virgin Mary occasioned a fresh protest from the Utrecht Church, which now probably numbers about 5,000 to 6,000, with a clergy of about thirty. From the Jansenists the Old Catholics have received the Episcopal succession. [CATHOLICS.]

Januarius, Sr., Bishop of Benevento in the kingdom of Naples, in the Diocletian and Maximian, and renowned for his friendship with Sosius, a deacon near Puzzuoli. On hearing that he was to be put to death with another deacon, Proculus, and two men, Eutyches and Acutius, had been thrown into prison, Januarius visited and comforted them, and at length was himself seized and thrown into a furnace, from which, as they are told, he received no hurt. A few days later Festus—and a Reader—Desiderius came to Nola, the place of the Bishop's confinement, to see what could be done for his relief, were also seized, and with oli to join the other four, and then that the following day they were killed by beasts in the amphitheatre; the animals refused to touch them, and they were beheaded. A poor man was to have collected some of the blood in two glass phials; but the Church still believes in a miracle of the liquefaction of this blood, and it is brought near to the altar, and it is said to become liquid, and to rise on its surface. It is also said that several eruptions of Mount Vesuvius have been averted by carrying the relics in procession. The relics were kept in the Cathedral of Naples about 1500 years, and are always exposed on September 1st, the day kept in memory of him and his companions, the martyrs.

WORK OF. [DONALDSON.]

St. Jerome, D.D. [b. 1775, d. 1833], born at Dublin in 1796, was educated at Limerick in 1823. His principal work was a review of Bishop Louth's poetry and on Isaiah, which appeared separately under the title of Jerome's Commentary on Isaiah, and has gone through many editions, while Vicar of Abington, a volume of very eloquent sermons died at Wandsworth, and was buried in the tomb of the Thorntons in the church. His life was written by the Rev. C. Forster. His friend, Lebb, wrote an excellent work on Service, and until a few years ago a highly venerated member of the Convocation of Canterbury.

St.—Erasmus, in writing of him, said that “he was, without comparison, the most eloquent of his age and prince of divines; and for his style called Cicero.” His chief work was a trustworthy translation of the scriptures in the Latin tongue. The whole Church owes him a deep debt. The old Italic version of the Bible was in general use until the time of St. Jerome, was a translation, not of the Hebrew, but of the Septuagint, and did not accurately represent the original. St. Jerome's version is known as the Vulgate, though certain parts of the Bible—including the Psalms and the Gospels—are not his work. In addition, St. Jerome wrote learned commentaries on all the books of the Bible, and on the Latin translation of the Bible. His controversial writings were marked by extreme bitterness and violence. In reference to this, Dr. Newell, in the Church of England, says:—“I do not scruple to say that, though not a saint, there are things in his character and views from which I should shrink; but as the case stands I shrink rather from putting myself in opposition to something like a judgment of the Catholic world in favour of his saintly perfection. I cannot, indeed, force myself to approve or like against my judgment or feeling, but I can receive things on faith against both one and the other, and I am willing to take certain characteristics of this learned and highly gifted man on faith.” It should also be remembered that history is, for the most part, a record of quarrels, controversies, and stirring events; but quiet devotion and unobtrusive charity are not, as a rule, recorded. So in the case of this saint, we have more details of the heat and anger of the controversies in which he took part, than of the wonderful zeal and devotion which made him sacrifice everything to the cause of the Church of Christ. St. Jerome was born of Christian parents in the village of Stridon, on the borders of Pannonia and Dalmatia. The date of his birth is uncertain. Prosper places it in A.D. 331; Tillemont in 342; and Thierry in 346. He was sent to Rome to study rhetoric, grammar, and the classics under Donatus. At the age of twenty, and while still at Rome, he was baptised. Having finished his course of studies, St. Jerome set out from Rome on a tour through a great part of Gaul, stopping at Trèves for some time in order to copy out Hilary's Treatise on Synods and his Commentary on the Psalms. He next visited Aquileia, at the head of the Adriatic, where he met Rufinus, a man of great piety and learning, who became afterwards his intimate friend, and then his bitter opponent. After leaving Aquileia, St. Jerome again visited Rome; but his restless spirit and thirst for knowledge led him after a brief stay to resume his travels. He accordingly set out for the East. At Antioch in Syria he became a disciple of Apollinaris, afterwards the famous heretic. St. Jerome had, through all these years, devoted himself with great zeal to the study of classical literature; but it was either during this stay at Antioch, or a little later, that the direction of his studies was completely changed. He says that during a severe illness, when he was thought to be dead, he found himself before the judgment-seat. In answer to a question, he replied that he was a Christian. “Thou liest,” came the reply; “thou art not a Christian, but a Ciceronian, for where thy treasure is there is thy heart also.” In pity, however, of his youth, his life—he says—was spared, after being severely beaten. He thereupon vowed never to open a heathen book again, a vow which was not strictly observed. St. Jerome now retired to the desert of Chalcis, eastward of Syria, where he practised the most severe mortification of the flesh, striving hard by prayer and fastings to overcome the temptations of impurity to which he had given way in Rome. He relates with what force the same temptations attacked him in his solitude. Luther had a similar experience. It was during his stay in the desert that St. Jerome set himself to master the Hebrew language, a task very uncongenial to his tastes, but productive of very great benefit to the Church hereafter. The close of the fourth century was an age of great controversy on Christian doctrine. The quiet of the desert was disturbed by angry quarrels, and St. Jerome was attacked for his use of the word "hypostasis." After spending three years in the desert, St. Jerome left in the year 377, and was ordained priest by Paulinus, Bishop of Antioch, on the condition that he was not to be settled in any definite sphere of work, and that he might be free to continue his monastic life. So great a veneration had Jerome for the high office of the priesthood, that he never could be persuaded to venture to celebrate the Holy Eucharist. Soon after his ordination he went to Constantinople and studied under Gregory Nazianzen, the Bishop. He had not been long in Constantinople when, in 382, Damasus, Bishop of Rome, summoned him to act as his secretary, and to advise him on questions relating to the Church at Antioch. For three years Jerome stayed in the capital. At first he was held in high public estimation, and was considered worthy to succeed Damasus, but his teachings on monasticism and celibacy, and other causes, made him very unpopular by the time he left the city. During his stay at Rome he revised, at the request of Damasus, the Latin translations of the New Testament, and also the Latin Psalter. Many Roman ladies of high rank were greatly influenced by St. Jerome, and were persuaded by him to shun marriage, to be ascetic, to live in seclusion, and relinquish all ordinary amusements. Among his pupils were Marcella, Asella, Paula and her daughter Eustochium, and Fabiola, all of very high rank. To illustrate his teaching on marriage, he used to compare the three states of wedlock, widowhood, and virginity, to the grounds in the parable that brought forth respectively thirtyfold, sixtyfold, a hundredfold. The populace and nobility were enraged at the results of Jerome's teaching. The clergy also were hostile to him, because he did not hesitate to rebuke them for their greed, laziness, and ignorance. Accordingly, at the death of his patron Damasus in 384, Jerome quitted Rome in disgust. He was soon followed by Paula and Eustochium; and after travelling through the Holy Land and in Egypt, they finally settled at Bethlehem in 387. Here Jerome resided at first in a cell, but subsequently, with what was left of his property, he built a monastery, in which he lived, and also a hospital for the pilgrims, who flocked to Bethlehem in great numbers. It was here that St. Jerome undertook his great work, the translation of the Hebrew Bible. His studies, however, were much disturbed by the multitudes of pilgrims, and by the controversies in which he engaged. Jerome in 393 renewed his acquaintance with Rufinus of Aquileia, who, having been ordained a priest by John, Bishop of Jerusalem, had settled on the Mount of Olives; but in the following year the friendship was broken on the Origenistic controversy. On the same question also Jerome and John, Bishop of Jerusalem, were bitter opponents. So bitter was the controversy between Jerome and Rufinus, that St. Augustine felt called upon to remonstrate with Jerome. Rufinus died in 410: even then Jerome's bitterness was not expended. Speaking of the former's death, he says: "The scorpion is buried under the soil of Sicily." It must be remembered that Jerome considered that he was fighting, not personal foes, but the foes of the Church, and hence his enmity was strong and enduring. Previously to this Jerome had engaged in the monastic controversy, writing with great bitterness against Jovinian and Vigilantius. Paula, who had built three monasteries during her stay at Bethlehem, died in 404, Jerome writing her eulogy in the most glowing terms. One more controversy—the Pelagian—engaged Jerome's attention. He was now getting old and infirm, but with the greatest zeal and energy he opposed the doctrines of Pelagius. So enraged were the followers of Pelagius that they attacked Jerome's monastery at Bethlehem, and for a time forced him to take refuge in a fortified town. Had it not been for Jerome's vigilance, the doctrine of Pelagius would most likely have found general acceptance in the East. In 420 Jerome died. "More than any other Father of the Church did he watch over the sacred deposit of the Scriptures, the foundation of our faith, and open the sacred path of the true explanation of them." Another side of his character was seen in the year 410. On the fall of Rome in that year, many fugitives fled for refuge to the East. Many came to Bethlehem; and Jerome writes:—"We cannot see them coming in crowds without groaning; we have therefore suspended our studies, desiring rather to act Scriptures than to write it—to do rather than to say holy things."

Jerome of Prague, the Bohemian Reformer, was born towards the end of the fourteenth century. Having taken in the University in Prague a B.A. degree, he studied in Paris, Cologne, Oxford, where he became imbued with Wicliffe's doctrines, and in Heidelberg. When he returned to Prague in 1407 he became a great friend of John Hus [q.v.] and helped in spreading his doctrines. His reputation for learning was so great that Ladislas III., King of Poland, consulted with him concerning the erection of a university in Cracow, and Jerome went there in 1410. He went to Constance in 1415, when Hus was

But after a great monarch, who was the e West that was made Lord of ulchre, the infidels continued . The French princes took the Council of Clermont, A.D.

1096, and having Godfrey of Bouillon for their chief, subdued Jerusalem on July 15th, 1099. This gave a beginning to the kingdom of Jerusalem, of which Godfrey was the first monarch. Saladin, King of Syria and Egypt, after having obtained several victories over the Christians, at length took Jerusalem from them on Oct. 2nd, 1187, and all the Holy Land, Tyre, Tripoli, Antioch, and some forts excepted. So that after eighty-eight years standing the kingdom of Jerusalem came to an end. Alfr, Sultan of Egypt, in 1268, took a great many cities from the Christians, so that they had nothing remaining at last excepting St. John d'Acra, or Ptolemais; which the Sultan Melec-Arabe, Alfr's successor, besieged in 1291, and, after forty days' close siege, carried it by storm, May 29th, and massacred all the besieged, except those who made their escape in boats. Since the loss of Acra no Christian forces had passage into Jerusalem, but pilgrims only, and the holy inheritance remained under the power of the Caliphs, or princes of Egypt, until 1517, when Selim, the Turkish Emperor, made himself master of it.

At present it contains 24,000 inhabitants, of whom 13,000 are Mohammedans, 7,000 Christians, and 4,000 Jews. The Christians belong to the Greek, old Armenian, and Latin, and a few to Protestant Churches. The Greeks are the most powerful, as there is a Russian colony outside the walls with accommodation for a thousand pilgrims. The Latins have only been numerous since 1847. The Protestants are very few. Beside the Church and school there are German hospitals and an orphanage.

Jerusalem, BISHOPRIC OF.—In 1840 King Frederick William of Prussia, acting under the advice of the Chevalier Bunsen, proposed to the English Government that a Protestant Episcopal See should be established in Jerusalem, for the joint benefit of English and Prussian residents there. It was believed that such an establishment would draw together the English and the Prussian Evangelical Churches, as well as help on missions to the Jews, and there were some of the High Church party, e.g. the late Dr. Hook, who had hopes that it might be the means of introducing episcopacy into the Prussian body. But the High Church party, as a whole, was altogether adverse to the step, on the ground that it was an unlawful interference with the episcopal jurisdiction of the Bishop of the Eastern Church at Jerusalem. Dr. Newman, then the leader of this party at Oxford, published a formal protest against it, and declared that the act of schism, for such he deemed it, was one of the final acts which caused him to leave the Church of England. The bishopric was placed under the metropolitan authority of the Archbishop of Canterbury, the right of appointment belonging alternately to the English and the Prussian Churches, but the bishop was to be consecrated according to the English form of service. To meet the objection that it was an interference with the jurisdiction of the Eastern Church, it was carefully notified that the bishop would not proselytise from other Christian bodies, but only minister to congregations of the two nationalities concerned. The first bishop was Dr. Alexander, the Hebrew Professor at King's College, London [d. 1845]. He was succeeded by Samuel Gobat [d. 1879], and he by Joseph Barclay. Since the latter's death in 1881, the Prussian Government, whose turn it is to nominate, has not done so, and it is understood that the bishopric will fall into abeyance. Several causes seem to have combined to this result. The bishopric has not commended itself to the popular judgment by any good results which it has been enabled to show, and an anonymous biography of the late bishop draws a very unfavourable picture of the state of things. The objections made at first by some English Churchmen still prevail, whilst the Germans are said to be dissatisfied—not unnaturally from their point of view—that no recognition is made of their orders, and that their pastors are not allowed to minister at the altars of the English Church. A valuable history of the bishopric, containing the original documents, was published in 1883, by the Rev. W. H. Hechler.

Jerusalem Chamber.—A hall in the deanery of Westminster running along the wall of the Abbey from the south side of the west doorway. It is now used as the meeting place of the Lower House of Convocation. It was rebuilt by Abbot Littlington about 1380, and is supposed to have derived its name from the tapestries with which it was hung, and which represented the history of Jerusalem. It was originally used as a private apartment, and was the scene of the death of Henry IV. in 1413. Here Sir Thomas More was confined in 1534, and Addison and Congreve lay in state before their burial in the Abbey. The Jerusalem Chamber has a remarkable fireplace, and the warmth derived from it caused the Westminster Assembly to adjourn hither in 1643. The revision of the Authorised Version was accomplished in this chamber.

Jesuits.—The Order of Jesuits, or Society of Jesus, was founded in 1534 by IGNATIUS LOYOLA [q.v.], with the help of Peter Le Fèvre, James Lainez, Francis Xavier, Nicholas Bobadilla, and Rodriguez. Pope Paul III. approved of the plan, and it was authorised by a Bull in 1540. The chief objects of the society were: the education of youth, preaching to and instructing grown-up people, the confutation and suppression of heresy, and teaching Christianity to heathens by missionaries. The chief differences between the Jesuits and the old monastic orders were that their Society was strictly monarchical, that they did not keep the canonical hours, and therefore had more time for study, and that they adopted no particular dress, but simply wore that of a secular priest. The Society consisted of four classes. In the lowest class were novices who spent their time in prayer, meditation, and study for two years, until they became scholars, and either continued their studies or taught in the schools. The next class was the Coadjutors, some of whom—the Temporal—acted the part of lay-helpers, while the Spiritual, who had been ordained, preached and helped the Professed of the highest class. The candidates had to work ten or twelve years before they reached this last class. From among them was chosen a General, who governed the whole Society. The first of these Generals was Loyola. He drew up the "Constitutiones," or rules of the Order, which were published in Rome two years after his death by Lainez, his successor as General. They consisted of ten parts, subdivided into chapters, and gave instructions concerning the different orders, their manner of life, &c. The Jesuits soon spread into other countries, and at the time of Loyola's death were established in Italy, Spain, Portugal, and Germany. About 1561 they began to open schools and colleges in France, where they taught gratis, for which the University attacked them; but it was a common belief that they were formed to destroy Protestantism, so they were allowed to stay, and formed a college in Paris. In the War of the League they were opposed to Henry IV., and two of their number attempted to assassinate him. The Parliament of Paris decreed their banishment; but Henry, at the pressing request of the Pope, recalled them in 1603, and they remained in France till their expulsion in 1764. It is said that Ravallin, the actual murderer, was instigated by the Jesuits. In Germany they were received with great favour; and in the time of Lainez almost all the German towns of note had a Jesuit College. They first came to England in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, and many were executed for conspiring against her. One of the Fawkes conspirators—Garnet—was a Jesuit. A very important part of the history of the Jesuits is their missions. The first attempts were made by Francis Xavier in the East. [XAVIER.] But the country where they had most influence was Paraguay. They went to South America after the Spaniards had conquered the country, and formed a colony on the banks of the Paraguay and Parana which is said to have included between one and two hundred thousand Indian converts, whom they century and a half. In 1750, a part of her possessions in Portugal, and ordered the Jesuits to move to some other part of her dominions. The Indians and some noblemen attempted to resist the Portuguese King, which was laid to the charge of their confessors the Jesuits, and expelled from the Portuguese dominions, their lands confiscated.

He was soon followed by the Jansenists had risen in opposition to the Parliament of Paris and its old hostility, and they had enemies in the Minister Choiseul and the Pompadour. An opportunity was offered for these parties to bring about the suppression of the Society. Father Lavalette, the head of the Jansenists in Martinique, speculated in the stock market; his goods were seized by the government and he became bankrupt. His enemies proceeded against the Society, and in 1764 a proclamation was issued by which they were suppressed and their property confiscated.

After, they fell in Spain through the influence of Choiseul, who persuaded the King that an insurrection which had broken out at Madrid in 1766 was their work.

Measures were made against them, and on the 27th of June 1767, they were all commanded to leave their homes, were escorted to the coast and embarked for Italy. They remained some months on board, where the survivors were landed in various parts of the Spanish America.

The Society was suppressed in the Kingdom of Naples but it still remained in the Kingdom of Sicily and in Sardinia. Pope Clement XIII., who had been their supporter, died and his successor Pius VI. who had been their supporter, was raised to the throne. He was begged on all sides to suppress the Society; and in 1773 he issued a bull, in which he said that dissensions were always rising up among them, and expelled the Catholic princes to suppress the Society; and then he declared them extinct, and their statutes annulled. The Society now remained only in Russia; and from the former it was expelled in 1817.

It remained suppressed for about thirty years but at the beginning of the nineteenth century several attempts were made to revive it in the hope that they might help to the countries which were in the midst of revolutions and wars. Several attempts were made allowing them to return to their countries; and in 1814 Pius VII.

solemnly re-establishing the Society and the constitutions of St. Ignatius now exist in every country, Protestant and Roman Catholic, in their public institutions are suppressed in France. They have at present thirty-three establishments in England, among which are six colleges, the chief one being at Stonyhurst, near Whitby, in Lancashire. [See JANSENISTS, LOYOLA.]

Jesuitesses.—An order of nuns founded by Isabella Rosella, a Spaniard, who greatly assisted St. Ignatius Loyola when he was studying at Barcelona. In 1545 she came, with two companions, to Rome, and, putting herself under the saint, entreated him to direct them, and to allow them to live under the Jesuit rule. Loyola finding it took up too much time, obtained an order from Paul III., in 1547, that the Society should not comprise any nuns. In spite of this injunction Isabella formed several houses which were called colleges, and others called noviciates, where there was a Superior, or Lady Abbess, who took their vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience; but they did not confine themselves to the cloister, but went about and preached. There were two English nuns in Flanders, who being instructed and encouraged by Father Gerard and some other Jesuits, set up this order. The Jesuits' design was to send these women for missionaries into England. One of them, whose name was Ward, was a sort of general over more than two hundred nuns. Pope Urban VIII. suppressed this Order in his Bull bearing date Jan. 13th, 1630, which instrument was dispatched to his Nuncio for Lower Germany, and printed at Rome A.D. 1633.

Jesus, NAME OF.—A festival in commemoration of the sacred name was kept in Saxon times on the Feast of the Circumcision, but was altered to the second Sunday after Epiphany, and at the Reformation removed to Aug. 7th, where it still remains as a black letter day in our calendar. The point which it sets before us is the peculiar sanctity of that Name, given to Him at his Circumcision according to the direction of the angels to the Virgin before His birth. The sacredness of the name was analogous to that of the name Jehovah—i.e. the Lord. St. Paul testifies to its sanctity in Phil. ii. 10—"At the name of Jesus every knee should bow," etc. The symbol for this name in the Church has long been "I H S." [q.v.].

Jew, THE WANDERING.—The legend of the Wandering Jew first appears in England and France in the thirteenth century, when the story was told by Matthew Paris, an English monk who lived at Paris, and affirms that he had it from an Armenian bishop. The story he tells is that Kartaphilus, Pilate's door-keeper, struck our Saviour on the back as He was being led out to crucifixion, and jeeringly urged Him to go on faster, to which Jesus replied, "I go, and thou shalt wait till I return," hereby, it is said, condemning him to remain on the earth till Christ's second coming. Other legends attach the story to one Ahasuerus, a shoemaker of Jerusalem, who drove our Lord from his house when He wished to rest there. Even as late as the last century impostors have availed themselves of this story to give themselves out as the Wandering Jew, and people have not been wanting to maintain that he had appeared to them under different forms. In German literature no such story appears till the beginning of the seventeenth century. As may be supposed, it has given a subject to many authors. The chief modern works on it are Vom Ewigen Juden [Berlin, 1870]; Eugène Sue's Légende du Juif Errant. It has been worked up into a poetical form by Schubert in Ahasuer, by Schlegel in Die Warnung, by Goethe in Aus Meinem Leben, and by Mrs. Norton in The Undying One.

Jewell, JOHN [b. 1522, d. 1571], Bishop of Salisbury, 1560, was born at Buden, in the parish of Berry Narber, Devon. His father was a gentleman of ancient but not very rich family, and left nine children besides John. When about thirteen years of age he was sent to Merton College, Oxford, and for his second tutor had John Parkhurst, afterwards Bishop of Norwich, who loved the Reformation, which his first tutor did not. The plague breaking out, he removed to Croxham, but being lodged in an unhealthy room he caught cold, and this brought on lameness for life. In 1539, the thirty-first year of Henry VIII., he removed to Corpus Christi College, next year he took his degree of B.A., was afterwards chosen Reader of Humanity and Rhetoric, and in 1544 he became M.A. On the accession of Mary in 1553 Jewell was forced to leave his college, and was reduced nearly to a state of poverty; but, finding a place of refuge in Broadgates Hall (now Pembroke College), the shipwreck of his temporal estate was for a while delayed. Soon after this, one of his bitterest enemies, Dr. Marshall, Dean of Christ Church, who had already twice changed his religion, a man "who loved the praise of men more than the praise of God," sent him a paper containing Popish doctrines, which he was either to subscribe or to remain in danger of the stake. This snare was so suddenly laid for him that he had no time to consult his Protestant friends, so, taking the pen in his hand, he said: "Have you a mind to see how well I can write?" and subscribed his name. By doing this he lost the favour of his friends and brought guilt upon his own conscience, but did not, in the least, satisfy his enemies. They still sought his life, and he fled from Oxford on foot, and was found by Augustine Bernard, Bishop Latimer's servant, lying upon the ground, weary, cold, and distressed. He was put upon the servant's horse and taken to the house of Lady Ann Warcup, and afterwards removed to London; there, by the help of Sir Nicholas Throgmorton, he went on board ship, and sailed from England to a place of safety abroad. Upon his arrival at Frankfort he found many great men, who, like himself, had fled from England, and the next Sunday he expressed his sorrow for having signed the paper at Oxford. "It was my abject cowardly mind and faint heart," he said, "that made my weak hand to commit this wickedness." Tears and sighs accompanied this confession; he then implored the first of Almighty God and then of the Emperor. From Frankfort he removed to Strasburg, at the earnest request of his friend, the Martyr. These two read St. Augustine's works together. From Strasburg he moved to Zurich, and there remained till the death of Mary. Then Jewell returned to England; he was soon employed in promoting the cause of the Reformation. In 1560 was consecrated Bishop of Salisbury. In 1562 he published Apology of the Church of England, by the Queen's authority, as the public confession of the true faith of the Church of England, and an account of the reasons of its separation from the distinctive doctrines of the Church of Rome. This book was translated into many languages and spread over Europe.

Jews.—We purpose under this heading to give a short sketch of the history of the Jews after the destruction of the temple at Jerusalem. About fifty years after, the Jews numbered nearly five hundred thousand of the subjects, for which they were punished by Trajan. They made Jerusalem the seat of learning and of the regulation of their religious life. About 66 A.D. Bar - Cochba pretended that he was the Messiah, and raised a Jewish army of nearly a hundred thousand, who murdered heathens and Christians who came near Jerusalem. But he was defeated by the Emperor Hadrian. In this year it is said that ten thousand Jews were slain or crucified. Hadrian then built a city on Mount Sion, and erected a marble statue of a man at the gate that led to Bethlehem; no Jew was allowed to enter the city or to look at the statue at a distance on pain of death. In 70 A.D. the Jews began to rebuild their city and temple, but a terrible earthquake killed the workers and scattered their materials. In the fourth, and fifth centuries many Jews were harassed and murdered. In the sixth century Babylonia became their seat of empire instead of Palestine. In the sixth century twenty thousand were slain and more sold into slavery. In 602 the Jews were severely punished for their horrible treatment of the Christians at Antioch. They were somewhat better at the time of the Mahomet, for, though expelled from Jerusalem, they were favourably received in Mauritania, and also in France.

monarchs. In Spain in 700 A.D. to be enslaved, and in the next centuries they were greatly persecuted, and in some places were burnt. In France in 1020 a mob fell upon them and many of them; about one hundred were buried in the city of York, which they set fire to after killing their wives and children. In Egypt, Canaan, and Syria they were harassed. Provoked by running after pretended messiahs, Nasser scarce left any of the dominions of Mesopotamia. The Tartars massacred them in multitudes. Ferdinand persecuted them in 1349 there was a terrible massacre at Toledo. In France in 1320 many were murdered and others expelled. In 1275 they were recalled in France; in 1358 they were expelled from France, and since then have not entered that country. In 1290 they were banished from England. In 1348, when the Black Death was raging, Jews were accused of causing the plague by poisoning the rivers and wells, and they were themselves very unpopular with the Christians having the control of finance in their hands. Spain and France banished them, and they fled chiefly to Germany and Poland. At the time of the Reformation they were somewhat better; they were let alone by the Christians who were too busy with their own troubles to heed them. But in the last century they have at different times suffered violent persecution and banishment, but in general their condition is tolerable. In Poland, Russia, and Hungary they are oppressed even up to the present time. In England and the United States they have absolute liberty. In 1753 they acquired the right to hold land in England. In 1753 they obtained the permission of naturalisation. In 1833 the Jews were incorporated, since 1845 the office of Lord Mayor, and since 1858 Jews have entered Parliament. In fact, Jews are now, in England, nearly on the same footing as the English subjects; their schools and places of worship stand much in the same position as the Protestant Dissenters. A Jew cannot hold office in any municipal corporation, nor must sign a declaration that he will use his influence so as to injure or weaken the Protestant Church. By Statute 21 & 22 Vict., c. 49 Jews are excluded from holding the office of guardians or justices of the United Kingdom, or of Lord High Chancellor, Lord Keeper, or Lord Commissioner of Great Britain or Ireland, or the office of Lord Lieutenant, or deputy, or other chief governor of Ireland, or Her Majesty's Commissioner to the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland.

In their religious observances the modern Jews adhere as closely to the Mosaic dispensation as their scattered condition will allow. Their service consists chiefly in reading the Law in their synagogues, together with a variety of prayers. They abstain from the meats prohibited by the Levitical Law; they observe the same ceremonies as their ancestors at the Passover. They offer prayers for the dead, because they believe in purgatory as a place where the souls of the wicked go, but they limit the time of their remaining there to a year, and they believe that only very few will suffer eternal punishment. All Jews are obliged to live and die in the profession of the following Thirteen Articles, which were drawn up for them about the end of the eleventh century by a celebrated rabbi named Maimonides:—

I. That there is one God, Creator of all things, the first principle of all beings, who is able to subsist and continue his perfections without any part of the Universe, but that nothing in the world can maintain their existence without Him.

II. That God is an uncompounded indivisible essence; but that His unity is different from all other unities.

III. That God is an immaterial being, and that no corporeal quality, however refined, can possibly make part of His essence.

IV. That God is eternal a parte ante as well as a parte post, and that every thing excepting the Deity had a beginning in time.

V. That God alone ought to be worshipped, and that we ought to adore no other beings either as mediators or intercessors.

VI. That there have been prophets qualified to receive Divine inspiration, and that there may be such for the future.

VII. That Moses was the greatest prophet that has hitherto appeared, and that the degrees of supernatural light communicated to him were altogether singular, and much above the communications and illapses vouchsafed to other prophets.

VIII. That the law which Moses left them was all of it dictated by Almighty God, that there is not so much as a syllable in it not received by inspiration; and that by consequence the traditionary expositions of these precepts are entirely a Divine revelation given to Moses.

IX. That this law is immutable, and that it is lawful neither to add nor diminish.

X. That God knows all our actions, and governs them according to His pleasure.

XI. That God rewards the observance and punishes the violation of His Law; that the best rewards for virtue are reserved for the other world, and that the damnation of the soul is the deepest punishment.

XII. That a Messiah will appear of much more merit and lustre than all the kings before Him; that though His coming is delayed, we ought neither to doubt the certainty nor prescribe the time, and much less offer to foretell it from the Scripture.

XIII. That God will raise the dead at the last period of time, and pass judgment upon all mankind.

This truth with the consequences of it they maintain from Dan. xii. 2: "And many of them that sleep in the dust shall wake; some to everlasting life, and some to shame and everlasting contempt."

Joachim, Sr., legendary husband of St. Anne, and father of the Blessed Virgin. The Greek Church keeps their joint festival on September 9th, but the Latin Church keeps March 20th in memory of St. Joachim, and September 26th in memory of St. Anne.

Joachim. Abbot of Floris, in Calabria. He was a Cistercian monk who claimed to be inspired. He says of himself that when very young he went to Jerusalem in the dress of a hermit to visit the holy places, and that whilst praying in the church God communicated to him by infusion the knowledge of Divine mysteries and of the Holy Scripture. He wrote against Peter Lombard, the Master of the Sentences, who had maintained that there was but one essence in God, though there were three Persons, and Joachim asserted that since there were three Persons there must be three essences. This dispute was in 1195. Joachim's writings were condemned by the Fourth Lateran Council. His followers, the Joachimites, were particularly fond of certain ternaries. The Father, they said, operated from the beginning until the coming of the Son, the Son, from that time to theirs (1260); and the Holy Spirit then took it up, and was to operate in His turn. They divided everything relating to men, doctrine, and manner of living into three classes, according to the three Persons of the Trinity:— [1] Of men, the first class was that of married men, which had lasted during the whole period of the Father; the second was that of clerks, which lasted during the time of the Son; the third was that of monks, wherein was to be an uncommon effusion of grace by the Holy Spirit. [2] Doctrine, viz., the Old and New Testament, and the everlasting Gospel; the first they ascribed to the Father, the second to the Son, the third to the Holy Ghost. [3] Manner of Living. Under the Father, men lived according to the flesh; under the Son, according to the flesh and the Spirit; under the Holy Ghost, they were to live according to the Spirit only.

Joan, Pope.—A woman who is said to have become Pope in the ninth century, between Leo IV. and Benedict III. It is said that her pontificate lasted two years, five months, and four days, and that she died in giving birth to a child on the road between the Colosseum and the Church of St. Clement. The first mention of such a story is to be found in a doubtful manuscript of Marianus Scotus, a monk of the Abbey of Fulda, in the ninth century, and then in the chronicle of Martinus Polonus in the twelfth and again by a French Dominica, St. Bourbon, about 1225. The story however, rejected as without hindence.

John, St., of Nepomuk.—The popular saint of Bohemia. He is said to have been born at Pomuk in the fourteenth century. He was made a Canon of the of Prague, and Vicar-General of St. Sophia, the Queen of Wenceslaus him as her confessor. Her husband suspicious of her, tried to make John him the matter of her confession, firm refusal vowed to be revenged having confirmed the election of a accordance with the wishes of the against the King, Wenceslaus he tured and then thrown into the river in March, 1393. According to the which is in great part legendary, he discovered by a miraculous light of from it, and it was buried with great and marvellous cures of the sick at his shrine. He was canonised by Benedict XIII. as a martyr for the ability of the seal of confession, and fixed for March 20th.

John Scotus. [DUNS SCOTUS]

Johnson, John [d. 1662], a learned theologian of the English was educated at Cambridge, ordained by Bishop Sprat in 1656, and Vicar of Boughton-under-Blenham bishop Sancroft the following; came to be known to the neighborhood for his religious earnestness, and Tenison in 1697 appointed him Margate and Appledore, the last for the sake of the income, Margate very poor. But being anxious to theological work, he asked leave from Margate and live at Appledore the Archbishop unwillingly granted was anxious to keep a learned man. At Appledore he published his Trade Manual, an excellent work. His health having failed through of the Appledore Marsh, the Archbishop pointed him to Cranbrook, to be Appledore. He removed to Cranbrook there spent the rest of his life, often visited his Appledore Rectory he published The Proprietary of the Holy Eucharist truly stated as from Scripture and Antiquity, a common Service of the Church of England book raised a considerable outcry concerning it Popery, and another true ecclesiastical doctrine. One bishop at least (small, of Norwich) charged against it; Johnson was a learned man, and quite able to take care of himself. His parsonage at Cranbrook became a favourite meeting-place of many of the Nonjurors, among them Sir Nelson and Dean Hicken, who were supplied with a work representing, as it did, his own views so entirely. He entered into controversy with Bishop Trimmell and other bishops; and in 1713 published his treatise, Unbloody Sacrifice and Altar Unveiled and asserted. This was a more elaborate vindication of his former treatise, and was reprinted a few years ago in the Anglo-Catholic series. There are some noticeable features in this remarkable book. Thus: Johnson's strong objection to the bread and wine in the Sacrament being bought out of the poor rates. It should come, he contends, from the free-will offerings of the congregation and from no other source. He contends for mixed chalice, and for the restoration to him of peace, if it could be done with a good mind; if it be thought undesirable, the laying of hands should be used instead. In 1714 he got into trouble for not keeping the 29th of May as the day of Accession, though, as usual, he was present at the prayer in his Church. He was summoned before the Archdeacon, who was bound to punish him heavily; but Johnson defended himself so boldly that the Archdeacon judged it wiser to let him alone. But a year later he took up the defence of a Quaker who had taken a similar line, and published a statement of his own case. So great was a defiance of authority so incensed Bishop Wake, that he sent him a peremptory order to withdraw and retract his pamphlet, which Johnson did. It is curious to note that during the eighteen years that Johnson held Cranbrook, confirmation was administered twice—"once," writes Johnson in the parish register, "at the request of Mr. Johnson, and once of the Archdeacon's free motion." In order to meet the views of the Anabaptists, who were in favour of baptism by immersion, he had a bath made in Cranbrook Church, where it can still be seen. It appears, however, from the register to have been only once used. He is buried by the vestry door of his church, and a long Latin inscription is set over the place.

Johnson, James [b. 1492, d. 1555], principally noted for his friendship with Luther. He was born at Nordhausen, studied law at Erfurt, but afterwards gave himself up to theology. He helped to found the University of Jena, and was made Court Preacher at Erfurt in 1551. His devotion to Luther for twenty-five years was very remarkable. His works are chiefly controversial. His Deus, which would be of great historical interest, have not been collected. He died at Erfurt.

Jones, William, rector of Nayland [b. 1726, d. 1800], one of the Hutchinsonian divines. He was educated at University College, Oxford. From 1766 to 1777 he held the living of Pluckley, in Kent. He wrote and published much, notably a valuable work on The Doctrine of the Trinity [1767]; A Course of Lectures on the Figurative Language of the Holy Scriptures, and the Interpretation of it from the Scripture itself [1788], in which he upholds the Hutchinsonian views. Memoirs of Bishop Horne, his great friend and patron [1796]; A Letter to Three Unconverted Jews [1799], and many Sermons.

Joris, Johann David, an Anabaptist fanatic, b. at Bruges early in the sixteenth century, d. 1556. He was educated at Delft, and adopted the principles of the Reformation, but falling in with some Anabaptists he took up their notions and started an Anabaptist-Chiliasm-Adamic sect, and professed to be their Messiah. He exercised great influence over his followers, and amassed a large fortune, which he took with him and settled at Basle under the name of John of Bruges, contriving that no one should recognise in him the obnoxious Joris who had caused such disturbances by the publication of pamphlets dealing with mysticism and coarse sensuality intermixed. When the truth was learnt after his death, his books were publicly burnt at Basle.

Jortin, John, D.D. [b. 1698, d. 1770], an admired and popular preacher. He was of French extraction, his family having come to England on the revocation of the Edict of Nantes. He was educated at Charterhouse and at Jesus College, Cambridge. He held no considerable preferment till 1762, when Ombaldeston, Bishop of London, made him one of his chaplains, and gave him a prebendal stall at St. Paul's and the vicarage of Kensington, where he died. He was also Archdeacon of London. He wrote Remarks upon Ecclesiastical History [1751], Life of Erasmus [1758], and many sermons which display originality of thought and style.

Joseph of Arimathea. [GLASTONBURY; GRAIL, THE HOLY.]

Josephus, Flavius, the Jewish historian, was born during the reign of the Emperor Caligula, about 37 A.D. He was of noble birth both by his father Matthias, who was descended from the race of high priests, and by his mother, who was of the blood-royal of the Asmonians. At the age of sixteen he betook himself to study, living for three years with Banus, an Esene. He then joined the Pharisees. In 64 he took a journey to Rome on account of some priests whom Felix, the Governor, had sent prisoners to that city. Here, through a Jewish actor named Alityrus, who was a favourite with Nero, Josephus was made known to the Empress Poppæa, and carried his point with regard to the priests. Upon his return to Judea he was made Captain General of the Galileans, and worthily discharged that function till the taking of Jotapata, in which town he was. He was forced to hide with some of his men in a cavern, and was taken by Vespasian. He would have been delivered up to Nero, but foretold that his captor should gain the Empire, who therefore kept him in easy confinement for three years. Josephus accompanied Titus at the siege of Jerusalem, and afterwards lived at Rome, where, under the protection of the Emperors, he studied and wrote. The date of his death is not known, but it must have taken place after the accession of Trajan in 97.

His works are:—History of the Jewish War, which is very trustworthy; Jewish Antiquities, in books containing their history up to 66 A.D.; his Autobiography; and a work against Apion of Alexandria, entitled Antiquity of the Jews. Other works attributed to him are not genuine.

Jubilate Deo ["O be joyful in God"]. — The 100th Psalm. At the revision of the Prayer Book in 1552 this psalm was added in its present place in the Morning Service as an alternative to the Benedictus, "when that shall happen to be read in the chapter for the day or for the Gospel on St. John Baptist's Day." Formerly it was sung as one of the psalms at Lauds, and its position then corresponds very closely to its present position; then its place was before the lesson, now it comes after. It is a song of praise and thanksgiving to God for our creation and preservation by His mercy. It is most suitable to be used with the Te Deum on occasions of solemn thanksgivings to God for victory or deliverance from any great peril.

Jubilee. — By the Levitical Law [see Leviticus xxv. 8-18] every fiftieth year was to be kept as a jubilee; it was to be a year of rest to the land, like other Sabbatical years; no sowing, reaping, or pruning of vines was to take place; liberty was proclaimed throughout the land to all the inhabitants; slaves were to be set free, debts were to be forgiven, and every man was to return to his own possession. The derivation of the word "jubilee" is uncertain, but it is supposed to be derived from Hebrew yobel, "a blast of a trumpet or ram's horn," for it was with a blast of rams' horns that the jubilee was to be proclaimed. The Hebrews being the servants of God, and the land and all that they had belonging to Him, it was impossible for any Jew to be absolute owner of what God had given originally to another; hence at every jubilee, on the day of atonement, the tribes and families were restored to their original possessions. After the Babylonish Captivity the Jews observed the year of jubilee. In the case of the Jews the Roman Catholic adopted a kind of jubilee in the year 1300, Boniface VIII. being Pope at the time. "Most full pardon of all sins" was granted to all who repented, confessed, and performed a certain number of visits to the churches of St. Peter and St. Paul in Rome; this was, at the same time, decreed to recur at the hundredth year. About two hundred pilgrims are said to have resorted to Rome at the first jubilee. Pope Clement VI. fixed the Jubilee or Holy Year at the fiftieth year, requiring the pilgrims to visit the Lateran Church in addition to the other churches. Again in 1389 Urban V. fixed the jubilee to every thirty-third year, being the age of our Saviour. This date was fixed at every twenty-fifth year by Paul II. in 1470, and so it remains to the present time. These are the ordinary jubilees, but in addition there are extraordinary jubilees, which may be appointed at any time or on any special occasion, such as the beginning of the reign of a pope. The ordinary jubilee lasts from Christmas to the next Christmas. It is no longer necessary for those except from Italy, to resort to Rome to obtain the benefits of the jubilee, but the jubilee is extended the following year to other parts of the world. Extraordinary jubilees do not usually last the whole year; they may extend to the whole of the Church or only to a particular country, district or town. The usual conditions for sharing in the indulgences and pardons of a jubilee are: Fasting on three days in the week, visiting certain specified churches a certain number of times, praying according to the directions of the Pope, confessing to a priest, and communicating at the altar. Boniface IX. granted the privilege of extraordinary jubilees to several princes and popes, and thus the monks of Canterbury had a jubilee every fifty years, when people flocked from all parts to visit the tomb of Thomas Becket. In 1640 the Jesuits celebrated a solemn jubilee at Rome, that being the hundredth year from their institution.

Judgment, DAY OF. — The Old Testament is full of declarations of coming judgments of God, sometimes executed in the life of prerogative as King, sometimes in the works of the promised Messiah. Our Lord declared His Kingdom to be of this world, and He emphatically of this judgment, and not with ideas of abstract justice or retribution, but with His own capital. He (the Father) hath given Him authority to execute judgment, because He is the Son of Man. It is evident that there have been many rehearsals of the great summing judgment to come. The teaching of our Saviour respecting the fall of

iv. cannot be taken as other than a sign of judgment, and the Book of Job treats the downfall of Impi-

And we need none to tell us of the judgment of God upon sin is a part of our individual experience. But all creation is a far-off event; "it is groaning and waiting for the manifestation of God." How far the sublime which closes the prophecy of Malachi is realised by human imagination. It is one of the hidden things of some writers that passage has "the Great Amise," the gathering of one view all who have ever lived of the earth. Pictorial art, as in the picture of Michel Angelo, has realised it, and it is one of the subjects of elaborate sculpture on rocks. But the inadequacy of any picture becomes to other interpreters it against such views, which seem best, only parables of a truth too far for the intellect or imagination. They maintain that the prophecy is not that, as with individuals so with nations, they are all before the throne of the Judge. Christians but heathens are judged because he is the Son of Man "that Christ is the Son of Man, the throne of God,—thus is the end of all Christian belief and knowledge who have so realised it can expect the second coming, and humbly and await the fulfilment and explanation of the profession that then "He shall quicken the dead." in Dei.—In cases where it was not direct evidence touching the innocence of an accused person it was believed in many countries that if a trial would reveal the truth of the case was appealed to, hence in many heathen codes of law there is an appeal to "judicium Dei," the judgment of God. Even in Christian countries the trial by ordeal retained till the twelfth century. The methods of finding out the "judicium Dei" were such as follow. The suspected person was made to walk over red hot ploughshares or coals, if innocent, without suffering. The Empress Cunegunde, in 1010, is said to have succeeded through this ordeal and thus proved her innocence. Another method was to expect a person to thrust his arm into a vat of boiling water. Then there was the cold water trial: a man was bound hand and foot and thrown into the water, if he floated he was considered guilty, if he sank he was considered innocent. In the trial by combat, in which the accused was considered guilty, survived all the methods of finding out the "judicium

Dei." Trials of this sort were usually held in churches in the presence of ecclesiastical and secular judges, preceded by three days' fasting, confession, communion, and many adjurations and ceremonies.

Judson, ADONIRAM, the first of American missionaries to the heathen, and one of the noblest names in missionary history, was born in New England in 1788; died at sea, April 12th, 1850. He was the son of a minister of Massachusetts, and during his youth professed infidelity, but afterwards returned to Christianity, and made up his mind to become a missionary. He was the first missionary appointed for Burmah, whither he was sent by Felix Carey. This mission was the result of an appeal which had been made in 1810 by Judson and others for support from his native country instead of from European societies, and which was answered by the institution of the American Board of Foreign Missions. [MISSIONS.] Judson and his wife arrived after many hardships in Burmah in 1812 with four other missionaries, but it was a long time before they succeeded in converting the natives, and meanwhile they suffered greatly from cholera and fevers. In 1824 Rangoon was captured by the English, and the Burmese people suspected the missionaries of having plotted against them; Judson was seized and imprisoned for many months, and anxiety for his safety caused the death of his wife in 1826. They had previously lost both their children from the unhealthiness of the climate. Judson's labours had by this time met with more success, and in 1834 he married again and removed to Moulmein. Here he baptised hundreds of Burmese converts, and translated the Bible into the native language. In 1845 his wife's health completely gave way, and they set out for America: but she died on the way, and he soon returned to his missionary work, taking with him his third wife, and settled again at Rangoon, where mission work was much needed. In 1849 he became so seriously ill that a sea-voyage was prescribed, and he set sail for the Isle of Bourbon, but died during the voyage. His last literary work was a Burmese dictionary, which he continued to work at till his death.

Jaggernaut or Jaggernaut.—A town in Orissa, Bengal, famous as one of the principal places of pilgrimage in India. Its temple, containing an idol of Vishnu, the Hindoo god, is annually visited by upwards of a million pilgrims. A legend says that this image appeared out of the water to a certain Rajah, and that he was told to build it a temple and worship it. The present temple was finished in 1198, during the time of the famous Rajah Anang Bhim Deca. The name of the temple is a corruption of the Sanscrit word Jagannatha—i.e. "The Lord of the World." Another name for the image is Krishna. It is a carved block of wood, painted black, and of a hideous countenance. Two other images share the temple—Siva, white; and Sudhadra, yellow. The festival is kept in March, and then these idols are dragged out in procession, each on an enormous car of great weight, Juggernaut's being the largest and heaviest. The devotees work themselves up into a frenzy of enthusiasm, and many of them cast themselves under the wheels of the carriage, and are crushed to death, their self-sacrifice being greeted by the acclamations of the crowd. Revolting indecency and horrible cruelty are the essential characteristics of this worship. There are many temples to this idol in India, but the atrocities of the worship are far less than they were, owing to the influence of Europeans.

Julia, St., was a virgin martyr of Carthage. This town being taken in 439 by Genseric, King of the Vandals, Julia was sold for a slave, and carried into Syria. The merchant who bought her sold her to Eusebius, another rich merchant. Julia served him faithfully and well, and spent all the time not employed in his business in prayer and study of the Scriptures. The merchant embarked with her for Gaul; but when he arrived at the island of Corsica he went on shore to take part in an idolatrous festival. Julia refused to be present, and spoke strongly against the superstitious ceremonies. Felix, governor of the island, heard of this, and questioned Eusebius, who answered that she was a Christian, but that she served him so well that he would not give her up. Felix was determined to gain possession of her, so when Eusebius was sleeping he captured her, and ordered her to sacrifice to the gods. Julia refused, on which the governor ordered her hair to be torn off, and then she was hanged on a gibbet. The monks of the island of Gorgon carried off her body, and put it in a rich tomb, where it remained till Desiderius, King of the Lombards, removed it to Brescia, 763. Her festival is kept on May 22nd.

Julian, FLAVIUS CLAUDIUS, surnamed "the Apostate," the son of Julius Constantius, half-brother of Constantine the Great, was born at Constantinople in 331. He and his brother Gallus were saved when the rest of Constantine's family were massacred by Constantine II. because they were considered too young to be dangerous. He was brought up in the Christian faith with his brother, in the palace of the Cappadocian kings, near Cæsarea. One of his teachers was Mardonius, a heathen, though he professed Christianity; and when he went to Constantinople in 350 he studied under the grammarian Nicocles and the historian Eubolius, both men of the same type. When he went to Athens to study he was attracted by pagan philosophy, and thus in his heart

he became an apostate, but could not make the change because his cousin, the emperor, was a zealous Christian; so Julian took part in the services as a reader. Gallus had married Constantius's sister, who led her husband to commit treason, and he was put to death. In 355 Julian married Helena, the Emperor's sister, who was made Cæsar, and became co-emperor of Gaul. He soon showed that, in his studious habits, he was possessed of great military talents. He relieved the Emperor's enemies, and enlarged the boundaries of the Empire. Constantius, who was engaged in a less successful war against the Persians, was jealous, and ordered Julian to send a greater part of the army. Julian refused to obey, but the soldiers refused to leave their favourite leader, whom they proclaimed Emperor. He received the title with reluctance, as it is said, and wrote to the Emperor's sanction. Constantius, indignant, ordered Julian to lay down the title, which the latter refused to do. The Persian War prevented Constantius from marching against his rival, who took advantage of his absence by making himself master of Illyricum. The Emperor, on his return, marched towards Europe, but died in Cilicia, and Julian was left in possession of the whole Empire, in 361 he took off the mask, and proclaimed himself a heathen. His first act was to issue an edict proclaiming full liberty of conscience. He at once began to try, by all the means in his power, to undermine the Christian churches were shut up, the heathen temples reopened, and all the places of worship given by preference to the heathen. Religious persecution began in the East, at which Julian looked on with indifference. He also wished to revive heathenism, and himself led the way by writing a hymn in praise of the mother of the gods, Juno. He delighted in dissension between the Christians, recalled all the exiles, and restored the Donatists to their churches in Africa. As a further insult to the Christians he patronised the Jews, and issued an edict for the restoration of their Temple. But the blow of all that the Christians received was the school law of 362, which ordered that those who desired to teach should gain nothing from secular authorities, which was taken from him, and thus Christians were prevented from teaching. He erected large public schools, where the young were instructed in the Pagan religion and customs. He also ordered to build hospitals for the sick, but did not live to carry out them. In 362 he went to Antioch to prepare for a campaign against the Persians, but he sacrificed to the gods, and consulted the oracles of Delphi, Delos, and Dodona, which promised him certain victory. He set out with an army of about 65,000 men.

Jurien also wrote Letters against Maimbourg's History of Calvinism, The Last Efforts of Oppressed Innocence, A Treatise on the Church, A History of the Jews, A Treatise on Mystical Theology, and A Commentary on the Apocalypse, in which he predicted the establishment of Protestantism in France during the year 1686. Jurien had a warm controversy with Boyle, Basnage, and Saurin.

Jurisdiction [Lat. jus dicere, "to administer the law"].—Jurisdiction is exercised by such as have committed to them public authority over others for their rule and government. Ecclesiastical jurisdiction may be divided into two heads: [i.] voluntary—i.e. as in ordination, where men, by voluntarily taking Holy Orders, render themselves subject by their ordination vows to the constituted Episcopal jurisdiction; and [ii.] contentious, as in questions relating to errors in doctrine or morals, where the Ecclesiastical Courts have authority to decide the matter and enforce penalties. Again, jurisdiction may be either ordinary or delegated. In the Church of Rome the Pope alone exercises ordinary jurisdiction; all other jurisdiction is delegated by him to bishops, legates, or other officials. In the Church of England it is held that all the bishops exercise ordinary jurisdiction, conferred upon them by Christ through His Apostles and their successors at consecration. The exercise of this jurisdiction is, however, limited, and regulated by Canons of General Councils and by Ecclesiastical laws. Thus a bishop's jurisdiction is confined to his own diocese. Owing to the union of Church and State in England, the Royal assent must be obtained before a bishop or any other ecclesiastical officer can exercise his jurisdiction. The bishop's jurisdiction is often delegated in contentious matters to an Ecclesiastical Court. The jurisdiction of Ecclesiastical Courts is sanctioned by the laws of the country, but the Ecclesiastical judge is, according to the Constitution, appointed by the Ecclesiastical Power—e.g. vicars-general, officials principal, chancellors, etc.

Justification.—The exact signification of the words justification and justified, which occur repeatedly in St. Paul's Epistles, has been the subject of prolonged and bitter controversy. That they imply a state in which the sinner, by reason of the redemption effected by Christ, is become acceptable to God, is not disputed; but two different views have been taken of the way in which this acceptableness is brought about. These views may be briefly stated thus :—the one, that God accounts the sinner to be righteous because the righteousness of Christ is imputed to him ; the other, that God makes the sinner righteous by infusing the righteousness of Christ into him. In the former case, the word “justify” is used in the forensic sense of “acquit,” “pronounce guiltless ;” and, although the primary signification of the Greek verb is “to make righteous,” yet it is frequently found in Holy Scripture in the sense of accounting or regarding a person as righteous. Thus in Luke x. 29 we have : “He, willing to justify himself”—i.e. wishing to make himself out righteous ; xvi. 15 : “Ye are they that justify yourselves before men”—i.e. present the appearance of righteous men ; vii. 29 : “All the people justified God”—i.e. acknowledged God’s justice ; xviii. 14 : “This man went down to his house justified rather than the other”—i.e. counted righteous before God ; Matt. xii. 37 : “By thy words thou shalt be justified”—i.e. acquitted. In all these sentences the word is used in a sense more or less connected with the ideas of acquittal, pardon, acceptance, or approbation—i.e. in a legal or judicial sense. And the same is to be observed of its use in the Old Testament—e.g. Deut. xxv. 1, 1 Kings viii. 32, Prov. xvii. 15, etc. On the other hand, there is no instance of its use in Holy Scripture in the sense of “making righteous.” The usage of the word elsewhere is, therefore, regarded as in favour of the view that the terms justification and to justify, in the Epistle to the Romans, imply the imputation of the merits of Christ to the sinner, rather than the infusion of righteousness into him ; and to this view support is said to be given both by detached expressions, and also by the whole course of St. Paul’s argument in the earlier chapters of this epistle. It is stated [iv. 9] that Abraham’s faith was reckoned for righteousness ; in iii. 24–26, the remission of sins is equivalent to the act of justifying ; while in v. 18 condemnation and justification are opposed to one another. Moreover, St. Paul’s argument is that all have sinned—all, Jews as well as Gentiles ; all are condemned by a law, the Jews by the Mosaic Law, the Gentiles by the law of nature under which they lived. All, without exception, need release from this condemnation. This cannot be effected by the works of a law, whether of Moses or of nature, because it is through law that the condemnation has passed upon all men. God has revealed the remedy. It is the righteousness of God through faith in Jesus Christ unto all them that believe—that is to say, justification. And justification being thus contrasted with condemnation, must mean pardon for sins committed and deliverance from condemnation incurred ; such pardon and deliverance are implied in imputed righteousness, but not in infused or imparted righteousness. St. Paul’s teaching appears to be that the justification of the sinner is effected by the imputing to him of the righteousness of Christ.

A further controversy with respect to justification, disputes whether the instrument by which man receives justification is faith alone, or faith in conjunction with the Christian graces of charity. It may be observed that St. Paul’s argument in the epistle to the Romans is directed to establish the doctrine that justification could be effected by merit, through obedience to the law. This leads him to the precise statement [iii. 28] : “We reckon that a man is justified apart from the works of the law” [Rom. vii. 4, Rev. Vers.] ; but the same Apostle in his epistle to Titus, iii. 8, in close connection with the words “justified by His grace,” writes, “Faithful is the saying, and in these things I will that thou abide faithfully, to the end that they who have believed God may be careful to do good works.” It is evident that he is concerned to separate works from faith, and to found where any claims of merit and works are founded upon them. The distinction is drawn plainly by Hooker, Book v., A. p. 553 : “To the imputation of death for the remission of sins we take faith alone to be necessary, whereby it is meaning to separate thereby faith from all other quality or duty which God requires to be matched therewith, but from which he secludes, in justification, the fellow-work of faith through precedent works. No any faith justify, but that wherewith faith is joined both hope and love. Yet justification is by faith alone, because there is no other whose works in whole or in part make him righteous in God’s sight.” The homily on salvation, Part I., states the matter thus : “Faith doth not shut out penitence, hope, love, dread, and the like, but God, to be joined with faith in every one that is justified ; but it shutteth them out from the office of justifying.” Having on the one hand to St. Paul’s words in iii. 24, “Being justified freely by His grace,” ch. iii. 28, “Justified by faith apart from the works of the law ;” ch. v. 1, “Justified by faith ;” ch. v. 9, “Justified by His grace,” and Gal. ii. 16, “Justified by faith and not through the works of the law,” on the other hand, to his positive statement in 1 Cor. xiii. 2—that faith is worthless unless conjoined with love, it is concluded that the instrument of justification is faith, and such faith only as is productive of good works, or, at least, is capable of producing good where the opportunity is given. If justification then be as the imputation of righteousness to the sinner, and faith the instrument by which the sinner receives justification, it is concluded further that justification is the free gift of God, and cause is the atonement made by Who died for our sins, and rose for justification." Man is put in of this free gift through the operation of the Holy Spirit [1 Cor. vi. 11], who is the efficient cause of justification. The means that the channels of the conveyance of this gift are those of the ministry of Word and Sacraments, especially the Sacrament of Baptism [see Rom. vi. 4-8]—shared therefore with Him through the death of Christ. . . . He that hath died with Christ; 1 Cor. vi. 11, "But ye are dead, but ye were sanctified, but ye are now living in the name of the Lord Jesus in the Spirit of our God;" Titus 2:11-12; and faith is the internal instrument by which man becomes the "recipient of the gift." While, however, we distinguish between "the imputation of Christ's righteousness"—i.e. justification—and "the sanctification"—i.e., sanctification—a phrase as "justification of the living" [1 v. 18] makes it plain that, justification and sanctification are distinct, but are not separate; the sanctification follows on the accounting righteous; justification is accepted, there sanctification follows. It is hardly necessary to say that there is no opposition between the language about justification "by the works of the Law," and 1 St. James, who writes that "by the works of the Law is justified, and not only by the works of the Law, but by the faith of the two Apostles treat the subject at two points of view, and the works of the Law are not the works of the Law, but the fruits of a living faith.

Both would hold that faith, to be living, must be, not dead, but productive.

—A Father who lived in the second century, and is known as Justin Martyr. He was born at Sicchem (Neapolis), in Samaria, of Gentile parents. In early life he turned to the principles of each of the schools of philosophy, but found them all wanting. The Stoic could tell him nothing of the nature of the Deity, the Peripatetic was too eager to fix the laws of nature, the Pythagorean serious acquaintance with music, and astronomy. The Platonic was more successful in satisfying his mind; but, one day, while he was on the seashore, absorbed in meditation, an aged man, who directed the study of the Sacred Books, some more ancient than the writings of the philosopher, advising him at the same time that the gates of light might be opened to him. Justin did so, and found that the philosophy was contained in the Scriptures.

-19th

Justin was the author of several works. Besides his Dialogue with Trypho, a Jew, from which the above account of his early life is obtained, his most notable writings are his two Apologies. In the first apology, addressed to the Emperor Antoninus Pius [about A.D. 140], he gives an account of the rites and doctrines of Christianity, shows the absurdity of the charges against its followers, and directs attention to the integrity of their life. It was probably this appeal which induced the Emperor to issue an edict commanding that Christians should not be disturbed, and that informers against them should be punished. In the second apology, written in the reign of Marcus Aurelius, the successor of Pius, Justin complains of the treatment of the Christians. He states that the immediate occasion for the apology was the fact that two Christians, Ptolemy and Lucius, had lately been put to death by the Prefect Urbicus, not for any specific crime, but merely for bearing the name of Christian. Justin himself expects to be treated in the same way, through one Crescens, a Cynic, who, though totally ignorant of their character, accuses the Christians of atheism and impiety.

Justin's anticipation of death was soon realised, and he earned his surname of "Martyr" about A.D. 163.

Amongst his other works are a Treatise against Heretics, now lost, and a Treatise on the Monarchy of God, which has come down to us. Several others have been ascribed to him, but are usually considered spurious, e.g. An Exposition of the Faith, Questions to the Gentes, and Answers to Questions to the Orthodox.

Justinian I., called "the Great," a famous Emperor of Constantinople [b. 483, Emp. 527, d. 567], celebrated for his victories over the Persians, Vandals, and Goths, and for reconquering Italy to the Empire. The great glory of Justinian reposes on the legislative works undertaken in his reign. He commissioned ten of the ablest men in the Empire to collect and abridge the different codes of Roman jurisprudence, and in the course of a few years no less than four publications came forth:—

1st. The Code [528], a collection of imperial institutions, in twelve books.

2nd. The Institutes [533], which reduced the whole system of Roman law to elementary principles, for the use of schools.

3rd. The Pandects, or Digest [533], a compilation in fifty books of the Gregorian, Theodosian, and Hermogenian codes, besides two thousand treatises on jurisprudence.

4th. The Novels, or Authentics [541], a collection of recent laws issued by Justinian.

Justinian built a great number of churches, above all that of St. Sophia, esteemed as one of the greatest wonders of architecture.

Justus, a Roman monk, was the first Bishop of Rochester, and succeeded Mellitus in the archbishopric of Canterbury [624-627]. He made Paulinus Bishop of the Northumbrians, who converted King Edwin and many of his subjects, and afterwards had the See of York.

Juxon, WILLIAM, D.D., Archbishop of Canterbury [b. 1582, d. 1663], was born at Chichester, educated at St. John's College, Oxford, of which he became President in 1621. He attracted the notice of Archbishop Laud, and Charles I. made him Dean of Worcester, Bishop of Hereford, and in 1633 Bishop of London; and finally, in 1635, Lord Treasurer, which station he filled to the general content. He was selected by the King to attend him on the scaffold and administer the sacrament to him, and to him Charles uttered the mysterious word, "Remember." In 1660 Charles II. made him Archbishop of Canterbury. He died in 1663, and was buried in St. John's College, to which he had been a great benefactor, as he was also to St. Paul's and Lambeth Palace. He was much esteemed for his learning, piety, and sweetness of temper.

Kaaba. [MAHOMETANISM.]

Kant, EMMANUEL [b. 1724, d. 1804].—This great philosopher and metaphysician may be called the father of modern German theology. Germany has always been a home of deep thought and inquiry. Even in mediæval times it produced the great mystics, such as Tauler. In the sixteenth century it begat the Reformation, and out of the same source, namely, profound meditation upon things visible and invisible, not as seen through the media of the Church or of evidences, but through converse of the personal soul with God. The Church of Rome was obnoxious, as resting its claims on tradition; the seventeenth century Deism of England and France, as resting upon apologetic evidences. So far from Germany rejecting either on religious grounds, it was because each professed a religious object that it was accepted at all. When the claims of each were pronounced insufficient, the attempt was made to find a new ground for faith, namely, the internal reason. Scripture was to be accepted on the ground that it was in harmony with that, not that it came with external proofs in its hands. This is the origin of what is known to us as German Rationalism.

Kant was born and educated at Königsberg, and in 1770 was appointed Professor of Logic and Metaphysics in his University. He was so attached to his native place that he hardly ever left it all his long life, and never to go any distance. He never married. It was not until he was fifty-seven years that he published the great work which is the basis of his philosophy, Kritik der Vernunft ["Critique of the Pure Reason"]. He is said to have been a splendid conversationalist, illustrating from travels, novels, and literature, with wonderful profusion, and seasoned of such humour that he was like a whole table in a roar, while he was at his own gravity unshaken. But no sign of levity or lightness appears in his book. It is written with deep gravity, as though cognate with the serious interest of his subject. It is not to give any kind of conspectus of his work here. Kant's philosophy was that of Hume on one side and to the other of Paley on the other. We will give Maurice's admirable summary:—start from the moral ground. All speculation, philosophical or theosophical, is important only for moral ends. His ethical groundwork in an essay, Practical Reason, is mainly social, but which permits the pursuit of a free exercise of thought, who like that amusement. To be free from the pediments from this happiness is to himself to abstract philosophy; away the doctrine of causality, the miracles, supernatural fears and beliefs. Paley lays his ethical ground in happiness, but not exactly in the pursuit of happiness. The world must be kept as it is. The polity of nations must be kept as it is. The motive must be a motive violent enough to prevent men from doing mischief. The will which Hume had thrown aside, is for these purposes. Such a will is how he proved (miracles Paley's only sufficient proof) to have given man, and to have confirmed those sanctions of fear and hope. Such a will somehow he proved (Paley thinks it is a proof) to have designed our world. No fine gentleman. He has no position as the protector of drawing-room reproaches of conscience or fears of hell. Neither does he perceive that it is his duty to provide the policeman with threats and fears to assist him in his work. He has a strong conviction that the authority over him, which does so to his liberty, but without obedience he cannot enjoy his liberty. The law of this law for himself and for his fellow-men as one of a kind—makes possible and real for him. He does not do self to abstract philosophy like Hume with a moral end always before him. The results are different, as the end was different. He accepts all Hume's statements so far as they assert the experience, so far as they make the way to knowledge. He accepts Hume's statements so far as they show the necessity of attempts to draw principles are not in it. He says more than said before of the limitation of intellect. He says more than said before of the help of speculation. But all this, in all this denial lead us at conclusion, adopted without a word of prejudice, arrived at by prejudices aside, that there are no ends of morality, that they are in an Eternal Being, that the condition of existence is the condition of existence."

Arguments for the being of God had been adduced by the form the basis of Paley's being rejected by Kant, he says, namely, the needs of our The sense of responsibility creates our freedom. It put into English methods of thought, and is the basis of a school of English divines. Upon proceeded to construct his unity. But setting aside all, as he did, his reconstruction adaptation to his preconceived by cutting away the facts stood in its way. This declaration produced a schism; those who upheld the Talmud, being almost all Rabbis, were called Rabbinists, and those who rejected traditions were called Karaites or Scripturists, from the Babylonish word karai, scripture. The Karaites have never been very numerous.

Kay, WILLIAM, D.D. [b. 1821, d. 1885].—A learned Biblical and Oriental scholar, born at Knaresborough, educated at Giggleswick Grammar School, Yorkshire, and at Lincoln College, Oxford, where he obtained a first-class in classics, and became Fellow and Tutor of his college. In 1849 he was appointed Principal of Bishop's College, Calcutta, but resigned for his health's sake in 1866, and took the country living of Great Leigh, Essex. He was one of the Old Testament Revision Committee, and to the end of his life unremitting in Biblical study. He wrote the commentary on Isaiah in the Speaker's Commentary, and was also the author of a translation of the Psalms with Commentary, and of Crisis Hupfeldiana, a clever exposure of the shallowness of the hierophants of the "Newer Criticism" in their treatment of the Pentateuch.

Kaye, JOHN, D.D. [b. 1783, d. 1853], Bishop, first of Bristol then of Lincoln. He was a learned man, being head of the classical tripos in 1804, and Regius Professor of Divinity in 1816. His writings were:—Ecclesiastical History Illustrated from the Writings of Tertullian; Some Account of the Writings and Opinions of Justin Martyr; Some Account of the Writings and Opinions of Clement of Alexandria; The Council of Nicaea; External Government and Discipline of the Church in the First Three Centuries; and a volume of Sermons and Charges.

Keach, BENJAMIN [b. 1640, d. 1704], was a member of the Particular or Calvinistic Baptists, and for thirty-six years minister at Horselydown, Southwark. He wrote Tropologia, Travels of True Godliness, Progress of Sin, A Golden Mine Opened, Gospel Mysteries Unveiled, and War with the Devil.

Keble, JOHN, the most popular of English sacred poets, born at Fairford, in Gloucestershire, April 25th, 1792; died at Bournemouth, March 29th, 1866. He was the son of the Rev. John Keble, for fifty-two years vicar of Coln St. Aldwyn's, Gloucestershire, and of Sarah, daughter of the Rev. John Maule, vicar of Ringwood, Hants. He received his early education at home from his father, and before he was fifteen gained a scholarship at Corpus Christi, Oxford, where he graduated B.A. first-class both in mathematics and classics in 1810, being then only just eighteen. Soon after, he was elected a Fellow of Oriel, where he took his M.A. in 1813. During his college course, Dr. Arnold was his contemporary and friend. In 1813 Keble gained the Chancellor's prize for an English essay on Translations from the Dead Languages, and for a Latin essay on A Comparison of Xenophon and Julius Cæsar. He was ordained deacon by Bishop Jackson, of Oxford, on Trinity Sunday, 1815, and took priest's Orders a year later. He became a Tutor of his College, and in 1814 and 1821 was Public Examiner in the University. In 1823 he gave up his Tutorship and resided with his father at Fairford, taking a few pupils, and keeping up a constant intercourse with Oxford, and he held the curacies of East Leach and Burthorpe, both in the immediate neighbourhood. In 1825 he accepted the curacy of Hursley, Hampshire, but after a short time he relinquished it on account of the death of his youngest sister, and returned to his father and only surviving sister at Fairford. Here he remained till 1836. In 1827 he published The Christian Year, at the earnest request of his friends, with whom parts of it had already existed in albums, etc. It appeared anonymously, and has had a greater influence on religious feeling in England than any other book of poems. Its motto was: "In quietness and confidence shall be your strength," and its object, as stated in the preface, to promote "a sober standard of feeling in matters of practical religion, and it is the happiness of the Church of England to possess in her authorised formularies an ample and secure provision for both." His object, he says, will be attained "if any person find assistance in bringing his own thoughts and feelings into more entire unison with those recommended and exemplified in the Prayer Book." The book has been criticised for some obscurity of diction, but its spiritual fervour has never been doubted. The late Principal Shairp says "Some of the poems are faultless of their kind, flowing from the first verse to the last, lucid in thought, vivid in diction, harmonious in their pensive melody." At the same time that he was preparing The Christian Year, Keble was also busy with his edition of Hooker, who was a great favourite with him.

After the passing of the Reform Bill in 1832, Keble was one of the four members of the University who took a prominent part in what is known as the Oxford Movement. On Sunday, July 14th, 1833, he preached the famous sermon at St. Mary's, which was published under the title of National Apostasy; and Dr Newman says of it, "I have ever considered and kept the day, as the start of the religious movement of 1833." Immediately afterwards appeared the first of The Tracts for the Times, of which Keble himself wrote eight. From 1831 to 1842 he was Professor of Poetry at Oxford in succession to Dean Milman. In 1835 he lost his father, and at the end of the year he married Miss Clarke, the daughter of a clergyman of a neighbouring parish to Fairford. In this year also he was presented by his old pupil,

Sir William Heathcote, to the rectory of Hursley - with - Otterbourne - and - Ampfield, near Winchester. The profits of The Christian Year enabled him to rebuild, in a costly manner, the church of Hursley, and although the living was only £400 a year during Keble's incumbency, Otterbourne church was rebuilt, and chapels provided for the two hamlets of Ampfield and Pitt. He was as eloquent as a preacher, but very earnest, and he had a wonderful power of attracting the young and old. He was buried in Hursley churchyard April 6th, 1866. He left children. His friends and admirers have perpetuated his memory by the name of Keble College at Oxford, where education may be had at a moderate cost, and the care has been taken that the religious influence shall be very definite.

Besides the Christian Year, which has gone through more than a hundred editions, Keble was the author of Lyra Innocentium, in conjunction with Newman, Frothingham, and others, of the Lyra Apostolica. In addition to his Oxford lectures on poetry, published in Latin [2 vols., 1844], he was the author of pamphlets On the Admission to Priest's Orders of Dissenters [1854]; On Profane Invasions of Matrimony; On Eucharistic Adoration; A Life of Bishop Wilson, of some volumes of sermons, published partly in his lifetime, partly posthumously, and of Uncommon Prayer and Devotion.

Keim, CARL THEODOR [b. 1813, d. 1890] a German theologian and historical writer was born at Stuttgart, and educated at Tübingen, under Baur. He first came to note as an earnest and sympathetic preacher, and he published sermons, Friendship to My Congregation [Stuttgart, 1862], delivered at Esslingen, of which he became Pastor in 1856, show that this character was well deserved. He then gave himself to the study of history, and published some works on the history of the Reformation. From 1862 to 1873 he held the Chair of Historical Theology at the University of Zurich, but ill health caused him to resign this post. He devoted himself to the most important epoch of his life, that of the beginnings of Christianity. First came his inaugural address, The Human Development of Jesus, and this was followed by other essays, but the result of his works was the History of Jesus of Nazareth in its Connection with the Jewish Nation, of which an English translation was published in 8 vols., 1873-82. Though it will presently be seen, the line taken by him is a rationalistic one, the book is very valuable. He spared himself no pains to realise fully the settings and surroundings of the Saviour's life, and to show us the religious and social condition of the world at the time of His coming, the strength and weakness of Orientalism and of Paganism.

Keithians.—A sect which separated from the Quakers in Pennsylvania in the year 1691; they were named after their leader, George Keith, a Scotchman. In the year 1700 Keith left the sect, and took Holy Orders in the Church of England, being ordained as a missionary. About two hundred members of the sect followed their leader and joined the Church of England; others became Baptists, and from the fact of their retaining the peculiar dress of the Quakers were called Quaker-Baptists; the remainder returned to the main body of the Quakers. George Keith settled eventually in England, and became rector of Edburton, in Sussex; he died in 1714.

Kelly, THOMAS [b. 1769, d. 1855].—A hymn-writer of considerable excellence. He was brought up as a lawyer, but chose the ministry as his profession, and was ordained in the established Church of Ireland. The Archbishop of Dublin, however, disliking his fervency and enthusiasm, inhibited him, and he became a Congregationalist. He was a man of large means, and devoted them to the furtherance of his religious views, building several chapels. His hymns were published in 1804, the best known being "We sing the praise of Him who died."

Kempis, THOMAS HEMERCKER, the supposed author of de Imitatione Christi, was born about 1380, at Kempen, near Cologne, where his father was a labouring man and his mother a village schoolmistress. He was sent to a religious community at Deventer, called "the Brothers of Common Life," where he studied grammar and plain chant, and afterwards entered as novice among the Regular Canons of Mount St. Agnes, near Zwolle, where his brother was prior. He received priest's Orders in 1413, and became sub-prior in 1429. He was an excellent copyist, and transcribed the Bible, the Missal, and several works of St. Bernard, and then began copying some pious and ascetic treatises, among which, according to some, was the Imitatio Christi, which gave rise, say they, to the erroneous idea that he was the author. He died in 1471. Nevertheless, a large number of critics have satisfied themselves that he was really the author of the book. [GERSON, JOHN.]

Ken, THOMAS, Bishop of Bath and Wells, born at Berkhamstead, in Hertfordshire, in July, 1637, the son of Thomas Ken, of Furnival's Inn. He was sent to Winchester College in 1651, and thence to New College, Oxford, in 1657. In 1666 Ken was elected a Fellow of Winchester College, and came under the notice of Bishop Morley, who made him his Domestic Chaplain and Rector of Brighstone, in the Isle of Wight, which living he held till 1670. He also held for a short time the rectory of Woodhay. In 1669 Morley made him Prebendary of Winchester Cathedral, and after giving up the rectory of Brighstone, Ken undertook the charge of St. John's Church, near Winchester, in addition to the work of his chaplaincy. At the same time he was engaged in composing a Manual of Prayers for Winchester Scholars. In 1679, Ken, who was now one of the King's Chaplains, was sent to the Hague as Chaplain to Princess Mary of Orange, with whom he became a great favourite, though he was looked upon with ill-feeling by the Prince. He returned to England in the following year, and three years later he acted as Chaplain to Lord Weymouth when the latter had command of an expedition for the demolishing of Tangiers. Ken settled down quietly at Winchester on his return, at a time when Charles II. was having a palace built there, and was in the habit of staying in the city with his Court. On one occasion Charles asked Ken to give Nell Gwynne a lodging in his house, and was decidedly refused, in a manner which made such an impression upon him, that when the See of Bath and Wells became vacant he declared that no one should have it but "the little man who would not give poor Nelly a lodging." Before Ken had taken possession of the See he was called upon to attend the King's deathbed, and did not go down to Wells till 1685. In the same year the Duke of Monmouth's rebellion took place, and the Bishop received and treated with much kindness fugitives from the defeated army, numbers of whom made their way to Wells. He was also appointed to attend the Duke on the scaffold. On the accession of James II. Ken had signed a declaration, drawn up by several of the bishops, testifying to the loyalty and allegiance of all members of the Church of England, in return for the goodwill which the King expressed towards the Church. In 1688 King James directed that a declaration for liberty of conscience should be read in every church, and copies of the declaration were sent to the archbishops and bishops for distribution. This was known to be intended for the benefit of the Roman Catholics, and a number of bishops and clergy, Ken among them, met to consider what was best to be done. They drew up a petition, signed by Archbishop Sancroft, Bishop Ken, and five others, beseeching the King not to insist upon its being read, and the petitioners themselves presented it, May 18th, 1688. They were sent to the Tower, and tried June 15th, when the jury returned a verdict of acquittal. Thanksgivings were held in all parts of the land, in token of the sympathy which the people felt for the prisoners. Later in the same year came the Revolution, when King James fled and the Prince of Orange came to England, in accordance with the invitation of Parliament. Many of the bishops protested against his election, and at his coronation refused to take the oaths of allegiance, preferring to be deprived of their bishoprics rather than act against their consciences. Bishop Ken was one of these Non-jurors, as they were called, and was accordingly compelled to leave Wells, and retired to Longleat, the residence of his former patron Lord Weymouth. Here he remained for over twenty years, undisturbed except on one occasion, when he was summoned before the Privy Council to answer to a charge of having usurped authority in appealing for alms for the maintenance of the non-juring clergy. It was proposed on the accession of Queen Anne that he should resume the charge of his diocese, in which he had been supplanted by Dr. Kidder; but he declined the offer, though he always maintained that he was the lawful bishop, and until Kidder's death always signed himself "Tho. Bath and Wells." Queen Anne settled upon him a pension of £200 per annum, which, as usual, he spent in charity. He died at Longleat, of paralysis, March 19th, 1710. His literary works, besides the prayers already mentioned, consisted chiefly of sacred poetry. Much of this was in the form of hymns, of which the Morning and Evening Hymns are the best known. These he used to accompany on his lute, and in the composition of them he passed most of the later part of his life.

Kennicott, BENJAMIN, a celebrated Hebraist, was born of humble parents at Totnes, in Devonshire, in 1718. He was appointed master of the charity school in his native town till 1744, when sufficient money was raised to enable him to go to Oxford. He entered at Wadham College, where he applied himself specially to the study of divinity and Hebrew. While still an undergraduate he published two dissertations: the first on The Tree of Life in Paradise, and the second on The Oblations of Cain and Abel, which was so well received that he was made a Fellow of Exeter College. He remained at Oxford till his death, which took place in 1783, having become D.D. in 1761, Bodleian Librarian in 1767, and Canon of Christ Church and Rector of Culham, Oxfordshire, in 1770.

Kennicott's great work is his Hebrew Bible. In order to excite an interest in his plans he first published a work On the State of the Printed Hebrew Text of the Old Testament [1753], and then in 1760 set about collecting the Hebrew manuscripts. The plan was warmly approved by the clergy, and within ten thousand pounds were contributed towards the expenses. Several learned men were employed at home and abroad, among them

An important supplement Bible was published by De the title of Varie Lectiones anti. These two writers are lated together thirteen hundred manuscripts.

[Ken.] On Nov. 26th, 1703, Dr. Kidder and his wife were killed in their bed by the falling of a stack of chimneys during the most terrific storm that ever fell on this country. He was the author of several works, the principal of which is a Commentary on the Pentateuch. He also wrote The Young Man's Duty; Concivium Calento, a discourse on the right way of preparing for the Lord's Supper; The Christian Sufferer Supported, and some other sermons. He was a great Hebrew scholar.

Kilian, St., was born in Ireland about the middle of the seventh century, and re- ceived a liberal and Christian education from his parents. From his youth he was devoted to the study of the Scriptures, and an ardent desire grew up in him to preach to infidels. Accordingly he crossed to Franconia with eleven companions in 685. He spent some time in Würzburg, where the Governor, Gosbert, and all the people were Pagans; but, finding that he needed authority, went to Rome, where he was consecrated Bishop by Pope Conon in 686, and received full permis- sion to preach to the heathen. He diligently continued his work, and in a short time the greater part of the inhabitants were converted. Gosbert had married Geila, his brother's wife, and when the Governor had become a Chris- tian, Kilian attacked him for this, and entreated him to give up his wife as a proof of his sincerity. Gosbert, after great per- suasion, yielded; whereupon Geila caused Kilian and his companions to be assass- inated July 8th, 689. It is said that the murderer, Geila, Gosbert, and his descendants, all died a violent death.

Kimchi, David [b. 1160, d. 1240].—A learned Jewish Rabbi, of great influence in his time, and author of many works on the Hebrew tongue, which have formed the bases of nearly all more modern works. He wrote a Commentary on the Psalms, which was translated into Latin, and on Zechariah, which latter work was translated by the late Dr. McCaul into English.

King, Henry, eldest son of John, Bishop of London, was born at Wornal, in Bucking- hamshire, in the latter end of the sixteenth century. He was elected from Westminster to Christ Church, in Oxford, where he took orders, and commenced Doctor in Divinity. After having gone through several consider- able preferments in the Church, he was pro- moted to the See of Chichester in 1641. The Bishop was a great scholar, a celebrated preacher, and very remarkable for his hospi- tality and charity. He died at Chichester in 1669. His works are A Sermon preached at St. Paul's Cross, November 25th, 1621, upon Occasion of that False and Scandalous Report touching the Supposed Apostasy of Dr. John King, late Bishop of London, to which is added, The Examination of Thomas Preston, taken before the Archbishop of Canterbury at Lambeth, December 20th, 1621, Concerning his being the author of Bishop King's Apostasy. The Bishop published several other sermons preached at Court and upon other public occasions. Among them is an Exposition upon the Lord's Prayer, delivered in several Sermons on St. Matthew vi. 9, etc.

King, JOHN, son of Philip King, of Wornal, and father of the preceding, was born in 1559, admitted student of Christ's Church, took the degree of Doctor in Divinity, was preferred to the deanery of Christ's Church in 1605, and nominated in 1611 to the bishopric of London by King James I., who used to call him the King of Preachers. He had the character of a great divine and a fine speaker, and was noted for his piety. He died in 1621, being fifty-two years of age, and was buried in St. Paul's Cathedral. Soon after the Bishop's death, some Roman Catholics asserted that he died in their communion, but without truth [see preceding article]. Bishop King wrote Lectures upon Jonah, and several sermons preached at the University, at Court, and upon public occasions.

King, WILLIAM, Archbishop of Dublin, was born in Antrim in 1650. He studied at Trinity College, Dublin, and in 1688 became Dean of St. Patrick's. He was a staunch Protestant, which caused him to be imprisoned in Dublin Castle by James II. On his release he became Bishop of Derry, and afterwards Archbishop of Dublin, which post he held from 1702 till his death in 1729. His works are on metaphysics and theology. The chief are The State of the Protestants in Ireland in James II.'s Reign, Divine Predestination and Foreknowledge, and the best known, De Origine Mali, translated into English by Bishop Law in 1731, which was an endeavour to show that the existence of evil is reconcilable with the goodness of God.

Kingdom of God.—It is plain at the very opening of any page of the four Gospels, that when Christianity was proclaimed in this world it was announced as a Kingdom. The opening verse of the New Testament calls Christ the Son of David, and every act and word recorded of the Saviour has reference to this Kingdom. The voice of the herald announcing Him cried, "The Kingdom of Heaven is at hand." Nearly every one of the Lord's parables is prefaced with "The Kingdom of Heaven is like" The superscription on the Cross called Him "a King." The Apostle caught up in the Spirit to see visions of heaven heard the angels sing "The kingdom of this world is become the Kingdom of our Lord and of His Christ."

The language and acts of our Saviour explain the nature of this Kingdom not the counterpart of the Empire. It was not a Cæsar sitting in the East, but a life diffused through the universe, entering into the hearts of His worshippers. He emphasized that the Kingdom was not of men: that it was like a grain of mustard seed which was scattered over different soils, that the right soil for it was an honest and good heart. He showed that a communication had been opened between this visible world and the one invisible world, and that the one was not the power of the other. This is the Kingdom all through the Acts of the Apostles and the different Epistles. The Apostles dwell on the great acts of Christ and His Resurrection as evidences that the Kingdom is of God. The King and His Kingdom spiritually reign through them. He fulfilled the promises of the Old Testament, expounding and explaining all the previous history of the world, and whilst the Apostles of the Church bore witness that the same King who had spoken to Abraham was King of the New Covenant, and that there was no discontinuity in the one Church and Kingdom of God, St. Paul also witnessed that He freed the same Church from all exclusions, and opened His Kingdom to all believers. The root of the Kingdom is the union of the Godhead with humanity, and that which were contained the doctrines of justification, of a Divine life in man, of regeneration by faith, of sanctification by the Holy Spirit. Not only the grand Christian hope, but the common duties of life were declared by St. Paul in his Epistle to the Ephesians to rest in Christ and His Kingdom absolutely.

The history of Christianity is in its extent the history of the various Kingdoms which grew up respecting the Kingdom of God. The growth of the Kingdom was the growth of the belief that the Church was modelled after the false Empire of the Cæsars, with a view to show who was Christ's representative. The formation cast aside that idea for that the Kingship of Christ is His over individual souls, which does not exclude the idea that, in proportion as the Kingdom comes extended, the kingdom may be more visible in a concrete form and person. The "Kingdom of God is among us," Christ, and the Apostles spoke of it as being in the world, and as fighting against the world. It is among us, and is opposed to the world. For the spirit of the world is the spirit of the world, as the Spirit of Christ is the Spirit of Christ. Christ's life was the perfect human life, therefore, His subjects must be of that life of self-surrender, and His progress in proportion as mankind progress to shape its career and its aims in accordance with that Divine and human ideal.

Tragedy, a dramatic setting of the story of St. Elizabeth of Hungary, which, although it has gone through several editions, has not received the attention from the critics which it unquestionably merits. Later on in life he published some other volumes of verse, and though he failed to attain the highest place, he will always take a high rank among poets of the second order.

Always restlessly eager in philanthropic schemes, he came to the front in 1847 and 1848
as the advocate of the working classes. Mr.
Maurice's schemes of "Christian Socialism" excited his ardent admiration, and he gave of his best for their advancement. The first of his novels was devoted to this subject. In the hands of a writer untouched by the live coal from the altar of genius, such a hero as Alton Locke would have excited little interest, but Mr. Kingsley's story had a very remarkable success. On all sides the story of the tailor's apprentice, with its remarkable episodes in life, in the shops of the sweaters and in the hideous fever dens in which the slaves of a certain small section of the London tradesmen had their habitation, was received with something approaching to enthusiasm. What was of more importance was the fact that its author was able to carry out a philanthropic scheme for the amelioration of the condition of these unhappy drudges, the effects of which have even now not ceased to exist.
The "Christian Socialists," with Mr. Kingsley as their guiding spirit, started a scheme for the introduction of what has since become known as "the co-operative principle" into the tailors' trade. Their first establishment encountered considerable opposition, and was attended by great difficulties, but in the end it prospered, and their place of business is, we believe, still in existence. But the evil against which he fought has deep roots, and it is to be feared that the cruel and iniquitous "sweating" system, against which Mr.
Kingsley so vigorously wrote, is but little ameliorated, and the poor needlewomen are not much better off than when Hood wrote
"The Song of the Shirt." Yet Kingsley's book is of great value. It roused hundreds of good people to realise and to hate an evil, and to pray and work that it may yet be undone.

For a while Charles Kingsley was commonly known as the "Chartist Parson." A little later he published Yeast, a curiously crude and imperfect statement of the difficulties of "the agricultural labour question," reprinted from Fraser's Magazine. He used to declare that it was the worst of his books.

After the publication of the first novel, Mr.
Kingsley glided off into a more purely literary groove than that which he had up to the time occupied. In 1852 he produced Phaethon, or Loose Thoughts for Loose Thinkers, a very clever Socratic dialogue on Christian evidence. His novel Hypatia appeared in 1853. It is probable that no novel ever went through a severer ordeal of criticism than this, and it is no small testimony to its genuine merits that, in spite of its admitted faults, it still maintains its ground with the reading public. The time chosen is one of which very few general readers know anything; the subject—the Church of Alexandria in the fourth century—is far from being one of a popular kind; while the theological character of much of the writing is to novel-readers eminently unattractive. But the vivid pictures of Alexandrian life, of the monks, of the struggle between the old faith and the new, are not surpassed in our literature.

The studies which had led Mr. Kingsley to the production of this novel resulted also in a volume of lectures on Alexandria and her Schools, a work which hardly advanced its author's reputation. And his lectures on The Roman and the Teuton, which, in his capacity of Professor of Modern History, Mr. Kingsley delivered before the University of Cambridge, were somewhat bitterly, and, according to Mr. Max Müller (no mean authority), very undeservedly, attacked. With all his merits, Kingsley was not precisely fitted for the work of historical criticism. He was admirable in the open air, one of the most accomplished of salmon-fishers, with a marvellous eye for the picturesque, a great sense of humour, and an infinite store of manliness and good sense.

The most genuine and spontaneous of his books were the novels of Westward Ho! published in 1855, and Two Years Ago in 1857. He was the author of several volumes of sermons, all of which indicate an acquaintance and a sympathy with the views and doctrines of Maurice; and he was identified with some of Dean Stanley's more pronounced efforts to introduce the representatives of Scottish Presbyterianism and secular literature within the walls of Westminster Abbey.

Apart from theological matters, there are probably few who would have found reason for differing from Kingsley's general views, and fewer still who would object to his writings on purely literary grounds. His book about The Hermits of Egypt is in its way a model of style and of condensation. The Water Babies is a work of no common power, irradiated with rare humour, and with a depth of hidden meaning, while the story of the author's Christmas in the West Indies—At Last—is, like some of his essays, one of the most graceful pieces of purely descriptive writing in the English language. His attempts to popularise science in his Glaucus, Town Geology, and Madam How and Lady Why, were all excellent works, and a scientific society which he started while Canon of Chester holds a very high place.

Even Kingsley's novels are books to profit by; it is impossible to read them without feeling stronger and better; for their leading feature is their intolerance of all that is mean or weak; their scornful antipathy to indolence, cowardice, avarice, selfishness, all the vices that debase the mind or rust the faculties. The "muscular Christianity" with which his name has been identified (though he somewhat indignantly repudiated the phrase) was only the common-sense principle of the Christian religion in healthy, every-day, unostentatious action. He made it his aim to show that there was nothing incompatible between the Christian life, as its Founder taught it, and the innocent enjoyment of the best gifts of the Creator, and that it was the first duty of every conscientious man to make the very utmost of his powers for the service of his fellow-creatures.

Kirchentag (Church diet), an association of ministers and laymen of the Lutheran, German Reformed, United Evangelical, and Moravian Churches in Germany for the promotion of the interests of religion, without reference to their denominational differences. The idea of such a meeting was brought forward by Bethmann Hollweg, Professor of Law at the Bonn University, in April, 1844, in a pamphlet; and in the annual conference of Sandhof, near Frankfort, in May, it was further discussed and approved of. The first Kirchentag was convened on Sept. 21st, 1844, at Wittenberg, more than five hundred delegates being present. From that time it was held yearly, the place of meeting being changed from year to year, till 1871, since which time no Kirchentag has been convened. Its discussions and resolutions have exercised a considerable influence over Germany. From it sprang the "Congress for Inner Mission," which is held yearly in Germany, and whose leader was Dr. Wichern, till his death in 1881.

Kirk, from the Greek kyriakon [Cyrac], "belonging to the Lord."

Kirk Session.—The name of a petty ecclesiastical court of the Kirk in Scotland. Each parish is divided into several districts, and each of these is supervised by its own elder and deacon. A consistory of the minister, elders, and deacons of a parish forms the kirk session. It regulates matters relating to public worship, elections, catechising, visitations, the poor's fund, etc. It takes cognizance of the lesser matters of scandal, but the greater ones are left to the Presbytery, to whom in all cases an appeal lies from the kirk session.

Kiss of Peace.—This form of salutation, as a token of Christian affection, appears to have been an Apostolic custom, and is frequently mentioned in the New Testament. It was one of the rites of the Eucharistic Service in the primitive Church. It was omitted on Good Friday, in remembrance of the traitorous kiss of Judas Iscariot. In the Roman Church the kiss of peace follows and is, as Innocent I. wrote, the whole of the sacred action. It is given literally in the West since the thirteenth century, when the use of the "osculatorium," a plate with a figure of a cross stamped upon it, kissed first and then by the clerics and the laity.

This was introduced into England by Archbishop Walter of York in 1170; now the pax is not given at all, and in high mass an embrace or the kiss and given only to the choir.

Kitto, John, D.D. [b. 1804, d. 1854], a learned man on Biblical subjects. He was the youngest of four children, of poor parents, and was educated at a boarding-school. He was at the age of 17 when he fell from a ladder into a well, and was left almost deaf for the rest of his life. His things were at such a low ebb that he had to go into Plymouth. Here he learned the trade of a printer, and in 1821 was apprenticed to a printer, who treated him so cruelly that his apprenticeship was cancelled. He had a strong passion for reading, and by the opportunity of improvement, he met some men who had tried his case with his powers that they gave him the post of sub-librarian at the library of Plymouth. Here he had opportunities of reading, and he turned to the study of the Bible, and the idea of becoming a missionary. He was introduced to Mr. Groves, a printer, who offered to take him and teach him his profession. He resumed his reading, and in 1825 published Tracts and Letters by John Kitto, which, owing to his varied knowledge, was well received. Mr. Groves, who was himself going out as a missionary, learned that the Missionary Society wanted a man for their foreign station, and he offered £100 to the Missionary College that Kitto might there learn printing. He entered that college in 1827-29 he worked for Malta, but failing health he gave up the life of a printer, and took him, as tutor to his son, on a tour in the East, visiting St. Petersburg, the Caucasus, Armenia, and Baghdad. In these travels he acquired knowledge which produced those tracts which have immortalised his name. He made a trip down the Nile with John M'Neill. At the close of his travels he turned towards home, finding that his deafness was an insuperable bar to his becoming a missionary. From this time he gave himself up to authorship, and was liberally treated by his bookseller, Mr. Charles Knight, and was a contributor to the Penny Encyclopædia, published under his auspices. In 1835 he commenced his Pictorial Bible, which was published in 1838. In 1843 appeared his History of Palestine; in 1845 The Lost Senses—Deafness and Blindness; Daily Bible Illustrations [1848-53], in some respects his greatest work. He also edited the Cyclopædia of Biblical Literature. In 1844 the University of Giessen conferred on him the degree of D.D., though he was a layman, and the Society of Antiquaries elected him one of their fellows in 1845. He died at Cannstadt, in Wurtemberg, whilst on a continental tour which had been advised for his health. His Life has been written by Dr. J. E. Ryland and Professor Eadie of Glasgow.

Klopstock, Friedrich Gottlieb, a German religious poet, was born in 1724 at Quedlinburg, at the gymnasium of which place he received his early tuition. In his sixteenth year he went to school at Naumburg, where his poetical character was first developed. He perfected himself in classics, and determined to write a long epic poem, but could not make up his mind as to the subject, and rather inclined towards "Henry the Fowler." In 1745 he went to Jena to study theology, and soon determined to take Christ as his hero. In 1746 he passed to Leipsic, and there became acquainted with the editors of the Bremische Beiträge, in which the first three cantos of the Messiah appeared in 1748. They attracted great attention; by some the author was pronounced a religious poet of the highest order, while others deemed his poetical treatment of so sacred a subject profane and presumptuous. He was made much of by his neighbours; thus the Danish minister Bernstorff offered him a pension of 400 dols. if he would come to Copenhagen and finish his poem, and introduced him to the king, Frederick V., whom he accompanied on his travels. In 1771 he left Copenhagen and settled at Hamburg, where he completed his Messiah, and died in 1803.

Kneelers. [GENUFLECTENTES.]

Kneeling.—The custom of kneeling during confession, prayers, etc., is of great antiquity, and is mentioned repeatedly in the Old and New Testaments. It was so common in the primitive Church, that prayers gained the name of "bending the knees." Formerly, during Easter and Whitsuntide, all Christians, except penitents, who were denied the privilege, stood instead of kneeling during the prayers, and this custom was confirmed by the Council of Nice. In some countries, as Germany and Scotland, the people sit or stand during prayers, but in the latter country the practice is dying out.

Knobel, KARL AUGUST, a learned Hebraist, was born at Tzschscheln, in Lower Lusatia, in 1807. He studied at Breslau University, and became professor of theology there in 1835, and at Giessen in 1839, which latter post he retained till his death in 1863. He contributed the commentaries on Isaiah to Hirzel's Short Commentary on the Old Testament. This led to a controversy with Ewald, and Knobel wrote Exegetical Vade mecum for Herr Ewald, in Tübingen. He also was the author of Prophecies of the Hebraists, Commentary on the Book of Ecclesiastes, Genealogical Tables of Genesis. His commentaries are notable for the learning, originality, and argumentative powers which they display, but also for a rationalism which prevented the author from grasping the whole meaning of the works on which he commented.

Known Man.—A name adopted by the Lollards in the fifteenth century. It is thus explained by Pecock, Bishop of Chichester: "The first of these texts is written 1 Cor. xiv., in the end, thus: 'Sotheli if eny man unknowith, he schal be unknown.' By this text they take that if any man knoweth not or put not, in what he may, his business for to learn the writing of the Bible, as it lieth in the text, namely, the writing of the New Testament, he shall be unknown of God for to be any of His. And for this, that they busy themselves for to learn and know the Bible . . . they give a name proper to themselves, and call themselves known men, as though all other than them be unknown; and when one of them talketh with another of them of some other third man, the hearer will ask thus: 'Is he a known man?' and if it be answered to him thus, 'Yea, he is a known man!' all is safe, peril is not for to deal with him; and if it be answered to him thus: 'He is no known man,' then peril is casted for to much homely deal with him."

The name "known men" was also applied to the Puritans of Henry VIII.'s reign.

Knox, JOHN, born at Haddington, in East Lothian, 1505, died at Edinburgh, Nov. 24th, 1572. He was the son of a small landowner, and was educated at the grammar school of Haddington, whence he proceeded to Glasgow University, and is mentioned among the Incorporati in 1522. There is no mention of his taking any degree, nor does he appear to have made any mark as a scholar during the years of his education. He was ordained to the priesthood before 1530, and became Professor of Logic, and tutor in the family of Hugh Douglas, of East Lothian. Hitherto he had adhered to the Romish doctrines in which he had been educated, but about this time Patrick Hamilton, who had been at Wittenberg, and there adopted the Reformed views, brought them back with him to Scotland, and by degrees Protestantism began to make its way. Knox is said to have first heard the Lutheran doctrines from Thomas Guillaume, a disciple of Hamilton, but the most direct influence was exerted over him by George Wishart, to whom he attached himself till Wishart was seized and burnt as a heretic. Knox openly professed himself a Protestant about 1544, and in 1547 was called to officiate as Protestant minister at St. Andrew's, whither he had fled from the persecution which raged throughout Scotland. His ministry had only lasted a few months when St. Andrew's was attacked by the French fleet; the city capitulated, and Knox, with other Protestant refugees, was condemned for nineteen months to work at the galleys. His health was injured for life by the suffering which he endured, but he never abandoned the hope of returning to carry on his ministry. He was released early in 1548, and, finding that little good could be done in Scotland, he took refuge first in Berwick and afterwards in Newcastle, in both places preaching and working with untiring zeal. His fame having spread southwards, he was made Chaplain to Edward VI. in 1551, and was afterwards offered the Bishopric of Rochester, which he refused, as being contrary to his principles. During his stay in England Knox married the daughter of a gentleman of Northumberland, and in 1555 went with her to Dieppe and then to Geneva, where he visited Calvin. He undertook the charge of the Protestant Church at Frankfurt-on-Main, but hearing in 1559 that the persecutions in Scotland were abating, he returned, and arrived at a critical time. Some Protestant preachers were on the point of being tried for their lives, and Knox, who had been condemned in the early days of the persecution, was again proclaimed a heretic. The Queen-Regent was alarmed at the sympathy felt by the people for these clergy, and the trial was put off. Knox was appointed minister of the church of St. Giles, the parish church of Edinburgh, in 1560, and was there during the remaining years of his life. His wife died in the same year. On the accession of Mary Queen of Scots, Knox's fortitude was put to the test. He preached openly in his own church against the idolatry which the Roman Catholic Sovereign was seeking to introduce upon Scotland, and spoke in such bold terms on the subject of her marriage that he was sent for to Holyrood to answer for his conduct. The Queen desired that in future he would tell her privately of anything that he saw to be wrong, and on his refusal, finding him indifferent to her threats, she tried to conciliate him. Finally he was summoned to trial on a charge of treason, and was acquitted after a long examination and by a small majority. It was a decided victory for the Protestants, though in 1564 Knox

The great doctrine of the Koran is the unity of God, to restore which Mahomet said was the chief end of his mission; it being laid down by him as a fundamental doctrine that there never was, nor can be, more than one orthodox religion, though the particular laws or ceremonies are subject to alteration according to Divine direction; that whenever this religion became neglected or corrupted in essentials, God re-informed mankind thereof
by several prophets, chiefly Moses and Jesus, till the appearance of Mahomet, who is their seal, and no other is to be expected after him.
To engage the people to listen to him, a great part of the Koran is taken up with examples of awful punishments formerly inflicted by God on those who rejected his messengers, and these stories are taken many of them from the Old and New Testaments and the Apocrypha. The general design of the Koran was to unite in one religion the Jews, Christians and idolaters by whom Arabia was peopled.

The Koran is held in the highest reverence
by the Mussulmans: they dare not so much as touch it without being legally purified. It is read with great care and respect, being never held below the girdle. They swear by it, take omens from it on all weighty occasions, adorn it with gold and jewels, and will not knowingly suffer it to be in the hands of any un-believer.

Kortholt, CHRISTIAN [b. 1632, d. 1694].
—He was born at Bourg, in the island of Femern; studied at Rostock, Jena, Wittenberg, and Leipzig; became a Doctor of Divinity, and in 1666 was made Professor of Theology at Kiel. In 1680 the Duke of Holstein made him Professor of Ecclesiastical Antiquity and Vice-Chancellor for life of that university. He left behind him a character for great industry and ability. He was a very voluminous author, and wrote both in High Dutch and Latin. Among his tracts are De Persecutionibus Ecclesiæ primitivæ [1660, reprinted in quarto, at Kiel, in 1689], De Religione Ethnica Muhammidana et Judaica, De Origine et Natura Christianismi, &c.

Krantz or Crantz, ALBERT [b. 1445, d.
1517], Doctor of Law and Divinity. He studied at Cologne and Rostock. He was a man of great learning and piety, and sorely lamented the sins and disorders of his time, but discouraged the idea of Luther's being able in any way to cope with them. He published some theological books, but is more celebrated for his historical works, the principal of which are—an Ecclesiastical History under the name of Metropolis, wherein he treats of the churches founded or restored by Charles the Great; his history of the Saxons, in 13 books, and of the Vandals, in 14, and a

Chronicle of Sweden, Denmark, and Norway, beginning with Charlemagne and ending 1504.

Krummacher, FRIEDRICH WILHELM, an eloquent preacher, the son of Friedrich Adolf, a Reformed pastor, was born at Möss, on the Rhine, in 1796; studied at Halle and at Jena; became Assistant Pastor at Frankfurt in 1819; moved to Ruhrort in 1825. It was here that he delivered the lectures on Elijah and Elisha which are so well known, not only in Germany, but also in England and America. In 1834 he went to Elberfeld, and while there received a call as preacher to a German Reformed congregation in New York, but refused. In 1847 he succeeded Marheinecke at the Trinity Church, Berlin, where he preached boldly against Rationalism. In 1853 he was appointed Court Chaplain at Potsdam, where he died in 1868. He took a great interest in the Evangelical Alliance, and was present at the conference in London in 1851, and at each succeeding conference till his death. He was one of the ministers who preached at the London Exhibition in 1862. Many of Krummacher's books have been translated into English. The chief, besides his Elijah, are Salomo and Sulamith, The Suffering Christ, and David, the King of Israel.

Kyrie Eleison, the Greek of "Lord have mercy." The words are found in the Clementine Liturgy as part of the prayers for the catechumens. At the Second Council of Arles they were directed to be used, the custom of the Apostolic Sees and of all the Italian and Eastern provinces being assigned as the reason. Formerly, each of the three clauses, "Lord have mercy, Christ have mercy, Lord have mercy," was repeated three times, and in accordance with this in the First Prayer Book of Edward VI., where they are placed at the beginning of the Communion Service, the figure iii. is prefixed to each clause. This practice is still adhered to in the Roman Church. The Kyrie Eleison is sometimes called the "Lesser Litany."

Labadie, JEAN DE, the founder of the sect of the Labadists, was born at Bourg, in Bordeaux, in 1610. He was educated at the Jesuit College at Bordeaux, where he studied theology, philosophy, the Bible, and mysticism; but in 1639 he was dismissed, and became Canon and Teacher of Theology at Amiens. His sermons made a great impression; but he roused anger, especially among the Jesuits, by some of his teachings. Richelieu protected him, but Mazarin expelled him from Amiens, and he retired to the Carmelite hermitage at Gravelle. Here he read Calvin's Institutiones, which caused him in 1650 to secede to the Calvinists. He was pastor at Montauban till 1660, when he was banished for exciting sedition, and went to Geneva, and in 1666 to Middelburg, in Zealand. On his way he formed a secret union with Pierre Yvon, Pierre Dulignon, and François Menuret and others, and formed the nucleus of the sect of Labadists. He was suspended and expelled from Middelburg in 1668 for refusing to sign the Belgic Confession; but the Princess Palatine Elizabeth, through the influence of the learned lady Anna Maria Schurmann, offered a refuge to many of his followers at Erfurt, where she was titular abbess. They were banished in 1672 to Altona, where Labadie died in 1674. His followers immediately removed to Wierwert, in North Holland, where they for a time rapidly increased in numbers; but the sect died out on the death of the original adherents, and in 1703 only about thirty remained. The Labadists in several respects were very similar to the early Quakers. They agreed with Schwenkfeld and the Anabaptists in attaching great importance to internal revelation, by which the external revelation is rendered intelligible, and from which it receives its authority. They also entertained very strong views as to the purity of the visible Church, maintaining that it ought not to consist of professing disciples of Christ, but of really sanctified Christians, striving after perfection in holiness.

It was itself in the form of a cross—a short transverse bar being fixed near the end of a long staff, above the bar was a crown of gold, within which was the monogram $\chi\rho$, and from the bar hung a small banner \times of silk, richly ornamented.

Labbé, PHILIPPE [b. 1607, d. 1667], was a French Jesuit. He was teacher of philosophy and theology, but devoted most of his time to writing. He was the author of seventy-five different works, the most notable of which is his account of the Councils.

Laborantes.—A name sometimes given to an inferior order of the clergy who saw to the decent and honourable interment of the dead. Other names for the order were copialai, fossarii, and lecticarii.

La Chaise, FRANÇOIS DE [b. 1624, d. 1705], was a French Jesuit who taught philosophy and theology at Lyons and at Caen, noble, and in 1673 became Confessor to Louis XIV. He was skilful and patient, and gained a great influence over the mind and conscience of the King, and played a chief part in the ecclesiastical affairs of the time, e.g. the Edict of Nantes, the difficulties between

JEAN BAPTISTE HENRI, the modern French preacher, was of Bourges, in the Department of Cher. He was educated and legal studies at Dijon, and his degree, passed in 1822 to which he began to practise as an advocate and rose rapidly to distinction. He was strongly inclined to Catholicism, and caused great surprise when he left the College of St. Sulpice, to join the holy orders. His reasons for this step were that he was roused by Essai sur l'Indifférence, and by the illusion that Christianity was the social development of the age, which soon became celebrated as the "College of Juilli," to which he attached, formed the acquaintance of Montalembert, with which he formed a close alliance, and, under the motto "God and liberty," contended against the highest Church principle of extreme Radicalism. They had called L'Arc-en-ciel, which was suppressed by Pope Gregory XVI. in 1831. He was finally submitted, and withdrew from all public affairs. In 1835 he preached at Notre Dame Cathedral, and his sermons drew immense crowds. In 1836 he entered the novitiate of the Society of Jesus. From this date he devoted his time to preaching in France, and he attempted, with little success, to restore the Society there. In 1848 he was elected one of the representatives of the Society, and took part in some of the debates of the Radical side; but he refused to declare himself a partisan, and retired from political life. He continued his sermons at Notre Dame till 1851, when his health began to decline, and he withdrew in 1854 to the Convent of Sorreze, where he spent the remainder of his life and died in 1861. Lacordaire's sermons at Notre Dame have been published under the title of Conférences de Notre Dame de Paris, 1835-50. In 1858 he wrote a series of Letters to a Young Friend. Many of his sermons have been translated into English.

Lactantius, LUCIUS CÆLIUS FIRMIANUS.—A Christian apologist of great eloquence who lived at the end of the third and beginning of the fourth century. The country of his birth is disputed, some writers saying that he was a native of Africa, and others that he was born at Firmo in Italy. He was very famous as a scholar, and became the tutor of Crispus, the son of Constantine, while his eloquence gained him the name of the Christian Cicero. He was the author of several theological works, of which the principal are his Institutions and his treatise on The Death of Persecutors, intended to show that persecutors of the Church visibly fall under the judgments of God. His works are translated in Clarke's Ante-Nicene Library.

Lactinia [lit. "dishes made of milk"].—A name applied to milk, butter, cheese, and in which also eggs are included, by the Canons of the Church. These kinds of food are forbidden on fast days in the Eastern Church, and in some cases in the Church of Rome, but the rules in this case are made known by pastoral letters. They vary from time to time, climate and other circumstances being taken into account.

Lady Chapel.—A chapel dedicated to the Blessed Virgin, attached to cathedrals and large churches, generally at the eastern extremity.

Lady Day.—The Feast of the Annunciation of the Blessed Virgin Mary [March 25th].

Lent Sunday. [SUNDAY.]

Lainez, JAMES, was born in Castile in 1512. He studied at Alcoba, and then went to Paris, where he met with Ignatius Loyola, and formed one of the party who founded the order of the Jesuits [q.v.], and he, in 1567, succeeded Loyola as the leader. He exercised a great influence over the Roman Catholic Church by his activity at the Council of Trent, and strongly opposed those who wished to modify the doctrines of justification in favour of Lutheran views, and the supremacy of Papal power. Lainez did a great deal among the Jesuits to promote education, intrigue, and the inordinate ambition which the Society afterwards showed. He died at Rome in 1655.

Laity.—The people as distinguished from the clergy. While the whole body of Christian people are called by St. Peter a holy priesthood and a royal priesthood, and St. John describes them as "made" by the Saviour "kings and priests unto God the Father," as all possessing a spiritual character and spiritual privilege by virtue of their incorporation into the Church of Christ,—the distinction between clergy, the ordained ministers, and laity, who held no spiritual office, has existed from a very early period in the Christian Church. Whether or not it has existed from the very first is one of the points in dispute between Episcopalians (and some others) and those who hold other views respecting Church constitution and government. It is derived, no doubt, from the Jewish Church. In Ex. xix. 24 and Is. xxiv. 2 the Septuagint has laos, as denoting the people in contradistinction to the priests, and St. Clement of Rome, writing in the first century, uses the same distinction. The elders whom St. Peter exhorts not to lord it over God's heritage (ton kleron), were in this view, in the more restricted usage of the term, the clergy (hoi kleroi). Wherever a congregation was formed with a regular ministry, some distinction would immediately arise. The laity, then, were those who were not set apart by authority for the discharge of any ministerial office: the clergy comprehended not only the orders of bishops, priests, and deacons, but, beside these, and, occasionally in distinction to these, the inferior orders of readers, acolytes, etc. But, though the laity have not ministerial office, there is no church which is not composed of laity as well as clergy, and the laity have their duties to the whole body, not less than have the clergy. Few phrases are more misleading and more meaningless than those of "entering the Church," or "taking up the Church as a profession," when used as equivalent to "being ordained"; ignoring as they do both the rights and the responsibilities of the laity, as very members incorporate in the mystical body of Christ.

The early Fathers generally adopted the Septuagint word, laos, or people, to describe the general congregation. Origen uses the word idiotai, "private men," i.e., not acting, like the clergy, in a public capacity. No man was accounted a complete layman unless he was in full communion with the Church. To distinguish such from the catechumens, the laity were called fideles, or "the faithful." In like manner excommunicated persons, lunatics, and schismatics were not recognised among the Christian laity. To be in full communion with the Church meant, and still means, "a right to participate with the faithful in all holy offices, and especially in the Holy Eucharist, which was 'the consummation of all,' (to teleion), and without which a man was only an imperfect Christian, and in an incomplete state." [Bingham.]

From the earliest times in the history of the Christian Church we have instances of devout and educated laymen assisting the clergy in building up Christ's Kingdom. In the Acts of the Apostles there are this in viii. 4 and xviii. 25. As is the celebrated case of Origen, still a layman, was asked to preach in churches, and his conduct was defended on the ground that Christian bishops had sanctioned the custom in previous ages. Again, the Fourth Council of Carthage sanctioned lay-preaching in the decree: "Let no layman dare to preach in the presence of clergy, except at their request." Moreover, Socrates, an early ecclesiastical historian, tells of two laymen, Basil and Adesius, who, being carried to India, converted the nation; and that the Iberians were first converted by a captive woman, who made the Queen of the nation preachers of the Gospel to their people. Laymen also have played an important part in the election of the Pope, but, while they possessed this right, they themselves were subject to ecclesiastical discipline, and were responsible to the ecclesiastical authorities for the way in which they exercised their power. In course of time the rights of the laity, and Church government over them, have sunk into abeyance, and it has been, indeed, difficult to restore them. On the other hand, since, according to all ecclesiastical ideas, the laity, like the clergy, are responsible to some higher power for the way in which they exercise any trust.

During the period when education was confined almost solely to the clergy, the number of laymen assisting the clergy in spiritual work would naturally be small. As education spread, so the number of laymen qualified and willing to assist the clergy in services to the Church increased greatly. In the Church of England many of the most devout and active members have been laymen, e.g., John Evelyn, Robert Owen, William Wilberforce, John Howard, and many another. Many of the great importance are held by laymen, e.g., Chancellors and Officials - Principals of Universities. As churchwardens, laymen give the most valuable assistance to the clergy in carrying on Church-work. In the Church of England has been somewhat backward in availing herself of the help of her lay members, but now this is to give to them an increasing share in the management of Church affairs. The laity are invited to consult the clergy in Parochial Councils and Diocesan Conferences; and a House of Bishops of the Province of Canterbury organised and assembled, in order to advise with Convocation itself: an act which will be given later on. In the Wesleyan Methodist Church much valuable help has been given by such societies of laymen as the "Church of England Laymen's Society" and the "Church of England Men." Without such help:

le for the present number of the great masses in our large minister to the scattered country laymen, too, have taken a most necessary part in all missionary works, both at home and while all are agreed that the aid and co-operation of the laity is so important and necessary for the Church, yet there are some special necessities for caution in devising arrangements. A heavy responsibility is laid upon each clergyman at his own house and he cannot transfer this from himself to any layman, nor give a dependent theological post in the absence of all ecclesiastical aid to the laity, already referred to, is a great difficulty in the way. Thus, while the object of giving a voice to the laity in the government of the Church has been urged, and in America, and in our country has not been with altogether successful results. Attempts have been made to give the management of the Church Boards Bill, and to give the management of the Church entirely into the hands of the laity, subject only to the veto of the clergy. But the attempts are based on the principle that the Church ought to represent the opinions of the majority. But the clergy represents the truth of God as handed down from the first, and the laity represents the truth of the Church to set forth and Divine truth, and not the ever-changing opinions of fallible men. If, then, the truth or reality in the Divine is with the clergy, the truth would be with the clergy; they cannot delegate this or however much they need and receive the help of all laymen, in order to carry out their commission effectually. Laymen have been adopted widely in mission-work in some churches, and the results have been, we believe, given much satisfaction to those who have tried the experiment. The Archbishop Tait led the way in introducing a form of service for the Institute of Lay Readers, and his example has been followed. (One of these laymen was elected by the minister of his parish to administer Holy Communion by ministering to it is doubtful whether such an arrangement is equal, and the prevailing opinion among the clergy is that lay ministrations are confined to unconsecrated buildings. The House of Laymen is the latest advance in the direction of more directly representing the interests in the public affairs of the Church. The project of such a house was discussed in Convocation in 1857; the project was discussed from time to time, but was not fully constituted till 1886, for the first time under the auspices of Lord Selborne. The Archbishop of Canterbury, in an address at their first meeting, said: "It is specially in regard to our most serviceable organizations, and to those legislative needs which have necessarily increased in proportion to the activity of the Church's vital and spiritual energies, that the desire for lay counsel has been manifested." The rules passed by Convocation, and which govern the House of Laymen, are as follows:—

1. That it is desirable that the House of Laymen, being communicants of the Church of England, be formed for the Province of Canterbury, to confer with Convocation.
2. That the members of the House of Laymen be appointed by the Lay Members of the Diocesan Conferences of the Province, and that they continue to hold their seats until the dissolution of Convocation.
3. That ten members be appointed for the Diocese of London; six for each of the Dioceses of Winchester, Rochester, Lichfield, and Worcester; and four for each of the remaining dioceses.
4. That additional members, not exceeding ten, be appointed by his Grace the President.
5. That the House of Laymen be in all cases convened by his Grace the President.
6. That the said House be convened only, and sit only, during the time that Convocation is in session, and be opened by his Grace the President.
7. That the said House may be requested by his Grace the President to confer with Convocation upon such occasions, and at such place as his Grace the President may think fit.
8. That his Grace the President, in opening the House of Laymen, or at any other time at their session, may lay before them any subject on which he desires their counsel, and that the results of all the deliberations of the said House on any subjects, whether thus referred to them or originated by themselves, be communicated to the President.
9. That the subjects on which the House of Laymen may be consulted shall be subjects which ordinarily occupy the attention of Convocation, saving only the definition or the interpretation of the faith of the Church of England: but that in all matters requiring legislation by statute the opinion of the said House shall be taken previous to the application to Parliament.

Lama.—The name given to the Buddhist priests in Tartary, and especially to the Dalai-Lama, or priest of priests, who has full authority over the rest of the priesthood, and is regarded by them as a deity. He lives retired from the world, and is never seen except in one of the rooms of his palace, where the people come to worship him, though they are not allowed to approach him even to kiss his feet. The people are taught to believe that he was raised up from death and hell hundreds of years ago, and that he will live for ever. In order to keep up this illusion they conceal the fact of his death, and another Lama is secretly chosen to take his place. The lower order of priests in Tartary form about one-third of the population, and are under vows of celibacy. They are partly supported by lands and revenues granted to them by the Government and by the offerings of pilgrims, but most of them are also engaged in some trade for the means of gaining their livelihood, and they are also the only physicians in the country. The Lamas excel in painting and sculpture, with which they adorn the walls of their temples.

Lambert, St., was born at Maestricht in the middle of the seventh century of a noble family who had been Christians for many generations. He was well instructed, and his education was perfected by Theodard, the Bishop, upon whose murder Lambert was called upon to fill the see in 670 with the approval of the King, Childeric II. In 673 Childeric was murdered, and Lambert, as one of his adherents, was ejected from his see, and retired to the monastery of Stavelo, where he remained for seven years. At the end of that time he was recalled to Maestricht by Pepin of Herstal, mayor of the palace. Some time after, hearing that the inhabitants of Zeeland, called Jaxandri, were still idolaters, he went there and converted many to the Christian faith. St. Lambert was murdered on Sept. 17th, 608 or 609. Two accounts are given of the cause. One is that two brothers, Gallus and Rioddus, entered and plundered the church at Maestricht, which so enraged some of the Bishop's relations that they murdered the intruders. Upon this Dodo, a powerful officer under Pepin and a relation to the brothers, gathered together a large force, and killed Lambert and his disciples at Liège. Others say that he was destroyed for having remonstrated with Pepin for living with a concubine, Alpaïs. His body was brought to Maestricht, and buried in St. Peter's, where many miracles are said to have been performed. His successor, St. Hubert, removed his remains to Liège [721], where a church was built to receive them.

Lambeth Articles.—These were nine short statements, or heads of doctrine, conceived from the Calvinistic point of view, which were drawn up at a conference held at Lambeth Palace in Nov., 1595. With a view to settle a controversy which was causing much disturbance in the University of Cambridge, Archbishop Whitgift invited some of the Heads of Houses to confer with him, and these articles were put forth with his sanction. But they were never of any authority, and are of no value except to show what were the tenets of the Calvinistic party at that time.

Lambeth Conference.—The trial and condemnation of Bishop Colenso in 1866 [COLENZO] had very important results on the status of the Colonial Churches. For he appealed against this condemnation to the Privy Council, and the decision given was that the letters-patent by which the Bishop of Capetown claimed authority over him were of no power; that the Crown had no power to give such letters-patent, except with the sanction of the Legislature of the State where the Bishop resided. Consequently the Colonial Churches were placed on the footing of other voluntary religious bodies. One of the Colonial bishops, Dr. Lewis, Bishop of Ontario, then put forth the suggestion that the Archbishop of Canterbury should invite the bishops of the Anglican communion in all parts of the world, including those of the Scottish and American Churches, to meet for brotherly counsel. After conferring with his brethren, the then Archbishop of Canterbury, Dr. Longley, resolved to issue his invitations, and a large number of bishops accepted it. There were some who stood aloof, as the Archbishop of York, the Bishop of Peterborough, and a few others. The Bishop of St. David's consented on condition that the Colenso case should not be discussed. The conference assembled Sept. 24th, 1867. The proceedings commenced with Holy Communion, at which the Archbishop was the celebrant, and Dr. Whitehouse, the Bishop of Illinois, the preacher. Three archbishops, twenty-one bishops of the United Kingdom, twenty-four Colonial bishops, and twenty-three American bishops attended, and the first step was to issue a pastoral address to churchmen all over the world, a document pronounced by Cardinal Manning to be the most important manifesto produced by the Church of England since the Reformation. The address was written by Bishop Wilberforce, and approved by the body with very few alterations. The discussions were in private, but the notes are preserved in Lambeth Library, and were, after some time, printed in the Guardian newspaper. Some general resolutions were drawn up and published in a pamphlet by Archbishop Longley. The Conference lasted four days.

In 1878 Archbishop Tait was called upon by influential members of the Church to invite a second conference. Exactly 100 bishops met at Lambeth on Tuesday, July 2nd: thirty-five English, nine Irish, seven Scottish, thirty Colonial, and nineteen American. The conference lasted four days, and was then adjourned to Monday, July 23rd, the intervening time being occupied with committees held at Lambeth, London House, and Farnham. At noon on July 23rd the conference again assembled, and held its deliberations till the following day. On Saturday the 27th the proceedings were closed by a stately service in St. Paul's Cathedral, with a solemn Te Deum and celebration, at which upwards of ninety bishops were present.

The Conferences did much to promote brotherly feeling between the English-speaking races, and will probably be repeated at due intervals.

Lambeth Degrees.—Degrees conferred by the Archbishop of Canterbury. This is a right belonging to him since the days of Henry VIII., and was given to him when the like right was taken away from the Pope. In the words addressed by the Archbishop to the receivers of degrees we have: "Whereas the Archbishops of Canterbury, enabled by the public authority of the law, do enjoy, and long have enjoyed, the power of conferring

s and titles of honour upon well deserving men, as by an authentic book of orders of Faculties, confirmed by authority of Parliament, doth more fully appear ;

therefore, being vested with the authority required, and following the example of our predecessors, have judged it expedient, in recognition of your proficiency in study, soundness of life, sound doctrine, and purity of morals, that you be dignified with the degree of [A.B.], and we do by these presents, as in us lies and the laws of the realm lawfully, accordingly create [Here a chaplain takes the candidate, still kneeling, with the hood of the degree (which by custom is that of the University to which the Archbishop himself presides), and if the degree to be conferred be a doctorate, the Archbishop here places the hood upon the head of the candidate and removes it from you an actual [M.A., Doctor, etc.], and also admit [Here the Archbishop takes the hands both the hands of the candidate] into the number of the [Master of Arts, etc.] of this realm." The candidate then rises up, and the Registrar reads the following proviso : " Provided also that these privileges do not avail you anything unless duly confirmed by the Queen's Letters-Patent." The degrees thus conferred are, first, M.A., — though formerly it was not so — is conferred even after a strict examination. (This was laid down by Archbishop Tait, and is confirmed by his successor.) Other degrees, B.D., D.C.L., and LL.D. ; Mus. Doc. &c., are conferred for some special and acknowledged merit or public service. The range of the letters-patent range, according to value, from about £40 to £100.

LAMI, BERNARD, priest of the Congregation of the Oratory, was born at Mans in 1640.

He gave early promise of a great genius for learning, was a considerable linguist, and a good mathematician, philological and philosopher. He taught philosophy at Bourges and Angers, but, making enemies of the Aristotelians by his leanings to Cartesianism, he was banished to Grenoble, where he gave divinity lectures. He was recalled to Paris in 1686 ; was rebanished, and settled at Rouen, where he died in 1711.

His first works were upon scientific and mathematical subjects. In 1696 appeared Paraphrase, or Introduction to the Bible, written in Latin and French, and, soon after, Harmony, or Agreement of the Four Evangelists, which occasioned a great deal of controversy, and caused Lami to reply by a commentary on the Harmony. He also wrote a treatise on the Temple of Jerusalem, and A Demonstration of the Truth and Holiness of the moral Rules of Morality.

LAMI, FRANCIS, a Benedictine monk of the congregation of St. Maur, was bred to a military profession, and served in the French army. But afterwards, being weary of that way of living, he turned Benedictine. He had a wonderful genius, was a man of great piety, and went through all the stages of monastic discipline. By his application to study he became an excellent philosopher, a polished writer, and very skilful in his judgments upon the many phases of the mind. He published five volumes concerning the knowledge of one's self ; a tract of the Truth of the Christian Religion, Modern Atheism Overthrown, Pious Reflections upon a Monastic Life, Lectures upon Wisdom, a collection of Letters upon Theological and Moral Subjects, The Unbeliever Conducted to Religion by Reason, Philosophical Letters upon Divers Subjects ; a tract against eloquence, entitled The Rhetoric of the College betrayed by its Apologist ; and, lastly, A Discourse concerning the Knowledge and Love of God. He died at St. Denis in April, 1711.

LAMMAS DAY.—The most probable explanation of this name for August 1st is that which derives it from Hlafmæsse or Loaf-mass, it having been customary to offer at the mass bread made of the new corn. Its coincidence with the feast of St. Peter's chains, or "St. Peter in fetters" in the Romish Church, gave rise to the popular derivation of Lamb-mass, St. Peter being regarded as the patron of lambs ; an idea originating in the Saviour's commission to him "Feed my lambs."

LAMENNAIS, HUGUES FÉLICITÉ ROBERT DE, the son of a shipowner, was born at St. Malo in 1782. He received his first lessons from his elder brother, and then continued his studies alone ; but in spite of all disadvantages he was able to read Livy and Plutarch when only twelve years of age. In 1794 he went to live with an uncle, and used to spend whole days in reading Rousseau, Malebranche, and other similar writers, which served to ripen his judgment and develop his religious fervour. He entered the Seminary of St. Malo as teacher of mathematics in 1807, received the tonsure in 1811, and five years later was ordained priest. He went to Paris in 1814, where he published an attack on Napoleon I., on account of which he had to leave France during the Hundred Days. He came to England, and was usher in a school kept by the Abbé Caron near London. In 1817 appeared the first volume of his Essay on Independence in Religious Matters, which made a great impression. It contains a denunciation of all compromise in matters of faith, and denounced Gallicanism, but adhered to the orthodox standard of Christianity, and upheld clerical authority in preference to private judgment. It brought about a revival all over France, and gave great support to the Ultramontanists. When Lamennais visited Rome in 1824 he was cordially welcomed by Pope Leo XII., who offered him a cardinal's hat, which he refused. Two years later appeared Religion Considered in its Relation to Civil and Political Order, which was almost revolutionary in tone, and the author was fined for it by the Cour Correctionnelle. The revolution of 1830 was the occasion of his declaring the people's supremacy in matters of State, and he pointed out the temporal abuses of the Church while retaining his reverence for her spiritual authority. In September of the same year he started a journal named L'Avenir, of which the motto was "God and Liberty." Among the contributors were the Abbé Lacordaire, M. de Montalembert, the Abbé Gerbert, Victor Hugo, and others, who had all adopted Lamennais's opinions and spread them all over France. The paper did not last long, for the Jesuits and others took alarm at it, and, after it had been published a year, it was suspended by the Pope. Lamennais went to Rome to state his views, and to ask for a recall of the sentence. His wish was complied with; but in Sept. 28th, 1832, an encyclical letter was published condemning the liberty of the press in terms which implied a censure of the journal. Lamennais submitted and suppressed it, but in 1834 appeared his Words of a Believer, which finally severed his bond with the Church. The revolutionary party applauded him for his independence, and the book ran through eight editions in a few months. He died twenty years after, forgotten, unreconciled to the Church, and allied to the extreme Republicans. Among other works are The Affairs of Rome [1836]; The People's Book [1837]; The Country and Government [1840], for which he was imprisoned for a year; A Voice from Prison [1846]; Sketch of a Philosopher [1840-46], etc.

Lamps were in symbolic use in the early Church. Thus they are found in the tombs in the Catacombs, probably having been placed there in symbolism of faith in the resurrection to life. In the Roman Catholic Church a lamp is always kept burning before the Reserved Sacrament in churches, the oil of which must be of olive, unless the bishop give leave for other oil to be used, and the alternative must never be mineral oil except in cases of absolute necessity.

Lance, THE HOLY.—According to early tradition, the lance which was presented by Rudolph of Burgundy to Henry I. of Germany was made out of the nails which were used to fasten Christ to the Cross, while in a later tradition it is said to be the spear with which His side was pierced. Innocent VI. established a feast in its honour in 1354. Another lance, discovered by the Empress Helena, was found at Antioch in 1093, and the sight of it much encouraged the crusaders. The iron with which it was inlaid was brought to Rome under Innocent VIII. and preserved in the Vatican.

In the Greek Church the name "holy lance" is given to the knife used to pierce the bread of the Eucharist.

Lanfranc, Archbishop of Cant was born of a high family of P 1005, studied law at that univers others in Italy, and practised with success. It is supposed that in a times his family was exiled. Ab he founded a school at Avranches gained distinction from his great cap teaching, and the culture of Greek li His thoughts, however, being to religion, he retired to Herluin's Be establishment at Bec in 1042. unlearned, Herluin won Lanfranc's affection by his great piety. He went to obtain a dispensation for the Dub riage, and was present at the Council in 1059, at which he disputed with Ber who denied Transubstantiation. Lanfranc reluctantly became Abbot Stephen's Abbey, Caen, refused the bishopric of Rouen in 1067, and was on great pressure consecrated Archbi Canterbury, amidst the ruins of its c on August 29th, 1070. Having sec status by receiving the pallium at Lanfranc obtained a decree by which property was to be restored, and whiche lawsuit to be brought against Odo, the brother. The cause was argued th on Penenden Heath, and judgment gi the Archbishop. In 1076 he rebuilt bury Cathedral, and in 1077 attack a Benedictine monastery. Among his writings are De et Sanguine Domini Nostri, a substantiation against Bereng, published by Dom Luc, with Lanfranc's Commentary of St. Paul, Notes upon some Cassian, A Book of Letters, etc. De ordine Benedicti is an adaptation of the Benedictine rule to the circumstances of a new monastery at Canterbury.

JACHIM, a German Pietist, was born in 1670. After studying at Jena and Magdeburg, he went to Halle, where he met FRANCKE [q.v.], whom he followed to Erfurt and Halle. He went to Halle in 1693, and in 1709 became Professor of Theology at Halle, and died there in 1741. He is the author of several works, many of which are controversial. While disputing with the Socinians he wrote the Idea of Pseudology, Sincere News, Might, Middle, &c. He also wrote against the philosopher Wolff, God, A Modest Enquiry, etc.

1. STEPHEN, ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY.—His birthplace is claimed by Devonshire, and by his parents, described as "fideles of that name." Stephen studied at the University of Paris, gaining distinction in law, and becoming its chancellor if not in name. At this time of intimacy with Lothario Conti, elected as Pope Innocent III. in 1203 for Langton, and entrusted with many rare and political matters. In 1205, on the death of Hubert, Archbishop of Canterbury, a complication arose from the claims of King John and the Pope. Each party resorted to Rome. Innocent caused a Cardinal, to be elected [1206], a step in accordance both with the Pope's policy of securing the ascendancy over foreign Churches, and also of recognition of virtue and talent. The election was resented by the King, and the consecration by the Pope at Rome [1207], John expelled the Archbishop of Canterbury, who had accepted the election. A meeting between King John and Langton at Winchester failing in reconciliation, Innocent laid an interdict on the country. Langton retired to France for six years, occupying himself with his literary pursuits. During this period the successful negotiations with the Pope, and with Langton, was exemplified by the threat of a crusade, and John, even consenting to be a vassal of the See of Rome. Archbishop Langton was sent for, when he absolved the King at Winchester and celebrated the Eucharist. Langton found two tyrannies dominant—the nobles and people oppressed by the King, and the rights of the Church usurped by the Papal Legate. His work now was to obtain freedom from both, and he showed singular independence in risking censure from Rome. Organising with great courage and wisdom the barons' struggle for freedom, he forced upon the King the revival of the "Laws of the Confessor" and of Henry I. as embodied in the great Charter, signed June 15th, 1215. Innocent avenged this humiliation of his vassal by revoking the Magna Charta and suspending Langton, who, the same year, attended, as Cardinal, the fourth Lateran Council, hoping to make his case heard, but was coldly received by the Pope, and detained as a state prisoner. King John and Pope Innocent died in 1216. In 1218 Langton returned to England, further secured the recognition of the Charter, and eventually procured the recall of the Legate. In 1220 the Archbishop recrowned the young King Henry III., and caused the remains of Thomas à Becket to be translated from the crypt to a costly shrine in Canterbury Cathedral. A Council was held by him in 1222 at Osney, near Oxford, at which important canons were passed; and at another, at Westminster, 1226, an attempt made by the Pope to obtain certain prebends for the Church of Rome was defeated. Langton welcomed the Dominican and Franciscan Friars as missionaries to the wretched and criminal settlers in towns. His last years were passed in retirement at the Manor House of Slindon, in Sussex, his brother Simon, whom he had appointed Archdeacon of Canterbury, acting for him. The Archbishop died July 9th, 1228. That he was deeply read in the Bible is shown by his commentaries on Old Testament books, while his writings include, as subjects, a life of Richard I.; a Canticle on our Lord's passion; a sermon on the Holy Virgin; and two other pieces said to be in the Duke of Norfolk's library. One of the earliest Norman-French miracle plays, a Life of Mahomet, and a Life of Becket, are attributed to him. A list of his works is given by Cave, Hist. Lit., p. 703.

Laodicea, COUNCIL OF.—The date of the Synod of Laodicea is uncertain. It has been thought by some to have been prior to that of Nicæa, but it has now been proved to have taken place later than 344 A.D., probably about 363. It is said to have been summoned in order that the clergy of Lydia and Phrygia might meet together to censure some who were reviving the Homoousian controversy, and to choose men of approved faith for the episcopate. They agreed upon sixty canons, which are still extant. The last of these contains a catalogue of the books of Holy Scripture, and this document is of great importance in the history of the Canon of Scripture. It omits the Old Testament Apocrypha. [See Westcott on the Canon.]

Lapse.—In the Church of England, if the patron does not present a clergyman to a benefice within six months of its falling vacant, the patronage lapses to the bishop; if he fails to present in six months, it further lapses to the archbishop; and six months afterward to the Crown. Thus if the archbishop be the patron, the sovereign can present six months after the first vacancy.

Lapsed.—Those who in time of persecution denied the faith. Such on their repentance were received back into the congregation, and it was held a grievous offence on the part of the clergy if they refused to receive and reconcile the penitent. But though reconciled, they were excluded from all ecclesiastical power and government, and remained classed among “the penitents.” They could not be ordained, or, if they lapsed after ordination, they were not suffered to resume their office on their reconciliation. Some exceptions, however, were probably made to this strict rule, when it was deemed to be to the interest of the Church that it should be suspended.

Lardner, NATHANIEL, an eminent English critic, was born at Hawkhurst, in Kent, in 1684. He belonged to a body of English Presbyterians who had become Unitarians. In early life he was a pupil of Dr. Joshua Oldfield, a Unitarian minister of eminence. Lardner spent more than three years at Utrecht, where he studied under Graevius and Burmann, and was then some time at Leyden. He returned to England in 1703, and continued his theological studies, but did not begin to preach till he was twenty-five. He became private chaplain to Lady Ireby, whom he accompanied to the Netherlands, and remained with her till her death in 1729. He then became lecturer at the chapel in Old Jewry, and died in 1768. Lardner was not a popular preacher, being defective in his elocution and lacking the power to modulate his voice, on account of his deafness. But his Credibility of the Gospel History and his Jewish and Heathen Testimonies have gained him a place among the ablest apologists for Christianity that we have.

Lasco, JOHN À, or JAN LASKI, was born at Warsaw in 1499. He was the younger son of a noble Polish family, and was educated for the Church. He visited Louvain, Zürich, and Basle, where he resided with Erasmus, and on his return to Poland was promoted; but in 1536 he was offered the See of Cujavein, which he refused, stating that he agreed with the Reformers. He went to Friesland, where he founded and consolidated a Reformed Church; but on the introduction of the Interim there in 1549 he was compelled to seek shelter in England. Edward VI. appointed him Superintendent of the Congregations of Foreign Protestants (German, Belgian, French and Italian) in London, and the Church of St. Augustine's Monastery in Austin Friars, now the Dutch Church, was granted to him, and permission to use his own ceremonies. He published in Latin the service used by his Church, and this service contains a form of confession and absolution from which some phrases were added to the second Prayer Book of Edward VI. On the accession of Queen Mary, Lasco was obliged to leave England with his congregation, and after many hardships they arrived at Emden in 1554; but just as they were preparing to settle down, Lasco was re-called to his country, King Sigismund being favourable to the Reformation. He was appointed in 1555 Superintendent of the Reformed Congregations of Little Poland, and died there in 1560. The Bible was translated into Polish under his supervision.

Last Things, THE FOUR.—Death, judgment, heaven, hell. [ESCHATOLOGY.]

Lateran, ST. JOHN OF.—The chief basilica of Rome, so-called from the name of Lateranus, who was put to death by Nero, and to whom the site formerly belonged. The palace belonging to it was given to the Pope by the Emperor Constantine, and was rebuilt by Sixtus V. Constantine built the basilica, adorned it richly, and gave large endowments for the maintenance of its clergy. It was rebuilt by Pope Innocent X.

The Lateran Councils were so called from being held in this church. The first of these (or Ninth General Council) was held in March, 1123, and dealt principally with the subject of investiture, in which it followed the terms of the Concordat of Worms. Twenty-two canons were drawn up by this Council; one of these forbade simony, and others forbade the marriages of the higher orders of priests.

The Second Lateran Council, held in April, 1139, was attended by 1,000 bishops, when Pope Innocent II. had assembled to combat the doctrines of Arnold of Brescia. It put forth thirty canons: the first against lay investitures; the second and ninth about excommunications; the fourth concerning ecclesiastical habits; the sixth against immoral priests; the seventh forbids the hearing of masses said by such; the eighth restrains priests and monks from exercising the professions of law and physic; the tenth is against laymen who take tithes; the thirteenth against usurers, whom it deprives of Christian burial; the fourteenth imposes a like punishment on those who fight only to show their bravery; the fifteenth excommunicates the strikers of priests; the seventeenth forbids marriages of near kindred; the twenty-first excludes the children of priests from the priesthood; the twenty-third is against Arnold ceiving persons into any religious order; the usury of the Jews.

The Fifth Lateran Council, though it lasted from 1512 to 1518, is not of great importance, as it was held chiefly in opposition to the Council of Pisa, which had been summoned under the joint auspices of Louis XII. of France and the Emperor Maximilian, to curb the ambition of Pope Julius II. His counter-move was to summon a Council at the Lateran which annulled the decrees of Pisa. His death took place whilst the Council was sitting, but his successor, Leo X., took care that it should effect no ecclesiastical reforms.

Latimer, HUGH, an eminent bishop and Protestant martyr, was born at Thurcaston, near Leicester, about 1490, the son of a yeoman. He was educated at the school of his native place till the age of fourteen, when he was entered at the University of Cambridge, where he took his M.A. degree in 1514, being afterwards ordained at Lincoln. At first he was a zealous supporter of the Roman Catholic faith, in which he had been brought up, and argued for it on the occasion of taking his B.D. degree in 1524; but Thomas Bilney going afterwards to his room and discussing with him in private convinced him of the truth of the doctrines of the Reformers, and he gradually accepted them. In the dispute concerning the marriage of Henry VIII. with Catherine of Arragon, Latimer took an active part on the side of the King, which was rewarded by his being made one of his chaplains, and appointed soon after to a living in Wiltshire. Other controversies in which he took part ended less happily, and he succeeded, by his outspoken plainness, in making numerous enemies. The Bishop of Ely was so displeased at a sermon
he heard, that he forbade the Reformer to preach again at the University, and complained to Cardinal Wolsey on the subject.

Wolsey examined Latimer privately, and gave him full sanction to preach as he liked. He so exercised this privilege that he became the most celebrated preacher of his day, and his Sermons have retained their position among English classics, marvellous in their clearness and homeliness of expression. He was appointed in 1535 to the Bishopric of Worcester, which had been hitherto much neglected, so that the clergy there were more ignorant than in any other part of England, and Latimer devoted all his energies to effecting a reform of such a state of affairs, in spite of the opposition his efforts met with both within the diocese and at Court. In 1539 the King published the Act of the Six Articles, which enforced belief in Transubstantiation and other doctrines of the Romish Church. Latimer had come to London to obtain medical advice, and he now took the opportunity of publicly disclaiming his assent to the Six Articles. Immediately afterwards he and the Bishop of Salisbury resigned their sees, and, through the influence of Bishop Gardiner, Latimer was imprisoned for a short time in the house of the Bishop of Chichester. After being released he lived in obscurity, forbidden to preach, or to come within a few miles of London or of his old diocese, and in 1546 he was sent to the Tower, where he remained till the accession of Edward VI. With the opening of King Edward's reign Latimer began to preach again, refusing to accept his old bishopric, since he felt that his true mission was as a preacher. People crowded to the churches to hear him, and he often preached before the King, who was much under his influence. In 1553 King Edward died, and Latimer was again sent to the Tower, and was brought to trial to answer to various accusations of heresy. He was burnt at Oxford with Bishop Ridley, on 16th October, 1555.

Latin Church. [ROME, CHURCH OF.]

Latin Gate, ST. JOHN BEFORE THE, [S. Joannes Evan. ante Port. Lat.].—A festival celebrated on May 6th, the anniversary of the supposed deliverance of St. John the Evangelist from martyrdom. It is related by Tertullian and St. Jerome that a persecution of the Christians took place at Ephesus under Domitian, and that St. John was seized and sent to Rome, where he was cast into a cauldron of boiling oil before the Porta Latina. When released he was not only uninjured, but seemed to be endowed with renewed health and strength. He was accordingly banished to Patmos. The legend is not mentioned by contemporary authors; and late criticism places the sojourn in Patmos much earlier than the reign of Domitian, probably in that of Nero.

Latin, SERVICE IN.—The saying of the prayers and services of the Church "in a tongue not understood of the people, one of the first subjects to which the Reformation of the sixteenth century turned their attention. In fact we may say that the Reformation of the Acts of the reign of Henry VIII. was confined to this. The Bible was translated into English, and set up in churches; the Mass also was translated into English, to be used in the reign of Edward VI.; by the reign of Elizabeth I. of Latin use, except in universities and places of learning.

The Roman Church is professedly unwilling to allow the Mass to be said in other than Latin languages, though Latin is not the only language in which it is said. Thus in some places it is said in Greek, others in Syriac, in Coptic, and in Arabic. Latin is, however, by far the most common. It is not denied that the public worship was originally in the vulgar tongue of the nations; but as a language gradually came to be the vernacular, as Latin did, the Church was unwilling to alter, and no instance is on record of a change in this respect being allowed by the Roman Church, though there are a few cases where newly converted nations have had the Mass in the vernacular. The Council of Trent declared the Mass in the vernacular to be "inexpedient." The reasons given for this prohibition are twofold. First it is alleged that the rites should be most jealously guarded, lest error might slip in unawares through change, the purity of doctrine be endangered, or the reverence of the people diminished. Secondly, it is said that the uniformity of language in all lands impresses a unity of the Church, and that wherever the Mass is celebrated, shippers everywhere the unity of the Church. And it is added that as each worshipper possesses a translation side by side with the Latin formulary, he knows what he is saying.

That the rendering of the Latin Mass into the vernacular, however, at the Reformation, gave a wonderful impetus to an intelligent study of the Bible and the Liturgy, is evident from the student of history. So entirely did the Reformation commend itself to the English nation, that the nation returned for a while to the obedience in the reign of Mary, no law was made to take away the English Mass, though at first the translation had been opposed by the Roman Church.

Latitudinarians.—Bishop Burnet, in his History of His Own Times, thus speaks of this party: "They loved the constitution of the Church and the Liturgy, and would not live under them, but they did not think it lawful to live under another form. They allowed a great freedom both in philosophy and in divinity, from whence they were called 'Men of Latitude.'" The Latitudinarians derived their peculiar tenets from the teachings of Arminius and his pupil Episcopius at the University of Leyden. The opinions of these two were introduced into England

teenth century. One great tudinarian system was to unite with the exception of Roman one communion ; and in order as John Hales writes in his tracturgies and public forms of service "so framed as that they adparticular and private fancies, only such things as those in Christians do agree." Again in the writes, "Remove from them (gives) whatever is scandalous to leave nothing but what all thus to please the Arians, the Saviour might be given up, and revised; and indeed it is very what part of the Christian faith if this system were to be adopted the Church. Among the more idinarians were Chillingworth, Hales, Theophilus Gale, John ot, Cudworth, Burnett, Archon, and in more recent times d Dean Stanley. Not indeed l points would agree with the ns of Hales. Latrocinium. [EPHESUS, ROBBER COUNCIL OF.]

Latter-Day Saints. [MORMON.]

Laud, WILLIAM, D.D., Archbishop of Canterbury, was born October 7th, 1573, at Reading, where his father was a clothier in good circumstances. He was educated till 1589 at the Reading Free School, where he gave promise of his future eminence. Thence he went to St. John's College, Oxford, in 1600, took holy orders, and in 1601 was ordained priest. The tone of Oxford was Calvinistic, but Laud was under the influence of Buckeridge, and through a course of studies based on the Fathers, the Councils, and Ecclesiastical historians, instead of the system of Geneva, he developed views on baptism and the constitution of the Church which, though in accordance with the scheme of the Anglican Reformed Church, ran counter to the Puritan theory, and excited the charge of Popery. In 1605 Laud solemnised the marriage of the Earl of Devon and Lady Rich, with whom the Earl was living while her husband was still alive; a step he afterwards deeply mourned, observing the anniversary as a fast, and alluding to it in his diary as "my cross about the Earl of Devon's marriage." He was given successively the livings of Stanford, 1607; North Kilworth, 1608, and Cuckstone, exchanging the latter for Norton on account of ill-health, from which he suffered much throughout life. He had previously exchanged North Kilworth for the living of West Tilbury, in Essex. In 1611 he was elected President of St. John's, in spite of Abbot's opposition. By Neile's influence he was appointed one of King James's chaplains, and in 1616 Dean of Gloucester. Here Laud attracted notice as a church restorer. The authorised externals of religion had been so neglected or destroyed, that Laud's zeal for order found continual occupation in bringing things, as the King said, "to a pitch of reformation floating in his own brain." His acts were legal, but every step from Calvinism was held to be a step towards Popery, and was combated accordingly. Laud's opponents did not recognise his wish to defend the Church equally against Romanism and Calvinism, nor their own tendency to ignore the Church's teaching while professing to be its members. In 1617 he went to Scotland with the King, with whose project of strengthening the Episcopal Church Laud sympathised, though he does not appear to have taken an active part in it. He was consecrated Bishop of St. David's, Nov. 18th, 1621, and made visitations of the diocese in

1622 and 1625, when the fabric and service of the churches received his care and pecuniary help. He was employed to combat Fisher the Jesuit in his attempt to proselytise the Countess of Buckingham, and though in her case Laud's arguments were only temporarily successful, they confirmed the Duke of Buckingham's faith and remain a standard work on the subject. The charge of Popery was raised against Laud from his restrictions on preaching, the relaxation of statutes against Papists, and his intimacy with Buckingham at the time of the Spanish match. He had powerful enemies in the Lord Keeper Williams and Archbishop Abbot; their influence, however, did not disturb his favour with the King nor with Prince Charles, who, on his accession in 1625, appointed Laud to preach on the opening of Parliament. He was also called upon for a list of noted clergy with the distinguishing "orthodox" and "Puritan" to each name, as guide to the King in the customary appointment of new chaplains, and was made secretary to the committee who arranged the coronation ceremonial. In 1626 Laud was raised to the Bishopric of Bath and Wells and made Dean of the Chapel Royal, when he requested the King to attend the prayers as well as sermon on Sundays, and to permit the service to continue uninterrupted by his entrance. Laud admitted the accusation by Parliament that he was the author of certain of the King's speeches, saying, "Being commanded to the service, I hope it shall not now be made my crime that I was trusted by my sovereign." He was deputed to issue instructions urging the clergy to support the Loan for Denmark, and, in 1628, to answer the remonstrance from Parliament that alleged increase of Popery in Ireland, the secret Romanism of himself and Neile, and the abuse by Buckingham of his many offices. Laud's tone in the reply was not conciliatory. He had been made Privy Councillor in 1627, and in 1628, on the death of Buckingham, became the King's foremost adviser, and, in consequence, the numerous unpopular measures at this time were indiscriminately attributed to him. He was translated, July 15th, 1628, to the See of London, and his instructions to the province of Canterbury in reference to lecturers, created great discontent among the Calvinists, already exasperated by the declaration prefixed to the reprint of the Thirty-nine Articles, which the House of Commons protested they held only in the sense in which they had been established in Queen Elizabeth's reign. In 1630 Laud was elected Chancellor of the University of Oxford, in which he took the deepest interest throughout life. He caused its forgotten statutes to be searched for and set in order, established canonries in connection with the professorships of Hebrew and public oratory, and a professorship of Arabic. To St. John's College he added a new quadrangle, enlarged its library, and built a new one, it with a great number of valuable books, and manuscripts in many. He also, in 1631, set on foot the rebuilding of St. Paul's Cathedral. In 1633 he accompanied the King to Scotland. The honours conferred on the Scotch, and the Service Book with Orders drawn up by them in concert with Laud, raised a storm of resentment. Laud succeeded Abbot as Bishop on Sept. 19th, 1633, when a Canon was also twice offered him, whether as bait or snare is not clear. The appropriations bought by the "feoffment" to the Crown, and the Book of Common Prayer was reprinted with a declaration that people should be protected in their recreations after the Sunday services caused a great outcry. Laud commenced a metropolitan visitation in 1634, and among other measures the removal of the sacramental table to the east of the churches, an injunction of Queen Elizabeth for the addition of a railing to ensure the altar longer perverted from its peculiar use of parish table or school desk. His declaration that the Winchester, Hereford, and Salisbury Prebendaries should, by bowing before the altar, "make due reverence to God," was construed as a belief in the Real Presence, whereas Laud declared Transubstantiation is contrary to the difference." As in 1623-24 Laud had the clergy throughout the country under the pressure of subsidies, so he now was under the poverty of those in London. He obtained the acceptance of the Articles by the Church, and the removal to her of the impropriations of the Crown, Strafford being his zealous agent. The Archbishop enforced stringency on English churches and military chaplains abroad, and endeavoured to attract to the Church all those who, though of French parentage, were born in England. From 1635 to 1636 Laud held the office of Lord High Treasurer. Prynne, Burton, and others were, in 1637, brought before the Star Chamber for seditious writings and sayings, and were severely punished. Laud was unfairly the author of these and other Star Chamber sentences. His acquiescing in them is sufficiently and unjustifiable, but their excess was in keeping with the intolerance of those times. Laud's temper was not conciliatory, but with reference to opponents, "I have times forborne them a twelvemonth," and with Bishop Hall as of the bishops, it was dissolved on the 1640, as "confirming the unlawful exercise of power which had been usurped bishops denounced Laud as the prime author of the pernicious innovations attempted in the country. He was accused of high

[CANONICAL HOURS.]

JOHN DE, one of the stoutest up-holders of the privileges of the Gallican Church, was born in Normandy in 1603, was ordained priest in 1633, and became D.D. in 1636, but never held a benefice. He lived in retirement, devoting his time exclusively to literature, and died in Paris in 1678. He created many enemies, as he criticised the Breviary and denied the authenticity of many of the legends about the saints. He made himself obnoxious to the Pope by stating that "the Pope had no power to break through, or dispense with, the Canons of the Councils;" and to the Dominican order by writing against Thomas Aquinas. In 1678 he published a book in which he accused the Pope's Annates of committing simony, and confuted the Jesuit Azorius, who had written a book at the end of the sixteenth century to clear them from the imputation of the crime. Copies of these were seized and ordered to be burnt, but Launoi continued to write. His chief work was De Autoritate Negantis Argumenti.

Lavabo ["I will wash"].—The first words of Psalm xxv. which in the Roman Missal the priest recites while the acolyte pours water on his hands after the oblation. This washing of hands is mentioned by St. Cyril of Jerusalem. There is great variety on this point in the old English rites; in the York use the washing was accompanied by a verse of the fifteenth Psalm, the Veni Creator, and a prayer; while in the Sarum use a prayer only was said.

Lavacrum. [PISCINA.]

Lavater, JOHANN CASPAR, born at Zürich in 1741, was the son of a physician. He early showed a depth of religious feeling, and determined to be a clergyman, with which view he travelled in 1763 with Fuseli, the celebrated painter, to study theology under Spalding at Barth, in Swedish Pomerania.
He also travelled through Leipsic and Berlin, and returned to Zürich in 1764. Here he attracted some notice as a preacher; but his reputation was chiefly founded on the publication in 1767 of his Swiss songs, and in the following year Aussichten in die Ewigkeit. In 1786 Lavater was appointed minister of the Church of St. Peter, in his native city, and held the post till his death. Having very keen powers of observation and discrimination of character, he had a theory that physiognomy ought to be raised to the rank of a science, for he maintained that by close observation men's characters could be discerned from studying their faces. He published this theory in 1775 under the title of Physiognomic Fragments; but in after years he abandoned many of his ideas as fanciful. The mysticism which gave rise to these opinions formed a large part of his religious belief; he had a firm faith in the manifestation of supernatural powers, spiritualism, and anything approaching the miraculous. Nevertheless his evident sincerity and piety caused him to be held in deep veneration among his congregation. Lavater hailed the French Revolution with delight at first, but was horror-struck at the excesses committed, and especially at the murder of the King. He was wounded at Zürich in September, 1799, when tending the dying soldiers at the taking of the city by Massena. After much suffering he died of the wound in January, 1801.

Law, Canon. [CANON LAW.]

Law, William, an influential religious writer, was born at King's Cliffe, in Northamptonshire, in 1686. He went to Emmanuel College, Cambridge, with a view to entering the Church, and was elected a Fellow in 1711; but, refusing to take the oath of allegiance on the accession of George I., he was obliged to vacate his fellowship. He was for some time tutor of Mr. Edward Gibbon, father of the historian. In 1741 Hester Gibbon, sister of his pupil, and her friend Mrs. Hutchinson, determined to retire from the world and devote themselves to charity and good works. They chose Law for their chaplain, and retired to King's Cliffe, where Law spent the last twenty years of his life, dying in 1761. William Law was the author of many works which are deeply tinged with mysticism. The best known is A Serious Call to a Devout and Holy Life, which is said to have been more highly praised than any other practical religious book in England, with the exception of the Pilgrim's Progress. It had a great influence on Dr. Johnson and also on John Wesley. With the latter Law was at one time on very friendly terms; but a rupture occurred between them, and in later life Law was an ardent admirer of JACOB BENJAMIN [q.v.]. Among Law's other works are The Way to Knowledge, The Spirit of Love, etc.

Lawrence, St., one of the most eminent saints of the Church. While still very young he was ordained deacon by Pope Sixtus, and this was all the more remarkable as the number of deacons in Rome at that time never exceeded more than seven. Sixtus had such implicit faith in him that he was entrusted with the care of the Church plate, and kept an account of the money, which charge afterwards proved the immediate cause of his death. In the year 258 A.D. the Emperor Valerian sent an order that all Christians were to be put to death, and Sixtus was the first to be seized. When Lawrence returned after the execution of his master he gave orders for the gathering together of the poor, and he proceeded to divide the Church money between them, and also what had been obtained by the sale of the Church plate. Having set himself by this act that there was desecration after his death, he cal for his sentence of death, which would be passed in a few days. The of Rome ordered that St. Lawrence brought before him, demanding Church property should be given Emperor. Leaders.—All Wesleyan congregations are divided into various "classes," over each of which is a "leader"—that is, a member of experience and recognised personal piety—who must see all members of his class at least once a week, inquire into their spiritual condition, ascertain the cause if they are absent from the class-meeting, receive their offerings to the poor, etc. These class-leaders have great influence, as they are very numerous, and are resident, and therefore become better acquainted with their people than the ministers. No person can be admitted into the church if objected to by the class leaders. The leaders of the female classes are females. Once a quarter the leaders meet together and are examined by the director of their circuit. This meeting is called the "Leaders" Meeting.

League.—A party formed in France in 1576, in the reign of Henry III., for defence of the Romish religion. The first who laid the design of a general league of the Papists under another head than the King was the Cardinal of Lorraine, whilst he was at the Council of Trent. He represented to the chief men of that assembly, and by them to the Pope, that for the maintaining of the Romish religion it would be necessary to form a league of many princes and lords (of whom the King of Spain was to be one), and the Pope protector of it, which princes so leagued were to choose a head whom all Romanists should be bound to obey. This design being approved by the Council, they were about to choose the Duke of Guise as head, when the news was brought of his death. The Cardinal kept his design in view however, and waited patiently for eleven years till his nephew, the young Duke of Guise, should be old enough to be entrusted with such a charge. At the end of that time he again propounded his scheme to the Pope and the King of Spain, who both agreed to his proposal, though actuated by different motives. The Pope hoped by these means to exterminate the Protestants; the King thought he saw in it the means of gaining advantage to himself out of the disorders which the League was sure to produce in France. The Cardinal of Lorraine died before the enterprise was completed, but the Duke of Guise was unwilling to quit the design, and therefore in 1576 caused a project to be made of the League, which he got secretly dispersed amongst the most zealous devotees, or those who were known to be favourers of the House of Guise. He particularly confided in the Sieur d'Humières, Governor of Péronne, who, finding that the twelve articles of which the League consisted, attacked the royal authority too openly, made, instead, eighteen other articles, which were so worded that the League should appear to be designed expressly for the King's service. The substance of these articles was to this effect:—That all obedience should be rendered to the King; that they promised to maintain the exercise of the Romish religion; that the nobility and gentry should either serve in person or provide men, horses and arms; and that the clergy and commons should contribute to the expenses of the League according to the taxes that should be regulated for that purpose. This Act was signed at Péronne on Feb. 13th, 1577, by nearly two hundred gentlemen and officers of the province, and their example was soon followed in all the provinces of the kingdom. In November of the same year the States of the kingdom assembled at Blois prohibited the exercise of the Protestant religion, they of the League proving the strongest party there. But the King noticed that the Leaguers rather endeavoured to weaken his authority than to crush the Protestants, and, to their great consternation, declared that he would himself be master of the League. But in 1578 he granted the Protestants the Edict of Poitiers, which permitted them the exercise of their religion. The Leaguers, who had not felt strong enough to undertake anything with the King at their head, declared in 1581 that they would have the Duke of Guise instead of Henry, giving as an excuse that the King had made alliance with the King of Navarre, which, as he was a heretic, was contrary to the laws of the League. The Duke was joined by a separate league formed in Paris, and called the Seize. With them to help him, besides his own party, he drew up a treaty which arranged that the Cardinal of Bourbon was to succeed to the crown in the event of the King dying without children. War broke out in 1585, and the King was forced to revoke the Edict he had made in favour of the Protestants. In 1587 the Protestant princes of Germany raised a powerful army to assist their brethren in France, but those forces were defeated and obliged to retire, which made the Leaguers more peremptory and tyrannical than before. In July, 1588, the King published the Edict of Reunion, by which he undertook to root out Protestantism from France. At the Assembly of Estates at Blois the King perceived that the Duke of Guise was becoming very powerful, and would be a constant source of anxiety. He therefore took the desperate measure of causing both the Duke and his brother the Cardinal to be put to death. Their death infuriated the Leaguers, and the quarrel raged fiercely till Henry's death in 1589. He was succeeded by Henry of Navarre, a Protestant, who of course met with most determined opposition from the members of the League. In the following year this opposition resulted in war, and the battle of Ivry proved fatal to the League, for almost all its strength was destroyed. From that time it ceased to have any influence over the fortunes of France, but was not formally dissolved till when Henry abjured the Protestantism and was reconciled to the Church.

League and Covenant, [COVENANT.]

Leander, Sr., Bishop of Seville at Carthage in the middle of the 6th century. The piety of his parents and his inclination made him retire to a monastery while young, and he was thence removed to the See of Seville, one of the most important in Spain. The Visigoths were masters of Spain, where Arianism was under their protection. To uproot it was Leander's great aim and the object of his writings. By his labours, and several, the most important conquest being the conversion of his eldest son of Leovigild, king of the Visigoths. This conversion drew a violent storm on the Catholics, and he was obliged to fly from the country and went to Constantinople to the Emperor Tiberius, and laid the case of Catholics in Spain before him, begging him to use his interest with Leovigild to bring about peace to the Church. While he was on his errand he became acquainted with the Pope, then a deacon of the Holy See at Rome, and this acquaintance resulted in close intimacy; this meeting was the death of Tiberius frustrated all the efforts of Leander, for his successor, Mauricius, was busy with his own troubles and could not attend to the grievances of the Catholics. Leander, therefore, returned to Spain, found the persecution more fierce and Leovigild, fearing the consequences of his zeal, banished him and several bishops in 585. During his exile he wrote two books against the Arians, which have been lost. The story goes that Leander was seized with a fit of remorse at having ordered Hermingild to be put to death, and his second son Reccared into Leander's hands, and he instructed by him. However that may have been, when Reccared succeeded his father in 587, he abjured Arianism and assisted Leander in the conversion of heretical subjects. Leander was a prominent spirit in the great Council of Toledo, which the King and Queen, the nobles of the Court, and 62 bishops, Arian and Catholic, were present, and the whole Visigothic kingdom abjured Arianism. In 590 Gregory made Pope, and there is evidence of friendly and congratulatory correspondence between him and Leander. Encouraged by his success against Arianism, he proceeded to govern the Church with vigour, and to inculcate the great truths of the gospel both by discourse and preachers, and in 1633, Archbishop Laud procured a Bill appropriating the money for the King's use, as it had been misused by appointing a violent Puritan to St. Antholin's Church, London, where no preacher was re-quired. (This church having been pulled down, and the parish incorporated with that of St. Mary's, Aldermay, lectures are now given in the latter church.) In 1637 he went further, and ordered that all lecturers should say the Common Prayer in hood and surplice, which they refused to do. During the Commonwealth they were favoured and in-creased in numbers, but after the Restoration a heavy blow was inflicted on them by the Act of Uniformity. Lecturers of parishes are now generally elected by the vestry or principal inhabitants. Several lectures have been founded by private individuals, as Lady Moyer's at St. Andrew's, Holborn; the Boyle, at Chapel Royal, Whitehall; Bampton, at Oxford; and Hulsean, at Cambridge.

Lee, SAMUEL, D.D., an Orientalist and lin-guist, was born at Longnor in Shropshire in 1783. He was educated at a charity school in that village and at the age of 12 was appren-ticed to a carpenter and joiner. In 1790 he determined to learn Latin, and though only earning seven shillings a week, contrived to buy books for the purpose. He soon added Greek, Hebrew, Chaldee, Syriac, Arabic, Persian, French, German and Italian. Arch-deacon Corbett found out his studious habits and lent him books. In 1810 Lee became master of Bowdler's foundation school in Shrewsbury, and in 1813 he went to Queen's College, Cambridge, and took his degree of B.A. in 1817. He was ordained, and in 1819 became Arabic Professor at Cambridge, and Regius Professor of Hebrew and Canon of Bristol in 1831. Halle University conferred on him the title of D.D. unsolicited in 1822, and Cambridge in 1833. He died Rector of Barley in Hertfordshire in 1851.

Among the more important of Dr. Lee's numerous works are:—Hebrew Grammar; Travels of John Batuta, translated from the Arabic; The Book of Job, translated from the original Hebrew; Hebrew, Chaldean and English Lexicon; Events and Times of the Visions of Daniel and St. John, etc. He also translated the Bible into Syriac, Malay, Per-sian, Hindustani, Coptic and Arabic, for the British and Foreign Bible Society.

Legates.—Ambassadors sent by the Pope to foreign Churches. The name is of classical origin, and was first applied to the governors of the provinces composing the kingdom of the Emperor Augustus, a.c. 27. The name was afterwards given to the repre-sentatives of the Pope who attended the first Councils in the East. Legates are of three kinds: (1) Legati a latere, "from the side" of the Pope, who are always cardinals, with power little inferior to that of the Pope himself, and who have authority over all other legates. (2) Legati nati, whose office was hereditary, and to which class the Archbishops of Canterbury, with few exceptions, were considered to belong; the power of this class was very limited, and the office came to be reduced to little more than a title. (3) Legati missi, or Nuncii apostolici, who were endowed with absolute authority in the matter for which they were employed, though the authority went no further. The institution underwent a reform in the time of Leo X., but more changes came with the German Reformation, when three new nunciatures were established at Cologne, Lucerne and Brussels, in addition to those which already existed at Warsaw and Vienna. The Englishmen who have filled the office of Papal Legates are Archbishop William, 1127; Henry, Bishop of Winchester, 1139; Theobald, Archbishop of Canterbury, 1150; Roger, Archbishop of York, 1164; Thomas Becket, 1166; Archbishop Richard, 1174; Archbishop Baldwin, 1186; William Longchamp, 1190; Archbishop Hubert, 1195.

Legends ["things to be read"].—A legend was originally a book used in the old Romish churches containing the lessons that were to be read at Divine Service. Hence the lives of the saints and martyrs came to be called legends, because chapters were to be read out of them at matins and in the refectories of the religious houses. In the first century the legends were not mere stories, but had a historical character. Thus the Acta Martyrum and Acta Sanctorum, Eusebius's book on the martyrs of Palestine, etc., are more or less authentic; but at a later period the legends became a mass of fiction. The first strong example of this degeneracy is the Golden Legend, a collection of the lives of the saints, composed by James de Varase—better known as John de Voragine—Vicar-general of the Dominicans, and afterwards Archbishop of Genoa in the thirteenth century. This legend consists of 177 chapters, each treating of a saint or a festival. It was very popular, and remained so for 200 years, was translated into several languages, and passed through many editions; but is full of ridiculous and romantic stories, as the Roman Catholics themselves acknowledge. On this book was modelled Capgrave's Legenda Angliæ, a work of the fifteenth century, printed by Caxton. The Roman Breviary abounds in legends of saints, which every priest is bound daily to peruse. Alban Butler's English Work, Lives of the Saints, contains legends of over 1,500 saints. For the work compiled by the Bollandists, see ACTA SANCTORUM.

Legion, THE THUNDERING.—The name given to a legion of Christian soldiers in the army of Marcus Aurelius. Eusebius, on the authority of Apollinarius and Tertullian, states that the reason for this name was when Marcus was marching against the Marcomanni in 174, his army were in a narrow pass of the Alps, surrounded by the enemy and suffocated by thirst. Christians fell on their knees and prayed to God and were answered by miraculous showers of rain, accompanied by lightning, which refreshed them and frightened their enemies. On the victorious return of Marcus to Rome he called the Christian Legion "Thundering Legion," and ceased to persecute them. This is shown by Neander to be a mixture of truth and fiction. It is from the statements of Christian authors, and from the reliefs of the Column of Marcus Aurelius in Rome, that we learn that when soldiers were in difficulties they were relieved by a shower of rain; which the Christians, of whom there probably were many in the army, ascribed to God, and the heathens to Jupiter; but it has been conjectured that the twelfth of the Roman Legion bore the name "Thundering Legion" at the time of the Emperor Augustus, and that there was no Christian persecution at that time, for that at Lyons took place years afterwards.

Legitimation.—According to the Law of the Church of Rome, and the Law of all countries in Continental Europe, children born before wedlock are legitimate by a subsequent marriage, provided that at the time of birth the parents were free to marry, and that no legal impediment stood in the way. If, for instance, a child born is the child of adultery, no subsequent marriage can in any case make it legitimate. By the common law of England, children born out of wedlock cannot be legitimated by any subsequent marriage, but are illegitimate all their lives and incapable of inheriting. The decision of the Council of nobles at Merton in 1236, when requested to conform to the English law on this point, was, "leges Angliæ mutari."

Leibnitz, GOTTFRIED WILHELM [b. 1646, d. 1716].—One of the most famous scholars that ever lived; born at Hanover. In his philosophy he set forth the theory of monads, i.e. simple unpounded substances, without figure, without extension, without divisibility, by the combination of which all bodies are formed into which they may be again resolved. [MATERIALISM.] These monads are things, indestructible, and of two kinds: those destitute of consciousness, but possessing an internal activity which he calls perception; and those possessing consciousness which are souls. The difference between the higher and lower intelligences depends on the degree of this consciousness. The highest monad is God. Now, inasmuch

When Charles II. took steps for introducing Episcopacy into Scotland, he nominated Leigh-afterwards to the archbishopric of Glasgow, in 1671. But, finding that his opinions were more in favour of moderation than those of other bishops, who looked on him in conse-

in 1674, and retired to Sussex, to the house of his sister, where he spent the last ten years of his life. He died in London in February, 1684, having come up to town, at the request of some friends, to hold a discussion with Lord Perth on religious matters; but was buried in a chapel at Horsted-Keynes, his sister's residence.

The writings of Leighton are among the most beautiful in English theology. We have heard a great Church dignitary say of his Commentary on St. Peter, that it is "Calvinism purged of all its imperfections." Coleridge's Aids to Reflection consists almost entirely of expansions and commentaries on the teaching of this saintly man. Several editions of his works have been published, and there is a very charming life of him by
C. F. Secretan.

Leipsig, DISPUTATIONS OF.—In 1519 a discussion was held at Leipsig between John Eck on the one hand, and Luther and Carl-stadt on the other, which lasted from June 27th to July 13th. During the first week Eck and Carlstadt disputed about free will; in the second, Eck and Luther concerning the Pope's supremacy; and, in the third, on repentance, purgatory, indulgences, and priestly absolution.
No decision was come to, but the discussions won many friends for Luther, as John Cella-rius, Prince George of Anhalt, and others, and it gave a new impulse to Melancthon.

A second discussion took place at Leipsig
in 1631, between the Lutheran and Reformed divines. It lasted from March 3rd to 23rd.
They discussed the Augsburg Confession, and set forth an exposition of their differences;
but it led to no important result.

Leland, JOHN, D.D.—A well-known con-troversialist against unbelief, was born at Wigan, of a Presbyterian family, in 1691.
He was educated in Dublin, where he became pastor of a Presbyterian Church in 1716, in which situation he remained till his death in 1766. He first appeared as an author, 1733, by publishing an answer to Tindall's Christianity as old as the Creation.
In 1737 appeared The Divine Authority of the Old and New Testament, written against Dr.
Morgan's Moral Philosopher. But his best work, one which is still used, is A View of the Principal Deistical Writers of England in the Last and Present Century.

Le Maitre, LOUIS ISAAO, born in Paris, March 1613, was ordained priest in 1648, and became Director of Port Royal. He adhered to the doctrines of the Jansenists, and was therefore hated by the Jesuits, who caused him to be imprisoned for two years in the Bastille, and, after his release, compelled him, by their persecution, to retire to Pomponne, where he died in 1684. Of his numerous works the most important is his translation of the Bible, much of which was written during his confinement in the Bastille.

Lent, a Saxon term signifying Spring, is the name given to the 40 weekdays preceding the Easter Festival, which are observed as a special season of fasting and prayer. It is probable that a Fast of some duration previous to the commemoration of Our Saviour's Resurrection was kept from a very early date, but it is quite certain that its original duration was very considerably less than 40 days. Giving a somewhat restricted interpretation to the words, "The days will come when the bridegroom shall be taken away from them, and then shall they fast in those days," the early Christians sought to fulfil them by fasting from the afternoon of Good Friday to the morning of the Resurrection Day, and this space being about forty hours was termed Tessaraktoste or Quadragesima. As time went on additional days were added, in some Churches more, in some less; but the two original days were more strictly observed than the rest. The precise number of 40, it is curious to observe, was not selected till the time of Gregory the Great, although the Fast was called the Quadragesimal Fast. Not only did the length of the Fast vary in different Churches, but the modes of observing it were many. Some made it last three weeks, some six, some seven; some excluded Saturdays as well as Sundays from the days they observed. Again, some abstained from all living creatures; others only from flesh: some would eat dry bread only, and others not so much as that. Some fasted a certain number of hours in each day, and then ate any kind of meat; others regarded the whole day as a kind of abstinence.

When the original space of 40 hours had been departed from, it was natural that the duration of the Fast should come before long to approximate with the 40 days of our Saviour's Fasting and Temptation, the 40 days spent by Moses and Elijah in the wilderness, and the 40 days' grace given in the preaching of Jonah to Nineveh. The name "quadragesima" would also have influence in determining the length of the season; and considerations of the worth and utility of a special time of prayer and self-denial spread over several weeks would exercise their weight. A particular reason for the Lenten Fast was found in the custom, which gradually prevailed among the majority of Christians, of communicating chiefly, and in many cases only, at Easter; it was hoped that there would be less danger of communicating undevoutly and inconsiderately if they were appointed for prayer and fasting, almsdeeds, and other religious exercises, besides being a marked occasion for participation of the Holy Communion, was also a fixed and solemn time for admission of catechumens to baptism, penitents to absolution: in both cases propriety of a previous season of self-discipline was obvious. From the practice of abstinence at this season there naturally followed the exercise of active charity and will, and this not only in private life but in public matters—e.g., the infliction of corporal punishment and of torture were dictated by the imperial laws during these days.

While the conditions of modern life render it impossible for the majority of Christians to observe Lent with the same strictness which was possible in days gone by, the annual occurrence of the season as a hallowed time for the curtailment of pleasures, for more frequent acts of worship, for liberal almsgiving, for more thorough examination and confession of sin, and in many cases of very great help and advancement to the servant of God.

Leo I., POPE, commonly called LEO THE GREAT, was born in Tuscany at the end of the fourth century. He was a deacon when he was sent for from Rome in 440 to become Bishop of Rome in succession to Sixtus III. At this time the Church was troubled by the Nestorians of Africa ruined by the Vandals, and the West disturbed by the Manichæans and Pelagians. Soon after his elevation he had a controversy with Hilary, Bishop of Poitiers, who had deposed Chelidonius of Bourges, whom Leo reinstated in his see. [HEILIGES. CHELIDONIUS.] In 444 Leo held a Council against the Manichæans, which were condemned, and this ecclesiastical decree was confirmed by the Emperor Valentinian III. He made use of Prætextatus of Aquitaine to confute the errors of the Manichæans, and appointed him his secretary; meantime Eutychus had published his heresy and was condemned in a Synod held at Constantinople in 448; but he got his doctrine proved at the ROBBER COUNCIL of Ephesus [q.v.] in 449; Leo made the acts of this Council void by another held the same year at Rome. [EUTYCHUS.] In 451 was held the General Council of Chalcedon, in which Pope's Legate presided, and in which he celebrated a letter to Flavian, Bishop of Constantinople, which was accepted "as the voice of Peter," and allowed to be the orthodox definition of doctrine concerning the person of Christ. By one of the canons drawn up at this Council it was ordered that the Bishop of Constantinople should enjoy equal rank with the Bishop of Rome, the limits of their respective jurisdictions being defined, chates of Antioch and Alexandria being der that of Constantinople. The Pope ed loudly against this canon, but never- it was passed. The following year, having lost a great battle in Gaul, through Italy, ravaging the country rent. especially as he has been confounded with others of the same name; but it appears that his chief work, De Sectis, was written about the close of the sixth century. He also wrote a treatise Contra Nestorianos et Eutychianos, which throws light on some of the difficulties of the Monophysite controversies.

Lerins, CONVENT OF, situated on an island opposite Cannes, was founded about A.D. 400, by St. Honorat, Archbishop of Arles. The monks of the monastery which he built became very numerous, and had great influence over the Church of Southern France for some centuries. Its discipline afterwards relaxed, and Gregory the Great gave orders for its reformation. Its riches increased to such an extent that the island was many times attacked by plunderers—by the Arabs, Saracens, and Genoese. Nevertheless it still remained very wealthy, and Pope John XXII. and his successors gave it away in commendam, in order to get possession of its wealth. Finally in the fifteenth century, being too weak to retain its independence, it was united to the Benedictine Congregation of Monte Cassino. The abbey has since been secularised and the island sold.

Leslie, CHARLES, one of the Nonjuror divines. He was born at Dublin in 1650, the son of John Leslie, who was Bishop successively of the Isles in Scotland, and of Raphoe and Clogher in Ireland. Charles Leslie went to Enniskillen School, and afterwards to Trinity College, Dublin, took his degree, came to London to the Temple, and became a barrister for ten years. He then took Holy Orders, at the age of 30, and became curate at Glaslough, where the family estate was. Here he married Miss Griffith, daughter of the Dean of Ross, and a few years later was made Chancellor of the Diocese of Connor. At the Revolution he declined to take the oath to King William, was deprived of his preferment, and came to London, where he officiated as private chaplain to the second Lord Clarendon, and was a frequent preacher at the various places where the Nonjurors worshipped [NONJURORS], and was also much resorted to as a casuist. He never from that time took any regular cure. He lodged at the house of a Quaker, and thus acquired a full knowledge of that sect; was on friendly terms with William Penn, and won over several members of the body to the Church. He was fond of country sports, and well acquainted with the light literature and popular topics of the day, was very popular with his acquaintance, and always exercised his influence to the allaying of religious bitterness. But to his principles he was always firm, refusing offers of preferment from Burnet, and helping his distressed co-religionists out of his small means. Two or three times he visited James II. at St. Germain. In 1709 some of the Nonjurors, on the death of Bishop Lloyd, found themselves able to return to the established Church, but Leslie was not one of these. Next year he was outlawed for writing a pamphlet in answer to Bishop Burnet, and after hiding for a while, crossed to France, and ministered to the Protestants at the Chevalier's court. On the accession of George I. he was allowed to return to England, and devoted himself to theological writing. He died in 1722, and was buried at Glaslough. In accordance with his expressed wish when dying, his theological works were collected and published together; his political writings died a natural death. His theological works still live: first comes his Short and Easy Method with a Deist, which has been often reprinted, and is still in the catalogue of the Christian Knowledge Society; one of its chief merits is its admirable style. Many works had been written for the learned and for those who had leisure for ponderous disquisitions; but here was a work, short, full of matter, taking a vigorous turn of its own, and though close and acute in argument, yet most lucid,—“a reasoner not to be reasoned against,” as Dr. Johnson called him. The main line of his argument runs thus: the doctrines of Christianity depend on the facts; let them be accepted as true, the doctrines will follow. The facts of Christianity have been attested by credible witnesses, who have handed down their testimony by means which cannot be gainsayed, not only by written records, but by usages and observances which have become public monuments, incapable of other explanation than that which they offer of themselves. Other works of his were the Short and Easy Method with the Jews; the Snake in the Grass and Satan Disrobed, both against the Quakers; and Regale and Pontificale, a treatise to justify the consecration of Non-juring Bishops.

Lesser Litany.—The term applied to three ejaculations, “Lord, have mercy upon us!” “Christ, have mercy upon us!” “Lord, have mercy on us!” which, it may be noticed, generally precede the Lord's Prayer, where it is intended to be used as a prayer rather than as a thanksgiving. The ejaculations are addressed severally to the Three Persons of the Trinity.

Lessing, GORTHOLD EPHRAIM [b. 1729, d. 1781], was the son of a Lutheran pastor, first educated at the school of his native town of Kamenz, then at Meisegen in Saxony, and from 1746–8 at the University of Leipzig. He was an insatiable and omnivorous reader almost from infancy, mastering the Latin, Greek, mathematics, and history of the curriculum, and reading other classics in his spare hours. He was intended for the ministry, and went to Leipzig with the full intention of studying theology; but there was no theologian there equal to the position of mastering him, and the love of classics and art gave him a strong impetus towards the world in his youth he had been quiet. Consequently he devoted himself to life, and especially desired to drama by writing plays of high quality. His time was spent, some at Berlin, Breslau. For the last eleven years he was keeper of the Wolfenbützel library.

Lessing is a deeply interesting character as regards his theological views. That he was sceptical is clear, but his scepticism was not the scoffing scepticism of Voltaire. He was a man of deep, earnest religious convictions, who questioned evidence severely, and was not prone to prevarication. Probably he was in collision with the theologians with whom he came into collision, and was impatient of argumentation, when a simple example of holy life might have convinced him. He used to express his doubts of the Saviour's miracles, that he did not believe, but declared that they did not suffice to teach him living faith in the Son of God. His faith, though doubted, was really deeper than that of those who merely repeated formulas; it was to spring up and bear fruit in living and not a dead faith. He held, if only by the hem of the garment, that which he felt to be divine. Before his influence was probably felt by his countrymen, as he led their systems and theories, and shewed in his life the example of a true wisdom and after God.

Lessons.—The return of the Jews from captivity was followed by a regular reading of the Scriptures to the people, and synagogues were set out in the land with this object. It was for sacrifice and for the purging of the nation; the synagogue reading of Moses and the Prophets on the Sabbath day. In the time of our Lord the practice was most religiously observed. He sanctioned it by attending [see Acts xv. 21]. The Apostles kept attending the synagogue where they went; and as the Church gradually became emancipated from the synagogue, the same practice was continued to the reading of the Old Testament, and added that of the New [see 1 Cor. iv. 16]. In the writings of the Christian Fathers this is clear. In a writing A.D. 140, speaks of the reading of the Apostles and the Prophets on the Lord's Day. The Apostolic Constitutions speak of four readings from the Old Testament, two from the New. Later writers, e.g. Chrysostom, give indications of a fixed system. Genesis was read in Lent and the Acts of the Apostles between Easter and Pentecost in Holy Week. In the Middle Ages

From that date to the end of the year, the lessons, both morning and evening, are taken from the Apocalypse. (3) The lessons for festi- vals, instead of being selected as formerly from the Apocrypha, without any reference to the special occasion, consist of portions which have an appropriate fitness for the several days, and in most cases the second lessons are chosen to illustrate them. This is one of the happiest alterations [See A Companion to the Lectionary, by the Rev. W. Benham, in which the meaning of each selection is fully ex- plained]. (4) There are alternative first lessons for Evensong on Sundays, so as to pro- vide for a second evening service. This also gives an opportunity for a larger selection from the Old Testament. (5) Upon special occasions approved by the Ordinary, other lessons may be substituted. An excellent selection for such events as choir dedication, harvest festivals, etc., was published by the late Bishop of Lincoln, Dr. Wordsworth.

There is no settled rule to provide for the ambiguity which arises when a Saint's day falls on a Sunday, but the following seems best on the whole: the first Sunday in Advent, Easter Day, Whitsunday, Trinity Sunday, Ash Wednesday, Good Friday, and Ascension Day, take precedence of all other days. In 1886 Easter Day was also St. Mark's Day, but no one thought of reading other than the Easter lessons. On other days, those days which have proper second lessons take precedence of those which have first lessons only. Thus, e.g., if St. James's Day fall on a Sunday, since the second lesson of the morn- ing has a direct bearing on the first, it will mar its significance to separate the two, and both should be read, the Sunday lesson giving way. On other days, it is best, perhaps, to let the Sunday take precedence. The learned authors of "The Prayer Book Interleaved" have put forth a different rule, however, namely, that a lesson from the Canonical Books should always take precedence of one from the Apocrypha; according to the alter- native rule, when All Saints' Day shall fall on a Sunday, the lessons from the Book of Wis- dom would take precedence of two lessons from the minor prophets.

Letters Dimissory. [DIMISSORY LETTERS.]

Letters of Orders.—A document signed by a bishop, stating that he has or- dained a clergyman. Churchwardens may demand to see the letters of orders before allow- ing any one to officiate in the church.

Letters Patent [LITERÆ PATENTES] are documents of the Sovereign to which the great seal of England is affixed, which enable a person to enjoy certain privileges which others have not; they are sometimes called letters overt, because they are not closed with the seal, but bear it depending from the docu- ment, so that it is always ready to open for inspection and confirmation of the authority. In France, such seals were affixed to bulls or briefs, &c., from Rome. The Canonists date this practice from the time of Louis XI. They were called letters-patent from their opening words: "Per preces publicum instrumentum cunctis patent evidenter:" "Let it be clearly made known to all by the present public instrument."

"Let us Pray."—It has long been the custom of the Church to recall the attention of the congregation by using this formula. Formerly the words "Let us pray earnestly," or "Brethren, let us pray more earnestly," were also used, but the simple form is the only one retained in the Episcopal Church. The use of the formula in the Litany is explained to be the marking of the transition from the alternate prayers of the minister and people to the collective prayers offered by the minister alone. In other cases it is simply a call to prayer after praise, exhortation, or the like.

Leusden, JOHANNES [b. 1624, d. 1699, at Utrecht], Professor of Hebrew in his native town, editor of the Scriptures in their original languages, and author of some commentaries upon them.

Leyden, JOHN OF. [ANABAPTIST.]

Libanius.—The most celebrated rhetorician of the fourth century, b. at Antioch, in Syria, about 314. He studied and taught the art of rhetoric in Athens, and afterwards proceeded to Constantinople, whence he was expelled, probably by envious rivals, on a charge of dealing in magic. The same fate met him at Nicomedia, and after another short stay at Constantinople he returned to Antioch in 354, and remained there till his death, which took place between 395 and 400. His works were much admired and their style was imitated by the Emperor Julian, and among the more eminent of his disciples may be mentioned St. Chrysostom and Basil the Great. Notwithstanding this, Libanius was a firm upholder of paganism. His works comprise, besides his defences of heathenism, moral treatises on Greek history, and about two thousand letters.

Libation [from Lat. libare, "to pour out"].—Anything poured out as an offering in sacrifice. Such was the "drink-offering" of the Jewish Church. The practice was also found among heathen nations. The Romans at their meals made an offering to the Lares in the fire which burned upon the hearth. In fact the libation was a sort of "grace before meat." No true worshipper presumed to touch the cup with his lips till the religious duty was fulfilled. So with the ancient Egyptians, a libation of wine was offered, together with incense. In 2 Tim iv. 6 St. Paul alludes to this custom when he says: "I am already being offered and the time of my departure is come." Literally it is, "I am let out as a libation."

Libel.—In the Ecclesiastical term given to the declaration or admitted to writing and presented as of the plaintiff in a suit.

Libellatici.—A class of persons the Lares [q.v.], so called because they procured a libellus or certificate from a magistrate excusing them from a sacrifice in public. As this could be obtained either by denying their word or by sending a friend or a slave to die in their name, or by a bribe, they were esteemed virtually guilty of apostasy.

Liber Septimus.—Two books by this name. The first is a collection of Decretals from the pontificate of Gelasius to that of Sixtus V., arranged by Matthieu of Lyons into five books, and published in 1590, but is of no authority. The second is a collection of Roman Constitutions and Conciliar Decrees, those of the Council of Trent, which was published in 1598, but immediately suppressed as the Popes feared it would prevent them from putting their own interpretations upon the Decrees of the Council of Trent.

Liber Diurnus.—An ancient collection of formularies used in the Roman Church, supposed to have been compiled by Gratian. Fragments of it are found in the canonist, but as a whole it was long lost. An edition was prepared at Rome in 1590, but was forbidden by the Roman censors. The first edition which actually appeared was that of the Jesuit Garnier.

"Libera nos," &c.—[i.] A prayer sung at the close of a funeral in the Roman Church, before the body was pronounced over the corpse. [ii.] It is the opening petition in the Lord's Prayer, said by the congregation, the preceding prayer being said by the priest. This custom was retained in the Canon of the first Prayer Book of Edward VI. and still survives in the Roman Church in the subsequent Prayer Books of that Church the present custom was in its place. In the canon of the Roman Church the words form also the beginning of a prayer added to the Lord's Prayer; being inserted in this place, the "Libera nos" is termed also intercessio. It is used against temptation, and is found in differing forms in all the Western Churches since the eighth century. Since the sixteenth century the names of saints to be invoked have been added to the prayer.

Libertinus, PORN. [PORN.]

Libertines.—A religious sect which arose in Flanders in 1625, calling themselves spiritualists. Its chief founders were a tailor of Picardy, and Coppin, of ius, etc. It made its way into the favour and protection of the king of Navarre and sister of the king, and found patrons in several of the Churches. Calvin devoted a large part of his life to the exposure of the errors of the Church, which checked their progress in the limited their influence to the point where they gave them origin. The tenets of the sect were that God was the sole power in the mind of man, and the source of all human actions; that, the distinctions of good and evil had been established with regard to man, were false and groundless, and could not, properly speaking, be said to exist; that religion consisted in the purification of the spirit, or rational soul, with the rejection of all sensual pleasures; that all those who had attained a happy union, by sublime contemplation and elevation of mind, were then exempted from all passions and appetites or passions; that all other pursuits were then perfectly useless; that, after the death of the body, the soul would be united to the Deity.

The Calvinists of Geneva were those who, after the rule of the Bishop and the establishment of their independence, refused to introduce the Reformation, and found the reforms too strict, and too austere and profligate, making no distinction between moral good and evil. To this class belonged the Calvinists, who denied the divinity of Christ, the immortality of the soul, the difference between moral good and evil, which he was brought before the king in 1550 and condemned to death.

BISHOPRIC OF.—The name means "field of the dead," and is derived from the slaughter of a number of converts by the Roman soldiers during the persecution. Lichfield, without some interruption, has been a bishopric since about 656. It was the seat of the bishopric of Mercia, from which it afterwards sprang. Hereafter it was separated from it in 676; Lindsey in 680, and Lichfield was re-united to it in 737. Leicester was separated from it in 888, and in 1072 became the See of Leicester. Lichfield for a while became joined to it in 1075, and to these was joined in 1082. In 1541 Chester was joined to it, and in 1549 of York.

[v.], Bishop 669–672, is the first of Lichfield. He lived at a mile from the present cathedral, and thence ruled over his enormous diocese. The church had been built at Stowe by the prior Jaruman. Bede tells us that St. Chad was buried near the Church of St. Mary, the first in Lichfield, and that his remains were translated to the new church of St. Peter; this must have been completed before 735, when Bede died. After the Conquest, it was replaced by a Norman church, which was swept away after about a century, and gradually the present cathedral was built on its site. The oldest part (the western choir) was probably commenced about 1200. The north and south transepts followed, then the nave; then the west front, which does not appear to have been constructed quite continuously with the rest, for it is dated 1275; afterwards the eastern part of the choir was taken in hand, destroying the work done at the beginning of the century. The present Lady chapel and presbytery were erected and completed about 1325. Walter Langton, 1296–1321, did most of this, and constructed a splendid shrine for the relics of St. Chad, as well as building an episcopal palace. Since then nothing has been done except by way of restoring and improving the building. The great event in the history of Lichfield Cathedral was the siege which it sustained in 1643 against the Parliamentary army, headed by Lord Brooke. The cathedral close had been fortified by Bishop Langton in the thirteenth century, and so was calculated to sustain a siege. Injured by the cannon shots, the central spire fell and crushed in part of the roof; the cathedral was wrecked by the victors, who defaced the monuments, hacked down the carved woodwork, shattered the stained glass, and destroyed the records of the cathedral and of the city. After the Restoration, John Hacket was made bishop of Lichfield and Coventry (1661), and at once began the repair of his ruined cathedral; the great spire was rebuilt from a design by Sir Christopher Wren, and in 1669 the building was reconsecrated. In the latter part of the eighteenth century, Wyatt made some destructive alterations which it has cost much to undo. In 1860 Sir Gilbert Scott took the true restoration into his hands, and in the spring of 1884 the completion was signalled by a great ceremonial, when the west front was rededicated, in the presence of the Archbishop of Canterbury and others.

Lichfield is one of our smaller cathedrals, being only 319 feet in length, but it is one of the most beautiful. Most of the old manuscripts belonging to the cathedral library were destroyed at the time of the siege, but one or two were saved, the chief being the Gospels of St. Chad; it contains the Gospels of St. Matthew and St. Mark, and part of St. Luke: tradition says that Gildas was its scribe, and the Welsh notes on its margin bear out that supposition.

The cathedral body consists of the dean, three archdeacons, four canons residentiary, four priest vicars, and nineteen prebendaries.

Lichfield had 691 benefices, but part of the diocese has been taken to form the bishopric of Southwell. There is at present an assistant bishop for Lichfield.

The income of the diocese is £4,200.

Lightfoot, JOHN, D.D.—One of the earliest English Hebrew scholars, was born at Stoke-upon-Trent in 1602. He studied at Christ College, Cambridge. In 1621 he became B.A. and Assistant Master at Repton, Derbyshire: two years afterwards he was ordained and obtained the curacy at Norton-upon-Hales, Shropshire, and afterward became chaplain to Sir Rowland Cotton, who, being a good Hebrew scholar, inspired Lightfoot with a desire to become one also. In 1631 Sir Rowland presented him with the living of Ashley, in Staffordshire: subsequently he moved to London, and in 1642 was chosen minister of St. Bartholomew's. He was one of the Assembly of Divines who met at Westminster, and spoke much and eloquently, showing strong Presbyterian leanings. In the same year he became master of Catharine Hall, Cambridge, and in 1644 rector of Much Munden, Hertfordshire. In 1655 he was made Vice-chancellor of Cambridge. At the Restoration he conformed to the Act of Uniformity, and was made Prebend of Ely, where he died in 1675.

The work by which Lightfoot has made his name famous is Horæ Hebraicæ et Talmudicæ, containing Hebrew and Talmudical comments on the four Evangelists, the Acts of the Apostles, and 1 Corinthians. He also wrote Erubhim, or Miscellanies Christianæ and Judaicæ; A Handful of Gleanings out of the Book of Exodus; The Harmony of the Four Evangelists, etc.

Light, FRIENDS OF. [FRIENDS OF LIGHT.]

Lights on the Altar.—The custom of having lights and candlesticks on the altar dates from very early times, and Theodoret and Jerome speak of it. It seems probable that Archbishop Theodore introduced the practice among the Anglo-Saxons from the Eastern Church. There are many proofs that they were used in the English Church since the Reformation, though they have been long discontinued until late years. Queen Elizabeth, though opposed to superstition, had a crucifix, two candlesticks, and two tapers burning at the altar of her chapel. The present rubric states that "such ornaments of the Church . . . shall be in use as were in this Church of England, by authority of Parliament, in the second year of the reign of Edward VI." In the injunctions of King Edward VI., set forth in 1547, it is ordered that there shall be "only two lights upon the high altar behind the sacrament, for the signification that Christ is the very true light of the world." The two lights are a symbol of Christ's twofold nature. It is also said by the advocates of lights that they symbolise the need of other than natural light. Some object to any lights on the ground that we have no "high altar," while others affirm that the "sacrament" signifies the consecrated wafer which was suspended in a pyx on the altar, and that if this is taken away the lights must also be removed. The use of lights has much increased lately. In 1879 they were used in over two thousand churches. The last Ritual Judgment pronounced them illegal. [FOUR-STONE JUDGMENT.]

Liguori, ALFONSO MARIA DE [b. 1696, d. 1787].—A saint of the Roman Catholic Church, and founder of the Redemptorists. He was born of noble parents in Naples, and having been educated by the Priests of the Oratory, he took up law as his profession, and won great success in it, but soon gave it up to lead a religious life. He was ordained priest in 1726, and in 1732, in consequence, he said, of a revelation, founded "the Congregation of our most Blessed Redeemer." In this he was joined by twelve companions. [REDEMPTORISTS.] In 1762, much against his will, he was made Bishop of St. Agatha of the kingdom of Naples, but retired in 1775, and retired to lead auster life with his own order ere he died. He was solemnly canonized by Gregory XVI., and in 1839 by Gregory XVI., and in 1839 he was raised to be a Doctor of the Holy Church. He was one of the most voluminous writers of the Romanish publications extending to 70 volumes; dignity was conferred on him in the distinct way in which he held the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception, the Virgin and the Infallibility of the Pope. His works are further noticed in PROBABILITY.

Theology of Liguori has with more antagonism among than that of any Romanist is subject. In fact his name alone of that Church is regarded as of all that is crafty, shuffling, and evasive.

PHILIP VAN, Divinity Professor at Remonstrants of Arminians, was born there in 1633. He was at Amsterdam, Leyden, and became pastor of the Arminian Church, and in 1668 at Amsterdam: so Divinity Professor. He died and published several manuscripts and letters belonging to Episcopius (his predecessor in the divinity chair) which form almost a complete history of the Arminians down to the Synod of Dort. He himself wrote De Veritate Religionis Christiane, the result of a discussion with a Jew; A History of the Inquisition; Christian Theology, etc.

Limbus or Limbo [Latin, "fringe" or "border"].—According to the Roman Catholics, besides the hell in which infidels and sinners are shut up for ever, and purgatory, in which the souls of the faithful are purified, there are two places on the outskirts of hell, "limbus patrum" and "limbus infantum." The limbus patrum is the Paradise of which Christ spoke to the thief, and the "Abraham's bosom" in the parable of Dives and Lazarus, the place where the souls of the patriarchs remained until the advent of Christ, who before His resurrection appeared to them and opened the doors of heaven for them. It is not known for certain when the word limbus first came into use, but it is first found in the writings of Thomas Aquinas. As inferi (hell) seemed to convey the idea of the place of eternal damnation, the milder term was adopted. The limbus infantum is for infants who die without baptism. It was stated by the Council of Florence that they could not enter heaven, so theologians adopted this and other theories. These infants were not supposed to undergo any suffering, but to be in a sort of impassive state, though some theologians held it to be susceptible of a lower degree of blessedness.

Lincoln, Bishopric of.—Lincoln was originally by far the most extensive diocese in England, being composed of three Anglo-Saxon bishoprics, Lindsey or Sidnasthorpe, Leicester, and Dorchester, which will each be found under their respective heads. Lincoln became a separate See about 1072, when Remigius or Remi of Fécamp, its first Norman Bishop, removed it thither from Dorchester-on-Thames.

Elly was separated from Lincoln in 1109, and Lincoln was further divided into Osnay, 1542 (afterwards Oxford, 1545) and Peterborough, 1541.

Remigius built the original cathedral, and from the portions which remain at the west end, it must have been of the severest Norman style, with no ornamentation; it terminated in a short apsidal eastern limb, and was built on the plan of a church at Rouen. A fire occurred in 1141, by which the roof was burned, and Bishop Alexander caused the whole church to be vaulted in stone. In 1185 a great earthquake did severe damage to the cathedral: as Roger of Hoveden says, "it was rent in two from top to bottom." The following year, 1186, Hugh of Avalon or St. Hugh [q.v.] became bishop, and at once commenced the present cathedral, the first stone of which was laid in 1192. It is dedicated to St. Mary. Hugh died in 1200, and by that time the ritual choir and eastern transept were completed, and the western transept commenced. This portion is of pure Lancet Gothic, without any admixture of Norman. Hugh was buried at Lincoln, and in 1280, in the time of Bishop Sutton, his body was translated to the "Angel Choir," which was built beyond the original eastern portion on purpose to receive his shrine. In 1235 the celebrated ROBERT GROSSETÊTE [q.v.] became bishop of Lincoln. The central tower of the cathedral was built by him, and probably the roofing of the nave. The Angel Choir completed the main fabric of the cathedral. The cloisters in the Geometrical Decorated style were commenced in 1296. In the third arch of the south choir aisle are the remains of the shrine of LITTLE ST. HUGH, a Christian boy said to have been crucified at Lincoln by the Jews in 1255; this was during the episcopate of Bishop Lexington. The seats of the choir have some very curious carvings, which probably illustrate some once popular but now forgotten poem. The Chapter House also belongs to the thirteenth century. The Galilee porch was probably built early in this century, in the time of William of Blois. The south end of the great transept dates from the episcopate of Thomas Bek [1342-1347], and the upper part of the western towers is in the Perpendicular style of about 1450. The cathedral is built in a commanding position on the top of a very steep hill. Its central tower contains the famous bell, "Great Tom of Lincoln," first cast in 1610, and recast in 1835. The cathedral library contains a valuable collection of manuscripts and early printed books. The façade of the cathedral is terminated by stair turrets, with tall spires; that to the south is adorned with the mitred effigy of St. Hugh, the founder of the church, and that on the north has the figure of "the Swincherd of Stow," who gave a peck of silver pennies towards the building.

Richard Fleming [1420-1431] had to carry out the sentence of the Council of Constance in 1425 for exhuming the body of Wycliffe, burning it to ashes, and casting them into running water, which was done at Lutterworth.

ROBERT SANDERSON [1660-1663] [q.v.] was one of the most celebrated bishops of Lincoln. Bishop Barlow [1675-1691] is said never to have visited his cathedral, and, though he defended James II.'s strongest measures, he was equally ready to do homage to William III.

The cathedral body comprises the bishop, dean, two archdeacons, four canons residentiary, four minor canons, and fifty-two prebendaries. Until lately it comprised 812 benefices, but part of it and part of Lichfield have been taken to form the new diocese of Southwell.

The Bishop of Nottingham is Suffragan for Lincoln.

The income of the see is £4,500.

Lindisfarne, BISHOPRIC OF.—The seat of the great and almost royal See of Durham were originally planted in a small island of the name of Lindisfarne, lying off the northern coast of Northumberland. This island had been given to St. Aidan by Oswald, King of Northumberland, as soon as his victory at Hexham had secured him the sovereignty of Bernicia, the territory now known as the counties of Northumberland and Durham [AIDAN]. This island became the seat of the bishopric, to which it gave its name in 635. From the time when Aidan first took possession of the island until 875, when his successor Eardulf was driven out of it by the Danes, there was a regular succession of bishops of Lindisfarne. Eardulf died A.D. 899, when the See was transferred to Chester-le-Street, a few miles north of the site occupied later by the city of Durham [CHESTER-LE-STREET.] The greatest of the bishops of Lindisfarne was St. Cuthbert [q.v.] [DURHAM, BISHOPRIC OF.]

Linus, St., POPE.—According to Roman tradition, when St. Peter and St. Paul had founded the Church at Rome, and brought it to a flourishing condition, they appointed ministers capable of governing it during their absence from the city. Linus, Anacletus, and Clement were chosen, and, it is said, received the episcopal character at the hands of the Apostles. Linus is supposed to be the same whom St. Paul mentions in his Second Epistle to Timothy. Some authors tell us that St. Peter chose Clement to succeed him, preferably to his two fellow labourers, but that Clement, to avoid disputes, declined governing the Church, as also probably did Anacletus, for we find Linus placed immediately after St. Peter by the most reliable writers of the early Church, such as Jerome, Irenæus, Eusebius, and Ruffinus. It is said that Linus governed the Church for twelve years, which some count from St. Peter's martyrdom, and others from the time of his being chosen coadjutor with the Apostles. Bishop Pearson takes, with Ruffinus, the latter view. It is impossible to fix the exact date of his episcopate. Eusebius gives it differently in his History and his Chronicle, Baronius gives it as 67—78, while Bishop Pearson and Baraterius give it as 55—67. Some say that Linus suffered martyrdom under Vespasian, but there seems to be no proof of this. He is honoured by the Western Church on September 23rd, but the Eastern Church celebrate him on November 5th, in conjunction with others whom they reckon among the seventy-two disciples of our Lord. Dean Milman, in speaking of the obscurity of the early Roman Church, says:—“The names of the earlier Roman bishops are known only by barren lists, by spurious decrees and epistles, inscribed centuries later with their names; by their collision with the teachers of heretical opinions, almost all of whom found their way to Rome; by martyrdoms, ascribed with the same lavish reverence to those who lived under the mildest of Roman emperors as well as those under the most merciless persecutors.” [Lat. Christ., vol. i. p. 23.]

Lis. [MILITARY ORDERS.]

Litania Septena. [PROCESSIONS.]

Litany.—The word is derived from the Greek lité, from lissomai, “I supplicate.” The apparent connection with “Liturgy,” therefore, is only an accident. At first a Litany was hardly to be distinguished from any other form of supplication, but it soon came to mean one form of prayer, namely, that offered by the people in times of special distress; they marched through the streets, sometimes singing hymns or psalms, sometimes crying, “Lord, have mercy upon us! Christ, have mercy upon us!” And during a long period of Church history that was the special idea of a litany. The idea was retained as late as the first English Book of Prayer, the Primer, in the reign of Henry VIII. In that book the Litany is called the Common Prayer of Procession. But we have no reason to think that there was any intention of returning to the old practice. Since that time the word "litany" has been stripped of that accidental portion of its meaning, and passed into its present use.

In dealing with the history of the Litany we naturally ask, What led to those processions? With what facts in Church history have they been connected? The first Litany in this sense of the word is found in Joel ii. [Epistle for Ash Wednesday]. That was apparently a time of famine. The people were bidden to show their repentance by solemn fasts. There is something in that solemn confession by public and national acts which adapts itself to certain states of feeling, such as fear and repentance. We might expect, especially in Eastern nations, that, as other usages found their way into the Christian Church, so would this. But the persecutions of the second and third centuries, by driving the Christians to take refuge in secret chambers, catacombs, and caves, would tend to stop solemn processions. Perhaps the only exceptions would be found in times of great public suffering, when Christians found themselves fellow-sufferers with others, who would be too much alarmed for themselves to feel disposed to attack or interfere with the Christians. Tertullian, who represents, in his Apology, the state of the Church in the second and third centuries, speaks of the Christians of his time, in seasons of general distress, as publicly joining in supplications and intercessions in coverings of sackcloth and ashes. He uses this phrase again and again, "Si procendendum erit;" acts are therefore implied as not confined within walls, but as taking place in public. There is a memorable event in the life of Chrysostom. He found himself opposed by a rich and influential party of the Arians. They appealed to the devotional feelings of the people, marched with great splendour through the streets of Constantinople, passed out of the city singing heretical hymns and stirring the people up against Chrysostom. He met them by starting more solemn and more grand processions, with stately silver crosses and finer hymns; the Arians were defeated, and the people were drawn off to hear Chrysostom's surpassing eloquence.

The history of the latter part of the fourth and fifth centuries shows that processional litanies had now come to be used in times of famine, wars, and pestilence. From the Eastern Church this practice passed into the West. The very fact of a Greek name being used for it, and of the chief prayer used in these Litanies being expressed in Greek, "Kyrie eleison, Christe eleison," shows that it was of Eastern origin. It is interesting to trace it in this connection. It appeared at first, not in Rome, but in Gaul. There was a more intercourse between Gaul and Asia than in Rome; and in the south of Gaul, as early as the fifth century, under the guidance of one of the great pastors and organizers of that Church, Mamertus, Bishop of Vienne, we find these processions. The barbarians, laying waste the cultivated land, bringing desolation, famine, and pestilence. We were almost driven to despair, he said, this, calling it, not litany, but by equivalent. These were, he said, rogationes, and in order that there might be a standing memorial of that help which was solicited, the Rogation days were instituted. They have always been kept up since, as a memory of that time. Passing from Rome, we find both the name and the practice under Gregory the Great, the organization of government and of the worship of the Church. His was also a time of great suffering. The Empire was laid waste, and there was a great need of penitence and prayer. The city was divided into seven groups, the inhabitants of each went about with their crosses, singing "Kyrie eleison!" and at last all gathered together in the great litany. In the history of our own Church, we find an event more closely connected with the history of the same practice. When Augustine landed in Thanet to convert the Saxons, and Ethelbert allowed him, with his permission, to enter Canterbury, he reproduced the procession with which he had been familiar in Gaul, singing the Litany, looking on the city as under condemnation, and praying for its deliverance. We cannot wonder, if we look at the history of the dark ages, that it was not merely with the darkness of night, but with the gloom of misery—that should have become more and more conspicuous, that the minds of men turned to the Litany as a refuge and a help. The Council of Toledo, at the end of the seventh century, ordered them to be used every month.

The use of the Litany on Sundays passed into the Church of England. This was not that of a penitential service, but a progress there was also corruption. The Litany came full of invocations to human saints in consequence of the misery and ignorance of the times. Men who had their full trust in Christ turned to a martyr, or confessor whose name they loved, and whom they had reason to love. In the eighth and ninth centuries the "Sandwich ora pro nobis" came into use, and the same formula was addressed to the angels and saints. When we take the Litany as it was at the time of the Reformation, it was as much as it is now, but disfigured by superstitions and supplications. In the reign of Henry VIII. the Reformers thought these, first, then corruptions, and later idolatry, and progress was gradual, but the first step was that of translating it into es of supplications to saints was the principal ones were at first to the Virgin, one to the one to saints and martyrs. In book of 1549 these were omitted as much as it is now. It is, any part of the Prayer Book, a piece of Cranmer's Christian disrespecting what was old and rejecting new. [See PROCTER, comparing the Romish Litany and that of the of Cologne.] There are a very in which they differ—e.g. the Edward VI. [1st Book] has a st the Bishop of Rome and all [2nd Book, abominable] enormizabeth's Prayer Book detestable; but as she wished, if possible, the Romanists, that petition in 1559, and has never since. in the Septuagint it is used of the public ser- vice of God, of Divine worship of the cong-regation. In ecclesiastical phraseology it was originally restricted specially to the Eucharist, as being the highest of public offices; but has now obtained a wider signification, and is commonly applied to the whole form of public worship of the congregation. We shall consider the subject, therefore, under this twofold division.

It seems probable that some Liturgy was drawn up by the Apostles at the very beginn- ing of the Christian Church, for the use of the first converts to Christianity, who, as we read in the Acts of the Apostles, con- tinued steadfastly in the Apostle's doctrine, and in breaking of bread—i.e. in partaking of the Holy Communion—and in "the prayers." In that case this would be the original Liturgy from which the succeeding ones were derived. Hence in very ancient Liturgies the bulk of the service is identical, and the variations, comparatively speaking, unimportant. In order to classify the numer- ous Liturgies that have been used in different parts of the world, it will be well to divide them into five principal groups. These are connected with the names of Churches, and also with the names of certain Apostles, and they are as follows: [i.] The Liturgy of St. James, or Jerusalem; [ii.] The Liturgy of St. Mark, or Alexandria; [iii.] The Liturgy of St. Thaddeus, or the East; [iv.] The Liturgy of St. Peter, or Rome; [v.] The Liturgy of St. John, or Ephesus. The Jerusalem Liturgy consists of three divisions: the Clementine, Cæsarean, and Antiochene or Hierosolymitan Liturgies. From the Cæsar- ean Liturgy, which is connected with the name of St. Basil, came the Liturgy of St. Chrysostom and the Armenian.

The many branches which have sprung from these norms would require a volume to expound. There are no less than 43 exist- ing, all Monophysite, branching off from the Hierosolymitan.

The third group, consisting of Liturgies of the Far East, is smaller in number: most of them are Nestorian. That of Malabar or St. Thomas belongs to this group.

The fourth division consists of only one Liturgy; the Roman.

The fifth group, viz., those allied to the Liturgy of Ephesus, consists of two divisions [i.] The Mozarabic and [ii.] The Gallican.

It will be observed that four of the five groups are Eastern; and the remaining one, the Roman, Western. The principal distinctions between the Eastern and Western Liturgies are as follows:—The Invocation of the Holy Spirit before the words of consecration which is in the Eastern, is absent in the Western. There are Proper Prefaces and varying Collects, Epistles, and Gospels for Holy Days in the Western, and not in the Eastern, with the exception of the Liturgies derived from Ephesus. Later alterations in the Roman Mass, such as the denial of the cup to the laity, have farther increased the differences between that and the Eastern Liturgies.

Every ancient Liturgy consisted of two parts; the pro-anaphoral and the anaphoral. [ANAPHORA.] The first part consisted of a prayer; an introit; the prayer of little entrance—that is, the bringing in with much ceremony the Book of the Gospels; the triagion; the lessons (in some, prophecy, epistle and gospel; in others the last two only); a prayer. At this point the catechumens were dismissed from the church. Then followed a further prayer for the faithful; the great entrance—i.e., the carrying the elements to the altar; the offertory; the kiss of peace; the creed. This ended the first or pro-anaphoral portion of the service. The second, or anaphoral part, began with the Sursum Corda and preface; the canon, consisting of prayer commemorative of our Lord's life and of the institution of the Eucharist; the Oblation; prayer for descent of the Holy Ghost, for the consecration of the elements. Then follows intercession for quick and dead; the Lord's Prayer; the "Libera nos" or prayer against temptation; adoration, "Sancta sanctus" [SANCTA SANCTIS]; confession and absolution; the Communion, thanksgiving, and dismissal.

The best account of the ancient Liturgies, displaying their points of union and their variations, is Mr. Hammond's work, published by the Clarendon Press.

How the Communion Service of the Church of England is related to the ancient Liturgies has been fully considered in an article on the COMMUNION SERVICE. We have next to consider modern Protestant Liturgies. And, first, it must be noted that while the ancient Liturgies make the Lord's Supper the central object round which all other parts of the service are grouped, the Protestant idea is rather to group all round the sermon, as expressing the conviction that teaching is the main object of assembling together. The early Liturgies do not include any preaching, nor are there any forms for special occasions.

When the Reformation came, the great leaders, Luther, Calvin, Cranmer, recognised the usefulness of a form of prayer, and each country that accepted the Reformed doctrines provided its own Liturgy. Our own is considered under the head COMMON PRAYER [q.v.]. But the Continental Reformers left more opening for the exercise of free prayer, to be suited to special circumstances. So did the DIACONY [q.v.] of the Puritans at the time of the Great Rebellion. The bitter feeling which followed that event led to a breach so wide, that for a while liturgical services were eschewed by the non-Episcopal party, and extemporaneous prayers were substituted. Of late years, however, a more catholic feeling has prevailed. In the Presbyterian Church of Scotland since 1858 a change has gone on, and the Book of Common Order reached a fifth edition. Many Churches belonging to the chief Nonconformist sects accept the idea of some liturgical form used of free-will. Thus Mr Newman uses much of the Church Service; the Lord's Prayer and General Thanksgiving is becoming very common, and on the occasion of the Queen's jubilee many Reformed Churches in London used those given in the Prayer Book. The arguments for the two systems will be familiar to readers, one side pleading for the spontaneity and unrestrained impulses of the mind, the other for the long custom of Church, and also for the need of protection against form and words with which the people may not be in harmony. Needs of the individual soul must not be supplied by individual private prayer. The facts above given show that "the excellent way" of charity is doing more and will yet do more, for removing difficulties on this subject. It should, in conclusion, be pointed out that even the making of a Liturgy involves the essence of a liturgical since it is the acceptance for congregational use of already written words.

Liverpool. BISHOPRIC OF.—This only existed since 1880; it comprises the county of Lancashire, and has 187 benefices. At present it has no cathedral, but steps are being taken to provide one. Until 1880 Liverpool was a chapelry of the parish of Walton-on-the-Hill, but in that year it became a separate parish by Act of Parliament. It was at once resolved to erect a church, thenceforth the parish church of Liverpool. This was finished in 1704 and dedicated to St. Peter. And here the throne of the Bishop of Liverpool, John Charles Ryland, was set up. The church presents no object of interest. Funds do not allow of the formation of a regular cathedral body, regular cathedral service. There are archdeacons and twenty-three benefices. The income of the See is £2,000.

Livsey. [TERTIOTALLERS.]

Living.—In the Church of England an ecclesiastical benefice or pastoral charge. [BENEFICE.]

Livingston. JOHN HENRY, D.D., father of the Dutch Reformed Church in America, was born at Poughkeepsie, York, in 1746, studied at Yale College and in 1766 sailed for Utrecht to study theology. He became a D.D. in 1780 and on his return to America in the same year took his place as second preacher in the Reformed Dutch Church in New York. Revolution drove him from the city, and he visited many places, returning to New York in 1783. In 1810 he opened a theol-inary in New Brunswick, and was elected ident of Queen's (now Rutgers) College. died in 1825.

Livingston won the respect of both parties in the Church, and under his management a "Conference" and the Coetus were est. [Dutch Reformed Church]. He specially formed the constitution of the synod, and prepared its first psalm and its book. As a preacher he was much heard. His theological lectures, of which a tract was published in 1832, "still form basis of didactic and polemic instruction in the theological seminary of which he was founder and father."

Livingstone, David, the great African missionary and explorer, was born at Ayr, near Glasgow, in 1813. His parents were of the working class, of the best moral and Christian worth, and deeply interested in Christian missions. In 1831 David worked as a piecer in a cotton mill, attending a night school in the evening. At the age of nineteen he began to attend the medical and other classes in the law months at Glasgow, and in 1838 he received a surgeon's diploma. He applied to the London Missionary Society, and went to Chipping Ongar in Essex to continue his studies. In 1840 he met the Rev. Dr. Moffat, the celebrated missionary, who was on furlough in London, and at the end of the year accompanied him to Kuruman. He did not settle there, but was determined to carry the mission further north than had yet been done, and settled at Mabotsa, among the Bakwena tribe, where he had a remarkable escape from a lion. He next attached himself to the tribe of the Bakwains, whose chief, Mole, was converted and baptised. He remained with them till 1859, making many conversions and teaching them civilised arts, his wife having married Mary Moffat, eldest daughter of Dr. Moffat, in 1844—teaching the women to read. While here he made several excursions among the Boers, who had settled on the border of the Bechuana territory and were very hostile to Livingstone, and he had discovered Lake Ngami and the River Zouga.

Several of the Bakwains had now learnt to read, and promising to send missionaries to the rest, Livingstone decided to move northwards. He set out, accompanied by two Englishmen, and after many difficulties reached the river Chobo, met the great chief Sebituane, who received him very cordially, but died a few days after his arrival. Livingstone's great object was to make a way for Sebituane's people to be connected with the sea. They were friendly to him, and to put them in communication with the world would be to further the great cause of civilisation. He determined therefore to devote himself to this object, and, having shipped his wife and children for England, he set off on his quest. After a great many difficulties, he reached Quilimane in 1856, having made many important discoveries, the chief being the healthy tableland in Central Africa. He then paid a visit to England, where he wrote and published his first work, Missionary Travels. It was received with intense interest, for it poured a flood of light upon a land hitherto quite unknown. Having severed himself from the London Missionary Society, he was appointed commander of an expedition sent by Government to explore the Zambesi River. This was rendered more than usually difficult by the conduct of the Portuguese slave-traders, but it was signalised by the discovery of the Lake Nyassa and much important territory. Livingstone rightly deeming this to be the key of Central Africa, an Universities' Mission from Oxford and Cambridge was planted there; but it failed, chiefly through the death of its bishop and of Mrs. Livingstone. Nevertheless Livingstone remained some time longer to further explore the country, but at last saw it was desirable to return to write a book against the Portuguese traders, and to obtain means to establish a colony at the head of the river Rovuma. He arrived in England in 1864, and stayed at Newstead Abbey, where he wrote Zambesi and its Tributaries. Though determined still to make the preaching of Christ to the natives and the promoting lawful commerce instead of the slave trade his chief object, he agreed to explore Central Africa, to endeavour to discover the sources of the Nile. During his journeys he discovered Lakes Moero and Bangweolo, and then was unheard of for some time, till, in 1871, Mr. Stanley discovered him, in great want and destitution, at Ujiji, on Lake Tanganyika. Stanley came to his relief, gave him supplies and better men, and Livingstone continued his journey, but fell ill and died in Ilala, on the banks of Lake Bangweolo, May 1st, 1873. He was found on his knees, his Bible in his hand. He was brought to England by his servants, and buried in Westminster Abbey, April, 1874. Since his death many missions have been formed in Africa, and David Livingstone has given a new impulse to the cause of African evangelisation and civilisation.

Liwin, St.—An Irish bishop of the seventh century. He placed himself under the discipline of St. Augustine, who was at that time converting England to Christianity. After Augustine's death St. Liwin went to Ireland, and was consecrated bishop there. Having a strong desire to carry on the work of evangelisation, he set sail for Brabant, where he suffered martyrdom after a short period of missionary work A.D. 656.

Llandaff, BISHOPRIC OF.—This claims to be one of the most ancient sees in England; its founders were St. Dubricius or Dyfryg, who had resigned the See for some time before his death in 612, and his successor St. Teilo, the date of whose death is unknown. The "Book of Llandaff," compiled about 1133, gives the names of many bishops between the time of Teilo and Urban, the first Norman bishop 1107, but it is not to be relied upon. Urban replaced the British church of Dubricius and Teilo by a cathedral of very small size; there is no record of the time when it was completed, nor indeed any certain records of its architectural history. The Lady Chapel was probably built by William de Bruce [1266-1287]. The Perpendicular tower on the north is simple and massive; it was built by Jasper Tudor, uncle to Henry VII., and replaces an Early English one. About the middle of the sixteenth century the cathedral was allowed to fall into decay under Bishop Kitchin, alias Dunstan, who alienated many of the lands belonging to the See, and disposed of others on long leases—for instance, the episcopal residence was leased for 99 years. Bishop Godwin [1601-1617] speaks of Kitchin as "Fundi nostri calamitas." [For the works of this Bishop see GODWIN, FRANCIS.] The cathedral was in a state of absolute ruin in 1575. In 1721 a great part of the ruins, which were roofless, were blown down in a storm, and at length an appeal was made to the country for help. Accordingly the Lady Chapel was repaired sufficiently to carry on the service, but the nave was left open to the sky till the restoration was begun in 1857.

About 1836 it was seriously proposed to unite Llandaff with Bristol, but it was saved from this, and under Bishops Coplestone and Ollivant a new era began. In 1840 and 1843 two important Acts were passed, which resuscitated the dean's office, which had been done away with, and under its first three deans, Bruce-Knight, Conybeare, and Williams, the restoration was completed. The eastern portion of the cathedral was opened for service in 1857, and for the first time since 1691 choral service was heard in Llandaff Cathedral. The nave and remainder of the restoration was completed by July, 1869. Practically the bishopric and its cathedral and cathedral body are alike new. No bishop had resided there for 300 years, and for about six centuries there had been no dean; the chapter was merely a nominal one. Bishop Ollivant gave a vivid description of the state of the cathedral at his enthronement in 1850, in his charge of 1869.

The cathedral stands on low ground, near the river Taff (hence its name Llan-daff, the church by the Taff). The cathedral body consists of a dean, two archdeacons, four canons residentiary, two minor canons, and five prebendaries. The diocese comprises the best parts of Glamorganshire and Monmouthshire, and contains 227 benefices.

The income of the See is now £4,200.

Lloyd, WILLIAM [b. 1627, d. 1717], graduated at Oxford, and became Fellow of Jesus College. After various other appointments he became successively Bishop of St. Asaph [1680], of Lichfield and Coventry [1692], and of Worcester [1699]. Bishop Lloyd is famous as being one of the seven bishops who refused to read the Declaration of Indulgence of King James II. ordered in 1688. They were sent to the Tower for sedition, but acquitted. Lloyd was the author of many pamphlets, the chief being An Historical Account of Church Government as it was in Great Britain and Ireland when they first received the Christian Religion.

Local Preachers in the Methodist Church are laymen who are licensed to preach by the district and quarterly congregations. They are the opposite of "travelling preachers." They must have a regular pastoral charge. After four years' service they become "local deacons," and four years after "local elders." This formal and wholesale adoption of lay ministry is in many respects the very groundwork of the Methodist system [METHODISM.] By far the large number of the regular or travelling preachers have first served an acceptable probation as local preachers, in which their capacities are fully ascertained. But, besides this, without the noble army of local preachers, drawn from the people themselves, the work could not possibly be done.

in fact Methodism is in one aspect most impressive example in the enormous results accomplished by a desale, and official adoption of lay the pulpit and otherwise.

Theologici.—The sources from theological arguments are drawn. Locke gave this name to his view of dogmatics in distinction to the of the Schoolmen. It was retained by the Schoolmen to the middle of the seventeenth century.

By the Roman Church the name became famous by the celebrated work of Melchior Comenius [1623, d. 1660], Bishop of the Canaries, who discussed the use to be made by the Church of Scripture, Councils, philosophy, etc. It forms a scientific introduction to Theology.

JOHN, an English philosopher [1632-1704], was born at Wrington, near Bristol, the son of a captain in the Parliamentary army. Locke was educated at Westminster and Christ Church, Oxford, and was proficient in classical literature; but he gave chief attention to the works of Descartes, which he preferred to Aristotle. In 1664 he went to Berlin to study under Sir W. Swan, the British ambassador; but after a year he returned to England, where he made the acquaintance of Anthony Ashley Cooper, afterwards Earl of Shaftesbury, who lived in his house, and when, in 1672, Cooper was made Lord Chancellor, Locke was appointed Secretary of Presentations, but he exchanged for that of Secretary of the Treasury when Shaftesbury received the Great Seal. In 1675 Locke visited France for his health, became acquainted with the Earl of Pembroke, to whom he was dedicated. In 1679 he was recalled to England by the Earl of Shaftesbury, who had been restored to favour, but six months later he was again disgraced, and after a brief imprisonment in the Tower, fled to France in 1682 to avoid a prosecution for treason. Locke followed him, and so escaped the hostility of the Court as to be completely erased by royal mandate from the list of students of Christ Church. He remained in France till the search for him was abandoned. In 1687 he completed his Essay on the Understanding, and next year published his first letter on Toleration, and obtained the situation of Commissioner of the Customs with a salary of £200 a year. In 1690 his Essay was published, and in the same year appeared his second letter on Toleration, and two treatises on Government. Finding that the London air did not agree with him, he retired to the house of Sir Francis Masham at Oates, in Essex, where he spent the remainder of his life. In 1692 appeared the third letter on Toleration, and soon after his Thoughts on Education. In 1695 King William appointed him a Commissioner of Trade and Plantations, which he had to resign on account of his health. He gave himself up to the study of the Scriptures, and wrote several theological works, Discourse on Miracles, etc., which were published after his death.

The influence of Locke upon English moral and religious thought has been very great. Though, as we have said, he was a student of Descartes, his method is different at the very foundation. The former assumes innate ideas as the centre of all knowledge. The overthrow of innate ideas is the starting point of Locke. He has been called the philosopher of sensation, for he tries to trace all notions, opinions, judgments to their beginning; starts from the first acts of a child, and so contemplates the impressions made on the senses, rather than the objects with which the senses converse. But such a method did not bring these objects any more clearly before the understanding than they were before; he did not get beyond human ideas of them; his nearest approach to the root of all faith and knowledge is to tabulate all that men are able to think about them. His business is with the "Human Understanding," and so he repudiates the search into Being and first principles. It may therefore be doubted whether he did not really lower the principles of morality. For, instead of holding up righteousness and justice as absolutely good, he threw aside these ethical principles, and proclaimed "Things are good or evil only in reference to pleasure or pain." He did not apply such sentiments unworthily in his own personal character, for they were necessary parts of his philosophy, and practically he modified, or, we may say, relinquished it in favour of Christian belief in absolute righteousness. In fact, he raised questions which he did not settle, but which inaugurated a new era of study. The questions which he asked but did not answer, respecting the Nature of the Mind, the Principles of Government, Toleration, Education, the Reasonableness of the Christian Religion, were taken up in the eighteenth century and discussed in the gossip of salons, with pens, with bludgeons, with swords—with tears also and prayers. Not only his contemporaries, who were his pupils, Shaftesbury and Bolingbroke, but English moralists for fifty years more, regarded him as having laid down principles which could never again be called in question. But this acquiescence came to be rudely shaken. The Methodist movement was a sign that his theory of "paternal governments," with the decrees of which the masses of the people should acquiesce, would not stand; that poor as well as educated men needed real belief, and not mere acceptance. And men with his theory of Toleration on their lips, were not hindered by it from very intolerant acts towards these disturbers of slothful calmness. Yet it was largely owing to Locke's teaching that England was spared from the terrible agony which came on France at the Revolution. Deism, and even Atheism, appeared here even earlier than in France. But in France the Jansenists were suppressed and the Protestants expelled by Louis XIV. In England the cause of God was not snatched out of His hands as though He were unable to take care of Himself. The preaching of Wesley was one cause of our deliverance, for he taught thousands of the people to fear God; and Locke's teaching on Toleration was certainly another.

Lockers.—In ancient English churches these are cavities hollowed out of the substance of the wall, sometimes on the north side of the altar. They are usually square, and have no basin at the bottom. They had formerly small doors, and contained the cruets of wine and water, the towels, and other things needed in celebrating mass.

Logos.—This Greek word, derived from the perf. of lego, "to speak," means literally "a word," and is used in that sense in Matt. viii. 8—16, etc. In 1 John iii. 18 it is opposed to deed and truth. Other meanings are Commands or Precepts [Matt. vii. 24], Prophecies [Luke iii. 4, John ii. 22], Promises [Rom. ix. 6, Heb. vii. 28], Threats [Heb. iv. 12], Arguments [Acts ii. 40], Reports or Rumours [Matt. xxviii. 15]. In a higher sense it is used for the word of God, whether expressed by the Law or in the Gospel [Matt. xiii. 19, etc., etc.]. In a heathen sense it was used constantly for the Reason, but it is only used once in that sense in the New Testament, and then it is by a heathen speaker [Acts xviii. 14]. But the highest theological sense which the word bears is that in which it is applied to the second Person of the Holy Trinity. The word is traceable to PHILO [q.v.], the Alexandrian Jew, whose speculations aimed at reconciling the teaching of Plato with that of the Jewish prophets. He saw that there was One Who was spoken of in the Old Testament under the name of "the Word and the Voice of God," and that He was the Revealer of God's attributes and will to mankind. The Personality of this Logos became more and more distinct in the later writings of the Old Testament. Philo, therefore, identified this existence with Plato's doctrine of the Divine Nous, or "Mind," though he hesitated to assert a distinct Personality. His doctrine was taken up by the Christian Alexandrians, and the Gnostics adopted it in a confused and tentative manner. In consequence some cried out that they were endangering the doctrine of the Unity of God; the Jewish sects of Gnostics replied that the Christ was a demigod or superior angel, half human, half divine. Then St. John taught how the teaching of the past was in union with the Gospel, how the Word was in the beginning with God and was God, was the Light of men, shining in darkness and not absorbed by it; and in the fulness of time was made Flesh—a distinct Personality, very God, yet not the less very man. It was for this that St. John was named the Theologos, translated in our authorised version "the Divine" [i.e. Theologian]. The teaching thus set forth became the basis of the teaching of the great Alexandrian divines. Justin Martyr, first of Patristic philosophers, dwells earnestly upon the prehistoric Logos, the Divine Reason, spoken of not only by prophets, but by wise heathen such as Socrates, distinct from the God Whom Man knew, yet not separable from Him. This doctrine was the essential doctrine which united the Church together until it was formulated in the phrases of the Nicene Creed [HOMOOUSION.]

Logothete [Gr. "an accountant"]—An officer in the Greek Church who is intendant of the Patriarch's household. The logothete ecclesiasticus was a kind of inspector-general of the Church, corresponding to an episcopal chancellor in the Western Church.

Lollards.—The followers of WYCLIFFE [q.v.]. The name, which probably means "idle babbler," was given to them by their enemies. Others explain it as coming from the same root as "Lullaby," from their fondness for singing. Wycliffe had sent out preachers and gained many followers, chiefly at Oxford University. He had been supported by the Lancastrians; but the Peasants' Revolt, under Wat Tyler, in 1381, brought about a great change in men's feelings. The reaction against all projects of social reform produced an equal dislike to religious reform. He began to be looked upon as a "sower of strife," and his followers as missionaries of Socialism. This feeling rose to its height when Wycliffe formally denied the doctrines of Transubstantiation. The University of Oxford at once condemned him, and he, finding it useless to look any longer to the wealthier classes, turned to the people, and a few years later his followers abounded everywhere. In 1382 Archbishop Courtenay summoned a meeting at Hereford to condemn his doctrines. Nicholas Herford, one of the Lollards, had asserted them in a sermon at Oxford, and was already in prison, but the Chancellor appointed John Repyngdon, another Wycliffite. The Archbishop was supported by the Crown, and a royal writ was issued in Oxford, proclaiming banishment of all Lollards, with the destruction of their books, on pain of forfeiture of the University's privileges. It had its effect, and Herford and Repyngdon submitted. After the death of Wycliffe, Lollardism crumbled into a general

It penetrated into all classes its own schools, books, pamphlets, in its hatred of tyranny, Lollard. But out of the mass bore the name of Lollardism — namely, faith in the sole Bible as the source of revelation. This stirred up the Church the result of persecution was men were raised into fanatics, and by their preaching against opposition of the Lollards was a lament, attacking the Church, its views. They violently decried the clergy, and condemned the superfluous revenues of the King might maintain 15 knights, and 6,000 squires, besides hospitals for the relief of the poor. Arundel, who succeeded, was eager to put down the Lollards. He drew up a set of opinions in his writings, on the strength of which, "De heretico comburendo" [COMBURENDO], was inserted in the year, declaring them to be heretics. Under it John Badby was burned, his did not crush them. On the Earl of Salisbury, Sir John [?] stood forth as the leader of the opposition. At the accession of Henry V. he gained him over, and when this was discovered, and thirty-seven

The final statute against the Lollards, ordering all justices to execute heretics, and hand them over to secular courts. In spite of repression the movement lived on, and in 1431 we find Gloucester endeavouring to suppress the movement, and the circulation of books against the clergy. At the death of Edward VI. the legal prohibitions were rescinded.

It took deeper root in Bohemia and Ireland. It was carried there by those who fled when Courtenay first

PETER, one of the most famous Lollards [q.v.], was born at Novarra, early in the twelfth century. He travelled to Bologna and Rheims with the aid of Clairvaux, and then went to Paris, where he was a pupil of Abelard. He was a distinguished teacher of theology. In 1159 was appointed Bishop of Exeter. He says that he was the first who held the office of Doctor of Theology in the University of Paris. He died at Paris in 1164.

He is generally called Magister Sententiarum, or Master of Sentences, from his great work, The Four Books of Sentences. This work is an arranged collection of sentences from Augustine, Anselm, Abelard, and others, on points of Christian doctrine, with objections and replies also collected from authors of repute. The first book treats of God; the second of created things; the third of the incarnation, redemption, and the virtues of human character; and the fourth of eschatological subjects and the sacraments. Two other works, A Commentary of the Psalms, and Commentaries upon All the Pauline Epistles, have been published under his name, and are regarded as genuine.

London, BISHOPRIC OF.—The first Bishop of London was Mellitus [604], one of the companions of St. Augustine. Ethelbert, King of Kent, founded and endowed for this diocese a church which he dedicated to St. Paul, on the site, it is supposed, of a Roman temple dedicated to Diana. Of the details of this church we are ignorant; it was destroyed after the Norman Conquest by fire, somewhere about 1087 or 1088. St. ERKENWALD [q.v.], who was bishop in 675, is said to have greatly adorned the church. Maurice, who became bishop in 1086, at once began to rebuild his cathedral, and his successor, Richard de Beaumes, devoted the whole of the revenues of the See to that purpose. After the forty years which the episcopate of these two prelates embraced, it was still unfinished, and in 1136 it was greatly injured by another fire; at last, however, it was completed, but in the thirteenth century the central tower was rebuilt, and the whole of the choir, which was finished by 1240. The Cathedral of St. Paul was one of the finest in England. Its plan was cruciform; its length was 596 feet. The nave was a fine Norman building, not unlike that of Gloucester; the transepts and choir were rich examples of the Decorated style. The choir, as at Canterbury, was raised on a crypt, the vaulting of which was above the ground level; part of this, after 1256, was dedicated to St. Faith, and used as a parish church, the church of that name having been destroyed to enlarge the cathedral. A wall and gates surrounded the building, and at the north-east angle stood the famous Paul's Cross, where the most learned and eloquent preachers of the day delivered their sermons. Thus the cathedral remained till the fifteenth century, when in 1444 the steeple was struck by lightning, and so injured that it took eighteen years to repair it. In 1561 it was again struck, and this time set on fire and the roofs burnt. For a time it was subject to all kinds of desecration; then a partial repair was effected, but it still had a ruinous appearance till the restoration of it was committed to Inigo Jones by James during the episcopacy of Laud. Then, in 1666, the great fire of London broke out, and reduced it to a heap of ruins. These were not long suffered to remain untouched; Dr. Christopher Wren was appointed one of the "Commissioners for the reparation of St. Paul's," and after much debate, seeing it was useless to attempt restoration, it was decided, in 1670, to clear away the foundations of the old cathedral and build a new one. Wren made a design at the request of Dean Sancroft; it is described as "in the best style of Greek and Roman architecture;" a model of it was made, which may be seen in the South Kensington Museum. The design was approved by the King, but Wren had power to make any alterations he wished—a permission he availed himself of so largely that the present cathedral has little resemblance to the original design. On the first of May, 1674, Wren began the work of clearing away the old foundations, but it was not till more than a year after that the first stone was laid. The present building is shorter than the original one by ninety-six feet. The choir was opened for Divine service on the Thanksgiving day for the peace of Ryswick, December 2nd, 1697, and the dome was completed in 1710, in the time of Bishop Compton. Since then much has been done in the way of decoration, but the fabric remains as the great architect left it. Till 1796 no monuments were allowed to be erected within its walls, but since then they have become very numerous. The Sovereigns of England have never had St. Paul's as their burial-place.

There have been many notable bishops of London, a short notice of whom will be found under their separate names.

The cathedral body consists of the dean, two archdeacons, four canons residentiary, eight minor canons, and thirty prebendaries. There is a bishop suffragan of Bedford, who presides over East London.

The diocese of London now consists of—

1. The city of London.
2. The city of Westminster.
3. All other parts of the county of Middlesex, except a portion of Stanwell civil parish, now included in the parish of Colnbrook.
4. Part of Herts, viz., a district now included within the parish of Northwood.

The diocese is divided into the two archdeaconries of London and Middlesex, which are subdivided into twenty-five rural deaneries. Either as parishes or ecclesiastical districts, there are between 500 and 600 distinct ministerial charges. The number of beneficed clergymen—i.e. rectors, vicars, incumbents of new vicarages, perpetual curates, and ministers of ecclesiastical districts—is 492. The number of unbeneficed clergymen, consisting of ministers of chapels of ease, of proprietary chapels, of temporary churches, lecturers, stipendiary curates, chaplains of workhouses, prisons, asylums, hospitals, cemeteries, etc., is 771.

The income of the See is £10,000.

Longinus.—There is an ancient legend—which, however, is rejected by Tillemont and other critical historians—that the centurion who exclaimed "Truly this man was the Son of God," when he saw the signs that attended the Crucifixion, and the soldier who pierced Christ's side, were the same man, and that his name was Longinus. The legend goes on to add that he had been suffering from weakness of sight, but the blood which flowed from the wound fell on his eyes, and he was restored. This miracle led to his conversion; he forsook his military career, associated with the Apostles, and went to live at Caesarea of

The distinction between the Jewish Sabbath and the Christian Lord's Day was at first jealously maintained, and though the Saturday was generally regarded, as we might naturally expect, remembering the Jewish origin of Christianity, as a day of peculiar solemnity, those who so observed it were careful to defend themselves against the charge of Judaising. Gradually, however, the observance of the Lord's Day came to be grounded on the fourth Commandment, and Sunday was kept with an austerity unknown even to the Sabbath. In the history of the observance of the Lord's Day in England

an epoch is marked by the reproclamation by Charles I. of the Book of Sports, first issued by James I. During the Commonwealth it is needless to say that strictness and austerity were in the ascendant, while at the Restoration the sanctity of the day was almost put out of sight. Considerable difference of opinion exists at the present time among those who agree in regarding it as the special day of the week for public worship and religious exercises, as well as a rest from the ordinary occupations of business and trade.
While some deprecate attention being given to any other subjects than those of worship and devotion, others think that it is compatible with due reverence to God and attention to the needs of the soul to endeavour to enlarge and instruct the intellectual powers of the mind, and provide healthful recreation for the body, believing that, if opportunities for the latter are provided, and have the sanction of religiously inclined persons, not only will the day be less desecrated by drunkenness and purposeless lounging on the part of those who have no regard for the claims of worship, but its religious associations will in time appeal with success to a larger and ever increasing number. With this object they advocate the opening, during the latter hours of the Sunday, of museums, art collections, picture galleries, concert rooms in which sacred music may be performed, horticultural gardens, etc.

Lord's Prayer.—The prayer taught by our Lord to His disciples in answer to the request preferred by one of them,
"Lord, teach us to pray, as John also taught his disciples." Put before them under these circumstances, and prefaced by the words
"When ye pray, say," it does not admit of doubt that our Divine Master intended that this prayer should find place in the devotional exercises of His disciples. And this was the universal practice of the early Church. It was not taught to candidates for baptism till a few days before their admission to that Sacrament, for it was held that none but those who were made sons of God by regeneration had a title to address God in its opening words, "Our Father." But among the baptised there was no prayer more often used or highly esteemed. It was called the prayer of the believers (oratio fidelium), as being their birthright. It was the oratio quotidiana, the daily prayer. It followed the prayer of consecration in the Office of the Holy Communion. Its use was enjoined in private devotions. An examination of the Prayer Book of the Anglican Church reveals that no Office is deemed complete without this prayer. Alterations in the structure and arrangement of the various services have here and there caused its recital to be made more than once on the same occasion of public worship, but it will be found that each separate Office contains it at least once.

But, while in answer to the request of His disciples, our Lord taught this prayer as a prayer to be offered by them, He also set it forth in the Sermon on the Mount as a model or pattern to which the supplications of Christians should conform, avoiding alike the vain repetitions of the Gentiles and the sanctimonious effusions of the Pharisees: "After this manner therefore pray ye." The characteristics of the model are that out of seven petitions three, and those the first three, relate to God—and of the four relating to man one only concerns his body—while through the whole, by the use of the plural, intercession for all sorts and conditions of men is combined with personal supplication.

Lord's Supper.—This name is chosen by the Church of England in her Liturgy as the principal name for the highest act of her worship. Other names, considered in their respective places, are the EUCHARIST, the COMMUNION, the MASS (Roman Catholic), the Sacred MYSTERIES, the LITURGY. The name "Lord's Supper" is directly from the Bible, being used by St. Paul in 1 Cor. xi. The controversies of the Christian Church on the subject of the Lord's Supper are greater than on any other question. On them, more than on any other point that could be named, the divisions of Christendom have turned. The Roman Catholic view is that, by a miraculous change, the bread and wine of the Sacrament are transubstantiated into the Body and Blood of Christ. [TRANSUBSTANTIATION.] The Lutheran view, insisting on the literal interpretation of the words, "This is my body," holds that the Body and Blood are supernaturally united with the Bread and Wine by the special powers of Christ. [CONSUBSTANTIATION.] The Reformed view, as it is called, is that of Zwinglius, and declares that the words "this is" are equivalent to "this represents," an opinion which is defended by those who hold it by the adduction of other passages, in which undoubtedly our Lord spoke figuratively, e.g. "I am the door," "I am the true vine."

It forms no part of our duty to argue out these views, but it is a happier work to quote the learned and wise Hooker in his endeavour to show Christian men, not where they differ, but where they agree. "Some did ext fear, lest Zwinglius and Ecce could bring it to pass that men should of this Sacrament but only as of a destitute, empty and void of Christ seeing that by opening the several which have been held, they are brought I can see, on all sides at the least a general agreement concerning the alone is material, namely the real presence of Christ, and of life in his body by means of this Sacrament; whereas the world continue still distracted with so manifold contentions, where remaineth now no controversy, save about the subject where Christ is! In this point, no side denieth but that of man is the receptacle of Christ's; whereby the question is yet driven narrower issue, nor doth anything result but this, whether when the Sacrament is administered, Christ be whole with only, or else his body and blood externally seated in the very con elements themselves, which opinion I defend are driven either to consubstantiate incorporate Christ with elements sac or to transubstantiate and change stance into His; and so the one to really but invisibly moulded up substance of those elements, the other him under the only visible show of wine, the substance whereof, as they is abolished, and is succeeded in its room. All things considered and with that success which truth hath had by so bitter conflicts with error, point, shall I wish that men would themselves to meditate with silence have by the Sacrament, and less to of the manner how. If any man say this were too great stupidity and do us see whether the Apostles of our Lord selves have not done the like. It is by many examples that they of this disposition were very scrupulous and itive, yet in other cases of less in and less difficulty, apt to move. How cometh it to pass that so few so high a mystery being uttered, they with gladness the gift of Christ, and show of doubt or scruple? The reason is not dark to them which have any all observed how the powers of the went to stir, when that which we long for presenteth itself above all expectation. Curious and intricate tions do not hinder, they abate, they such inflamed notions of delight as divine graces use to raise when dinarily they are present. The man fore, feeling present joy is always un unwilling to admit any other cogitation in that case casteth off those disputes unto the intellectual part at which easily draweth."

to [properly Loreto].—A city a few miles north of Ancona, in Italy, chiefly famous for containing the Santa Casa, or Holy House, the sanctuary of the Blessed Virgin Mary. Commonly believed by the inhabitants of Roman Catholicism to have been the house in which the Virgin lived at Nazareth, and the place of the Annunciation of our Lord's birth. It is built of a dark reddish stone and has one door and one window, about 31 by 13 feet. The house gives access to the Church of the Santa Casa, in which it stands, encased in white marble and sculptured with designs from the history. The famous image of our Lady of Loretto stands at the eastern end of the church. The legend concerning the Santa Casa is that when the Holy Land was taken from the Infidels the house was miraculously transported to the hill of Tersatto, near Fiume, on the night of May 10th, 1291. In the year, 1294, it was again removed, and carried to Recanati; thence it was carried to a spot far from that where it now stands, and deposited in a piece of ground belonging to the brothers, who quarrelled as to the location of it. It was therefore brought to its present site in December, 1295, and received the name of [Domus Lauretana] from the name of the lady to whom the land belonged. The Virgin afterwards appeared to a shepherd of Recanati, and declared to him that it was indeed her house; he related it to the people, and the Santa Casa was soon thronged with pilgrims, who have ever since flocked to it.

NUMS, JOHN, a Jesuit, b. at Avignon, 1616. He was a scholar of divinity, and the author of Commentaries on Numbers, Deuteronomy, the Psalms, Ecclesiastes, the Wisdom of Solomon, the Acts of the Apostles, and several Epistles.

1.—The custom of foretelling events from signs of previously understood signs was without Divine sanction in the time of the Apostles. Even the Apostles cast lots to fill up the gap in the Apostolate. In the early Church the practice continued, though it was discouraged on account of the superstition which it was in the way of fostering. A favourite plan was to open the Psalms or the Gospels, the passage lighted upon being taken as a message from Heaven. And a variation on this was to go into church and listen for the words of a Psalm which was being sung at the time of entrance. A celebrated passage in the history of St. Augustine tells how, when he was in great distress of mind, he seemed to hear a voice which said to him "Tolle, lege," "take up and read," and he resolved to open the Scriptures and rest his case on the first passage that he lighted on, and so found the passage which led to his conversion. At a subsequent period he expressed his disapproval of this plan of "sortes." But from time to time all through the ages the practice has found persons to practise it. It was used by the Puritans, and Swift takes occasion to ridicule them. By lot the Bohemians, when no way seemed open to them of carrying on the reformation of the visible Church, chose new bishops [BOHEMIA], and it is still practised among the Moravians.

LOUIS IX., or SAINT LOUIS [b. 1215, d. 1270], King of France, succeeded his father, Louis VIII., in 1226. He was born at Poissy. His mother was Blanche, daughter of Alfonso IX., King of Castile. She was regent during his minority, and herself undertook the education of the young Prince, whom she trained in great piety of heart, which afterwards regulated his actions when he was old enough to govern his people. He married Margaret of Provence in 1234, and made his Court a model of domestic simplicity and Christian life. When he came of age in 1236 he continued to his mother a share in the administration of the government; he applied himself diligently to reform the abuses of the State and the evils occasioned by the gross licentiousness of the clergy. He became involved in a war with Henry III. of England, who was assisting Hugh, Count of Marche, in a revolt against Louis, but he defeated him in 1242. Soon after this the King fell dangerously ill at Pontoise, and during his sickness he made a vow that on his recovery he would lead another crusade for the liberation of Palestine from the Mohammedans. The Queen-dowager vainly attempted to dissuade him from the enterprise; she only prevailed on him to delay till he had made the preparations most likely to ensure success. Three years were spent in doing this, and at last, having appointed his mother regent, and received the Papal benediction, he sailed from Aiguemortes, on the coast of Languedoc, August 25th, 1248, and landed at Cyprus, where he passed the winter awaiting the rest of his forces. He left Cyprus in May, 1249, for Egypt, justly believing that the conquest of that country was necessary to open the way to Palestine. He laid siege to Damietta, whose inhabitants surrendered almost without resistance. Louis then crossed the Nile and gained two battles over the Infidels. Robert, Earl of Artois, his brother, was killed in his inconsiderate pursuit of the enemy, February 8th, 1259. Malek Saleh Najmoddin, the Sultan of Egypt, was besieging the city of Emessa, when he heard of the fall of Damietta. He hastily turned towards Egypt, but died on the way, and was succeeded by his son Saleh Moadam, who came and surrounded the Crusaders at Mansurah with a great army, stopping all passages by which provisions could reach the Christians, who were thus reduced by famine and scurvy to a most deplorable condition, and soon after the whole army was defeated, and the King and his two brothers taken prisoners, April 5th, 1250. Louis was obliged to give up Damietta, and pay 800,000 double ducats of gold for his own and his men's ransom. In May, 1250, he embarked with the remains of his army (6,000 men) for Acre, where he was received with great joy. He took Tyre and Cesarea, and fortified the towns belonging to the Christians in the Holy Land; but hearing of the death of his mother he returned to France in 1254, after a five years' absence. He then spent his time in diligent government and reform of his kingdom. For some years he had been secretly preparing for a new crusade, and had obtained from Henry III. of England a promise of a powerful auxiliary force under the command of Prince Edward. Having arranged for the government of the country in his absence, and made his last will, he embarked once more, July 1st, 1270, and landed at Sardinia, from whence he made his way to Africa, took Carthage without much opposition, and laid siege to Tunis; but here he fell a victim to the plague, and died August 25th, 1270, being at his own request laid on a bed of ashes. His remains were buried in the Abbey of St. Denis. He was canonised by Pope Boniface VIII. in 1297.

Lourdes.—A place situated in the Pyrenees, which has become celebrated in the Roman Catholic Church for a so-called appearance of the Blessed Virgin. The story told is that, in 1858, a little untaught shepherdess named Bernadette Soubirons, aged fourteen, the daughter of a poor miller of Lourdes, was gathering firewood on the banks of the Gave, close to the grotto of Massabielle, when she heard a sound of rushing wind, and saw a beautiful lady in white, with a blue girdle round her waist, standing in the niche, with her feet resting on a wild rose-bush, and smiling at her. Her sisters, who were with her, saw nothing. On Sunday, February 14th, Bernadette went again to the grotto with many of her companions, and again saw the vision, and was told by the lady to come every day for a fortnight. The story of the vision spread far and wide, and on the third day of the fortnight 1,000 persons assembled at Massabielle. Bernadette seemed as one entranced, unheeding all that passed, while she gazed at the apparition. The civic authorities interfered to put an end to the thing, and the child was taken before the police and forbidden to go to the grotto; her parents also forbade her, and for a few days she obeyed, but was irresistibly drawn to the place; and then, after the lady had told the child some secret, she bade her go to the priest and say that she desired to have a chapel built there to her. When charged by the priest with inventing the vision, she affirmed unwaveringly that it was as she had said, and delivered her message. On the next occasion she was commanded to mount on her knees to the end of the grotto, a steep ascent of fifty feet, crying out the word "Penance" three times, while she prayed for sinners, and then to wash in the fountain. There was no sign of water, but on Bernadette's scooping out the earth with her hands a stream of water trickled out and flowed down in a narrow thread to the river. On March 25th Bernadette asked the lady to tell her who she was, and she replied, "I am the Immaculate Conception," and disappeared. On July 16th, the Feast of Our Lady of Carmel, she appeared to the child for the last time. Before this, the grotto had been closed by the civic authorities; but some months after pilgrims were allowed to come there for their devotions. Bernadette was once more arrested, but released, and educated by the nuns, and in 1867, when twenty-four years old, entered the convent of Nevers. She always adhered to having seen these visions, and now a church has been built over the grotto, and a figure of the Virgin, made after the description of Bernadette, placed in it. Many miraculous cures are said to have been wrought by the waters which still flow from the rock. The Bishop of the diocese, in a pastoral says, "We pronounce that Mary the Immaculate, Mother of God, did really appear to Bernadette Soubirons, on February 11th, 1858, and on subsequent days, to the number of eighteen times, in the grotto of Massabielle, near the city of Lourdes; that this apparition possesses all the characters of truth, and that the faithful are justified in believing it with certainty."

Love-Feasts or Agape.—In Apostolic times it was the custom for all the Christians in a place to meet together, probably on the first day of the week, for a common meal. It was probably not current when St. Paul wrote his first Epistle to the Corinthians, but it must have arisen soon after, and spread through the Eastern and Western Churches. St. Chrysostom is of opinion that when the practice of having all things in common ceased, this arose to take its place. It was, in fact, a meal provided by the rich to feed the poor. The materials that composed the meal were certainly bread and wine, and probably also meat, poultry, cheese, milk, honey, and fish. It is not known for certain whether the Communion was administered before or after the meal, but it is generally thought that the feast came first, in imitation of our Lord's institution. Then epistles from their bishops and from other Churches were read, collections were made for the poor, and the salutation or "kiss of love" was given.

At first the feasts were very simple, but afterwards, especially at Alexandria, they became sumptuous banquets, and from Clement's protest, secular music seems to have used instead of psalms and hymns. As the Christians began to have special things set apart for worship, they felt it profanation to sit down to a meal in . Also in the Third Council of Carthage it was ordained that the Eucharist should be received fasting, and the time of its celebration was changed to the morning. All these resulted in the extermination of the love-feasts. An attempt was made to re-establish them by connecting them with the commemoration of the death of martyrs, and Augustine mentions that his mother Monica used to do this. Ambrose supported them in Northern Italy, and traces of them are to be found in the practice, prohibited by the Council of Trullo [692], of bringing honey, milk, and joints of meats, etc., to the altar, that the priest might bless them before they were eaten. So-called "love-feasts" are practised by both Methodists and Moravians, but though apparently founded upon the agape of the primitive Church, they differ from them in essential respects. They will be described in accounts of those bodies.

Low Church.—A term applied in the sixteenth century to those who desired to bring the Church into harmony with the views of the Nonconformists, identified at first with the LATITUDINARIANS [q.v.].

Underlying all controversies between High, Middle, and Broad Church, is the question, What is the Church? We will endeavour to distinguish the views which have been held by various parties, first setting forth the elements which they would all agree to accept.

First, then, there is an invisible or spiritual Church, comprising those who love Lord Jesus Christ, and desire to have fellowship with Him. There is also a visible or material Church; it is a necessity to have a church which can be seen as well as what is invisible—a demonstration of the Spirit, as well as of power. But the connection of the two, and again their relation to the State, brings us to a second point of view. The Low Churchman regards the visible Church as a variable accident—the creature of circumstances and expediency.

His opinion is a protest against ritualism and idolatry. The High Churchman pronounces the Church essentially visible, as having a definitive form, not, indeed, invariably but permanently identical, and involved in its original structure. His protest is directed against individual variation, against licence and infidelity. By each of these notions of Church and State has been, at different periods favoured and opposed. The Low Churchman takes for his watchword

Protestantism, the High Churchman Ritualism. The tendency of the former is to individualise, of the latter to generalise, and thus to lose truth. The one realises the faith in Christ as a subjective act, the other substantiates it as an objective reality. The first deals with men, the other with man. With the one grace is a particular, with the other a universal, boon; one asserts the other limits, the right of private judgment. The Gospel comes to the first through the medium of Scripture, by the second it is found in the living body of the Church: the one sets forth the Word, the other the Sacraments; the one urges the necessity of a spiritual, the other of a fixed and outward service.

But meanwhile there are those who maintain that the two principles we have stated are ideally correlative, and ought to unite in every Christian person; that when this interdependence is destroyed, and they are put forward separately, each becomes exaggerated, disguised, and distorted. But far from cohering in the same subject, they are actually at war with each other, so that whatever be the outward occasion of feud in the Christian body, the real opposition is between those who would have every man stand out as an individual, and those who would merge all individuality in a common union. This struggle has always been carried on more or less energetically in the Christian Church; of course it implies imperfection, but it has been made, under Providence, the means of preserving a healthy balance. In the first three centuries the two forces are to be distinguished in Christian literature, keeping each other in check. Then the "Catholic" view prevailed for many ages, not without indications that the antagonistic principle, though in subjection, was not extinct; at the Reformation the latter reasserted its power. Since that era the two principles have struggled with varying success. It is sometimes asserted that the "Low Church" view is that of the Reformers; but the assertion cannot be accepted without qualification. The life and death struggle in which the English people engaged against Roman usurpation, naturally forced the Reformers to bring forward earnestly the freedom of the conscience and the responsibility of the individual. But it is no less true that men like Ridley and even Cranmer were also alive to the necessity of preserving the historical continuity of the Church, and the English Liturgy is a proof how eager the Reformers were to preserve the doctrine of primitive times, and the forms and rites which had become hallowed by the use of ages.

The Low Church party in the first days of the Reformed Church of England were represented by such men as TRAVERS, CARTWRIGHT, JEWEL, and ARCHBISHOP GRINDAL [q.v.]. Its second period was the Latitudinarian movement in the days of Whig ascendancy. The Church was re-established, Episcopacy was accepted as a fact; but it was sought to remove certain phrases and ceremonies from the Prayer Book, and to unite broken parties in a scheme of comprehension. But this period saw a marked change in Low Church theology. Hitherto it had been Calvinistic; it was now assertive of Universal Redemption, from which none was excluded save by his own free will. But in the relaxation of the old dogmatism, it became somewhat lax, and may be fairly represented by saying that it declared no truth absolute, but allowed liberty of interpretation, and made conscience the ultimate arbiter. The best exponent of this phase of Low Church divinity was Tillotson, and its danger was the watering down of the Church formularies till Arianism obtained a foothold within the Church. Samuel Clarke, and, still more, Hoadley, were decidedly Arian in their tendencies. The preaching of Wesley was a new departure, and the Evangelicalism which was the result of his preaching was the new phase which the Low Church movement assumed. [EVANGELICALISM.] With the decline of that movement, the Protestant party in the Church took a fresh line. The Low Churchman of the present day is not he who preaches justification by faith only, or the paramount authority of the Scriptures, but rather the assertor of the freedom of the conscience and the non-essential character of Church ordinances.

Low Mass, in the Roman Church, is one performed by a single priest with a server.

Low Sunday.—The first Sunday after Easter, or, as it is commonly called, the Octave of Easter. The derivation of the word "Low" is doubtful, but probably the writer of the following letter [Guardian, April 16th, 1884] has hit upon the correct theory:—

"The usual derivation of the name Low Sunday has always seemed to me a very unlikely one, and I venture to suggest another. It is generally said that the services of the Sunday seem 'low' in distinction with Easter Day. But as the services on the octave should as nearly as possible equal the services of the day itself, this derivation would scarce commend itself if there had been another at hand.

"In Gaul and England the Sunday in the octave of Easter was called 'Clausum Paschæ' (cf. Gallian Liturgies, Neale and Forbes, p. 108), and this was used commonly as a date in Gaul and England both in Latin and in French. Thus, St. Gregory of Tours, speaking of children who had been baptised at Easter, writes:—'Nullus ad Clausum pertingere potuit vivens' (De Gloria Confess. 48). The first Westminster statute of Edward I. is dated, 'Faites a Westm. lendemain de la cluse de Pascha' (Magna Charta, Ed. I., 1529, fo. 21). Again, in a MS. in the British Museum (Bibl. Har., 1761, fo. 120) we have the date, 'Inquisitio capta . . . die lunæ post Clausum Paschæ, anno Regis Henrici quinti, post conquestum sexto.' Du Cange cites from a Charter, 'Le jour des Closes Pasques.' These quotations will show that the phrase was not uncommon, to say the least.

"I would suggest that 'Low Sunday' is a corruption of 'Close Sunday.'

"The sibilant at the end of Close would easily disappear in common use before the S of Sunday. The hard C has always a tendency to disappear, especially before a liquid. Lacrima becomes lirma, Sacramentum, serment, and before Clodovicus becomes Louis, Chlotharius becomes Lothaire. There is, therefore good ground for thinking that the name Close Sunday would soon, in place, become 'Low Sunday.'

Lowder, CHARLES FUGE, M.A. markable mission priest of the Ritual in the Church of England [b. 1820. After serving as a curate in the England for eight years, he became St. Barnabas', Pimlico, in 1851, of first churches of the Ritualistic 1856 he undertook a mission to St. in-the-East, and worked among the population with wonderful zeal. was fiercely opposed, not only by the Protestant party who were opposed to ritual, but by the keepers of many other bad houses, who found their interference with. Once an attempt to throw him over the dock bridge Mission Chapel was mobbed. He did ever, lose heart, and in 1866 a mission which he had founded (St. Peter's Docks) was consecrated by Bishop of London. twenty-four years Lowder worked the rough and long untended mission population, and gradually so won his brave unselfishness, and by his gentleness, that before his end came of those who would once have killed themselves have died for him. He was familiarly as "Father Lowder," a day long walking about among the cassock, sometimes leading processions with cross and banners through the slum streets, hymns and preaching in the street. there are few places in England where the Church is stronger than in the neighbourhood where Lowder lived. Though a Ritualist, he never yielded allegiance to Papal claims, but was a firm believer in the Catholicity of the English Church. abroad for a short holiday, he died in Tyrol. His body was brought to London and buried at Chiselhurst, and many people, including many children, came from St. Peter's to his funeral, them walking the whole way.

Lowth, ROBERT, a writer on Evidences of Christianity, and successively bishop of the sees of London, Durham, and Winchester, was the son of William Lowth Buriton, in Hampshire, and was born at Winchester, Nov. 27th, 1710. He was educated at Winchester School, whence, with distinction both as a scholar and poet, he entered New College, Oxford, in 1730. He received his M.A. degree in 1737, and four years later was appointed Professor of Poetry. Hoadley was a kind patron to him, and on him successively the living of the rectory of East Woodhay. He received from the University of Oxford the degree of D.D. in 1754, became Bishop of Durham and Rector of Sedburgh, and a Fellow of the Royal Society.

gen in 1765, Bishop of St. David's Oxford a few months later, and in 1777. King George III. offered him the bishopric of Canterbury in 1783, which he declined. He died in 1787.

Loy's greatest works are his Liam of Wykeham, his Lectures on the Hebrews, and the Translation of Isaiah. The lectures on Hebrew were delivered by him at Oxford when he was professor of poetry. They opened up a new subject, as little attention had been paid to the fact that a great number of books of the Old Testament are now being received with great interest only in England, but also on the continent where they were reprinted by the same press. They were published in French in which language they had been written but Dr. Gregory brought out an edition in 1787. The translation of the prophet Isaiah is of great value in showing the errors of the Authorised Version, and giving how thoroughly literary and poetical a section of Hebrew poetry which is now so much neglected.

IGNATIUS [Inigo Lopez de Re-Founder of the Society of Jesus, one of the most considered men in Spain, and was born at the town of Loyola, in Biscay, in 1491. He grew up as a page in the Court of Ferdinand and Isabella, and took to the arms under the auspices of his uncle, the Duke of Najara. He acquired the reputation of a man of honour and worth, and the regularities of his life were looked upon as gallantries, inseparable from his profession. He lived in full pursuit of pleasures till he was thirty years of age. In the year [1521] Pampeluna, the capital of Navarre, then in the hands of the French, was besieged by the French, and with others, was posted at the castle. One of his legs was fractured by a cannon ball, and the other injured by a stone; and it was found necessary to move him to Loyola. The anguish of the necessary operations was so great that it produced a violent fever. He despaired of, and on the eve of St. Michael's Day he received the last sacrament. The next day the fever left him, attributed to the intercession of the Virgin Mary. But this did not yet turn his heart to religion. His leg had been badly set, and a deformity, so he had it rebroken. To soothe the tedium of his confinement he read all the romances that came to hand, and when they were exhausted he brought him any books which they could find, and amongst them he got The Life of St. George and The Lives of the Saints. His heart was so corrupted that it was some time before he could read them, but having no other entertainment he continued to read them, until they wrought in him a complete conversion. The glories of St. Francis and St. Dominic inspired him with a desire of treading in their steps, and he resolved, as a penance, to begin his new life by travelling as a pilgrim to the Holy Land. Accordingly, he went to the celebrated monastery of Montserrat in Catalonia, where, having made full confession of his sins, he hung up his armour over the altar of the Virgin Mary, and assumed the dress of a beggar. On the Feast of the Annunciation, 1522, Ignatius left Montserrat barefooted, and went to Manresa, in Barcelona, where he lived about a year among the poor in St. Lucy's hospital, practising all sorts of austerities and mortifications, and here it was that he wrote his book of Spiritual Exercises. While at Manresa his zeal and devotion attracted so much attention that he feared the praise of men might tempt him back to the world, so he hid himself in a cave under a desert mountain, and practised such austerities that he was found senseless at the mouth of the cave, and carried back to the hospital. More severe trials were in store for him. As soon as he recovered his health he lost his peace of mind; he had no satisfaction in his prayers nor comfort in his mortifications, his soul was racked with scruples and harassed with imaginary sins. The Dominicans of Manresa, moved with compassion for his miserable condition, took him into their house and tended him till he recovered from his mental depression.

From Manresa he went to Barcelona, and set sail in pursuance of his pilgrimage to the Holy Land; he reached Cajeta in five days, and then travelled on foot to Rome, where he arrived on Palm Sunday, 1523. After Easter, having received the Papal benediction from Adrian VI., he went to Venice, where he embarked in July, 1523, and arrived at Joppa on the last day of August, and four days later reached Jerusalem. Here he remained till January, 1524, and then returned by way of Venice to Barcelona, encountering many dangers on the way. Here he began to study Latin under Jerome Ardebal, and then proceeded to Alcalá, where the oddity of his dress and his mendicant way of living, and the instruction he gave to those who crowded about him, caused his arrest, and he was put into the hands of the Inquisitors at Toledo, who found him quite orthodox, and referred him to the Grand Vicar of Alcalá for further trial. He was forbidden to explain the mysteries of religion till he had studied divinity for four years. He then retired to Salamanca, where he continued his discourses on Devotion; here he was again imprisoned and released on no better conditions than those of Alcalá. He then resolved to go to Paris to prosecute his studies, but he was so poor that he had to beg in the streets for his living, and afterwards put himself into the hospital of St. James. He then removed to that of St. Barbara. Here he had many discouragements, but pursued his course of philosophy and divinity. From this time dates the foundation of the Society of Jesus. [JESUITS.] The first person to join this new order was Le Fevre, then Francis Xavier, and then four Spaniards, James Lainez (afterwards General of the Society, who attended in that capacity at the Council of Trent), Alphonse Salmeron, Nicholas Bobadilla, and Simon Rodriguez. They all vowed in the Church of Montmartre, outside the gates of Paris, either to go on a pilgrimage to Jerusalem, or to throw themselves at the Pope's feet and ask him to make use of them how and where he pleased. Loyola returned to Spain, 1535, where he declaimed against libertinism, and preached repentance to vast crowds. He then, in 1537, went to Venice, where he made the acquaintance of John Peter Caraffa, afterwards Pope Paul IV. The pilgrimage to Jerusalem could not be carried out, so, leaving the others to proselytise in the universities of Italy, Ignatius, accompanied by Le Fevre and Lainez, went to Rome and offered their services to Pope Paul III. This was at the close of 1537. The Pope accepted their proffered service, and placed Lainez and Le Fevre in the College of the Sapienza, where the former taught scholastic divinity and the latter expounded the Scriptures, while Ignatius gave public instructions. At length he considered the time had come to establish his disciples in a regular body, and they all arrived in Rome a little before Easter, 1538. He had some difficulty in getting the Papal sanction to a new Order, but at length obtained it, and it was confirmed by a Bull dated September 27th, 1540. Ignatius became the first Superior on Easter Day, 1541; his disciples were then dispersed into various parts of Christendom to spread the new Order, and he remained at Rome working for the conversion of the Jews and others. He had the satisfaction of seeing his Order grow and flourish in many countries. He died July 31st, 1556. He was buried in a church at Rome; but in 1597 his relics were removed to the celebrated Jesuit Church of which Cardinal Farnese had laid the stone in 1568. Ignatius was beatified in 1609 by Paul VI., and canonised by Gregory XV. in 1622. His festival is kept by Roman Catholics on July 31st, the same day as that of St. Germain.

Lucian, a famous satirist [about A.D. 120–200], was a native of Samosata in Syria. He was brought up as a sculptor, but abandoned this profession and wandered about Greece, Italy, and Gaul, teaching rhetoric until he was about forty years old, when he returned to his native country and became a writer. One account of him states that he was an apostate from Christianity, but it is not probable. He knew much about Christianity, no doubt, but he was a man of sharp wit, of railing spirit, and without depth of feeling. He wrote a satire against the Christian Church which the Council of Trent placed on the Index of the work of a fiend. It is, however, contemptuous rather than written in fierce hostility. Lucian seems to have regarded Christians not as criminals, but as foolish enthusiasts—just in the spirit, in fact, in which careless and ungodly men view religious earnestness to this day.

Lucian, Sr.—St. Lucian was born of heathen parents. He was from his early youth devoted to study, and loved to live in retirement. On the death of his parents he gave away all his fortune to the poor, and determined to live quietly by himself. We have no account of his conversion to Christianity, but at this time we hear of him gently studying the Bible. He was a great Hebrew scholar, and was therefore able to correct any errors that had sprung up by careless translation. At the time of the persecution begun by Diocletian, Lucian was at Antioch. He was soon made prisoner and taken to Nicomedia, where he was kept in confinement nine years. He employed his time in writing letters to his flock at Antioch. When Maximin succeeded Diocletian as Emperor of the East, persecution raged more fiercely than ever. Maximin tried first to make Lucian give up his faith by speaking kindly and persuasively to him. Finding that this mode of treatment made no impression, he had recourse to more severe means, and ordered that he should suffer all sorts of torture. He still remained firm, even when made to sleep naked on pieces of broken earthenware, and when he fasted for days without food. When food was brought him, it was meat that had been offered as a sacrifice to idols, and Lucian therefore refused to touch it. He was taken to prison again for a few days, and was martyred in the year 316. The manner of his death is uncertain, but his body was afterwards thrown into the sea in order to prevent the possibility of his followers making relics of their master.

Luciferians.—The followers of Lucifer, who was Bishop of Cagliari, in Sardinia, in the fourth century. He was one of the great upholders of the Nicene Creed, and died opposed to Arius. When Athanasius was condemned at the Council of Arles in 335, Lucifer and others went to Rome to petition for an impartial judgment, but the Council of Milan confirmed the condemnation, and Lucifer was banished. He remained in exile until the death of the Emperor Constantius in 337, but on his return, not agreeing with Eusebius and others, who decided to forgive and readmit those bishops who had not openly sided with Arius, but had only yielded to the pressure of Constantius, Lucifer left the

with his followers. They were few ber, and though causing considerable for a time, disappeared in about half ry. The schism found its way into Antioch, Spain, and Egypt, and a of the sect was ordained for Rome.

Lullards.—A sect which arose in Antwerp, so called from the funeral dirges which they sang when following the remains of any of their number to the grave. They were also called Alexians, from their patron saint Alexius, and Cellites, from the cells in which they lived.

Lulli, RAYMUND [b. 1236, d. 1315], called
"the enlightened doctor." He was born at Palma, in the island of Majorca. Until the age of 30 he lived wholly in the world, and occupied the post of Seneschal in the Court of the King of Arragon. He led a sensual life and wrote much amorous poetry. He says that on several occasions while writing lovesonnets, the image of Christ on the cross appeared to him, and after many mental struggles he became convinced that it was God's will that he should forsake the world and consecrate himself to the service of Christ.
He sold all his property and divided it among the poor. He then resolved to devote himself to the work of preaching the Gospel to the Mohammedans. In pursuance of this object he began to study theology and philosophy, and, purchasing a Mohammedan slave, he made him his instructor in Arabic.
He employed himself in tracing the leading outlines of a universal formal science, and wrote his Ars major, or generalis, designed as the preparatory work to a strictly scientific demonstration of all the truths of Christianity, which were to be so clearly proven that every reasonable mind would be forced to admit their truth. This work was afterwards known as the "Lullian method," and was a kind of mechanical aid to the mind in acquiring and retaining knowledge. He translated this book into Arabic; this was about nine years after his conversion. In 1275 he prevailed on James, King of Arragon, to found a monastery in the island of Majorca, where thirteen Franciscan monks were to be taught Arabic, with a view to becoming missionaries to the Mohammedans. In 1286 he went to Rome to persuade Pope Honorius IV. to approve his plan of establishing such missionary schools in all the monasteries; but this Pope died before Lulli arrived there, and, getting very little encouragement from his successor for a plan of united effort in this mission, he resolved to proceed alone. In 1291 he embarked at Genoa and reached Tunis, and calling together the learned among the Mohammedans, made a comparison between Christianity and Mohammedanism, declaring himself ready to embrace their religion if they could find stronger reasons for it than for his own.
They crowded around him in the hope of converting him; but one of them, more fanatical than the rest, directed the attention of the King to the danger threatening the Mohammedan faith by Raymund's zeal in making converts, and he was thrown into prison and sentenced to death, but was saved by the intercession of one of the learned men, and the sentence was changed to one of banishment. He then went to Naples, where he delivered lectures on his new system, and next to Rome; but meeting with no help there, he returned to his native island, Majorca, and worked for the conversion of the Mohammedans and Jews. Next he visited Cyprus, and then Armenia, striving to bring back the schismatics of the Eastern Church to orthodoxy. In 1306 and 1307 he again went to Africa, and visited Bugia; a tumult arose and he was thrown into a dungeon, where he remained a close prisoner for six months. Meanwhile many attempts were made to convert him to Moslemism, and the highest honours and great riches were promised him if he would change his religion. He was again banished, and took ship and landed at Pisa, after being shipwrecked; he was received with great honour, and here he continued his literary labours with unremitting zeal. He tried to found in Pisa and Genoa a new order of spiritual knights who should be ready at a moment's notice to go to war with the Mohammedans for the recovery of the Holy Sepulchre, but he got no help in this from the Pope. Then he went to Paris and attacked the principles of the philosophy of Averroës, which he hoped to crush at the Council of Vienne, held in 1311. He wrote a new book for this purpose. He also, at this council, succeeded in effecting the establishment of professorships of Oriental languages in the universities. In 1314 he determined once more to go to Africa, and laboured secretly at Bugia for a time; but a longing for martyrdom made him stand forth publicly, and this so exasperated his enemies that he was dragged out of the city and stoned to death, June 13th, 1315. [Neander's Church History, vol. vii., pp. 83-96.]

Lupus, St.—Bishop of Troyes in the fifth century. He was born at Toul, A.D. 383, and married Pimeniola, sister of St. Hilary, at Arles, from whom he separated after seven years, in order that both might devote themselves to the monastic life. St. Lupus retired to the monastery of Lerins, whence he was called to the bishopric of Troyes in 426. He was twice chosen by the Churches of France to accompany St. Germanus of Auxerre to Britain, on a mission against the Pelagians. In 453 the city of Troyes was attacked by the Huns, under Attila, but successfully defended under the command of the Bishop, who went out to meet the invader, and addressed him as the "Scourge of God, sent to punish the sins of the people." He died on July 20th, 479.

Luther, MARTIN [b. at Eisleben, in Saxony, Nov. 10th, 1483], was the eldest son of Hans Luther, a miner. His parents removed to Mansfeld soon after his birth, and here he was sent to school. The strict discipline which he endured both at home and at school seems to have had much effect upon his after-life and on his early ideas of religion. He was sent to Magdeburg at the age of fourteen, and afterwards to Eisenach, where he endured many hardships, and was often obliged to wander through the streets singing in order to gain a livelihood, till Ursula Cotta, a lady living at Eisenach, took pity upon him and received him into her household. In 1501 Luther became a student at the University of Erfurt, and devoted himself earnestly to the study of philosophy and the classics; while at the same time he was popular among his companions for his love of pleasure. Dissatisfied with this mode of life, he became an inmate of the Augustinian monastery, hoping that a life of mortification would bring him the peace which he desired. He was disappointed, and fell into a state of despondency, from which he was roused by Sturtevant, the Vicar-general of the Augustinians, who expounded to him the words "The just shall live by faith,"—a text on which Luther afterwards based all his teaching. In course of time he became Doctor of Theology, and Professor at the University of Wittenberg, in which place his fame attracted many students. Hitherto he had been a faithful member of the Church of Rome, though he saw and deeply regretted the abuses which had grown up in it; but in 1517 he was roused to indignation against the traffic in "indulgences," carried on by Leo X. for the purpose of raising money to build the Cathedral of St. Peter's at Rome. A Dominican monk named Tetzel brought the indulgences to Wittenberg, giving full pardon to all who would pay a certain sum. Luther was shocked by such proceedings, and preached against Tetzel's traffic; then he took a more decided step, and fastened to the door of the Castle Church at Wittenberg a document containing ninety-five theses against indulgences. He did not deny the Pope's power, but declared that pardon for sin was to be obtained from God only, and not by the payment of money. The sympathy shown by the people proved that the Papal authority was in danger, and after various attempts to conciliate Luther, the Pope issued a Bull of excommunication against him. Luther replied by burning the Bull publicly outside the gates of Wittenberg, and was accordingly summoned by the Emperor to appear before the Diet of Worms in March, 1521. A safe-conduct was granted him, and he set off for Worms without delay, only stopping on the way to preach in the towns through which he passed. On appearing before the Diet he was requested to retract what he had written, but refused, though he

Zwingli wished to do away with the ration of the Holy Communion, for that the faithful are spiritually fed t, and that the outward form is there-necessary. Luther was strongly op-such a doctrine, and they parted in but when each afterwards consented and brought sadness to the closing his life; he lost heart, too, in the r which he had laboured, from which expected much, and in which he

Eisleben, and Luther was summoned to make peace between them; but he was taken ill

Lutheran Church, THE, received its foundation in the Confession written by Martin Luther in 1530, and the whole system at the present day is governed by his teaching as set forth in his Confession of Faith, which is to this effect:—"I believe with my whole heart the chief article—in Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, three undivided Persons in one true God, Creator of heaven and earth and all things—which faith has up to this time been held by the Christian Church in all the world. I believe, as the Bible teaches us, that the middle Person of the Godhead, namely, the Son, has become Man, conceived by the Holy Ghost, born of the Virgin Mary, as clearly described by St.
Luke and foretold by the Prophets; and not that either Father or Holy Ghost have become man, as set forth by some heretics. Also that God the Son took upon Himself, not the body without the soul, but the soul also—that is, a fully perfect humanity, the promised Seed or Child of Abraham and David—that He was born the Son of Mary, in form and other ways very man, as I and all others are;
that through the operation of the Holy Ghost
He was born without sin; that the Virgin
Mary is the mother not only of the Man Christ, as taught by the Nestorians, but of the Son of God, as St. Luke says, 'The holy thing that shall be born of thee shall be called the Son of God,' the Lord Jesus Christ, the one natural Son of God and Mary, very God and very Man.

"Also I believe that this same Son of God and Mary has suffered for us poor sinners, was crucified, dead and buried, in order that He might, through His precious blood, save us from our sins, death, and the everlasting anger of God; that on the third day He rose again from the dead, ascended into heaven, and sitteth on the right hand of God the Father Almighty, Lord of all Lords, King of Kings, and of all creatures in heaven and earth and under the earth, of death and life, of sin and righteousness.

"I believe in the Holy Ghost, who proceedeth from the Father, and with Him and the Son is one living God; Who endows us with faith and other spiritual gifts, saves us from death and sin, and makes our conscience free. Then I know that as there is only one Gospel and one Christ, so there is only one Baptism, which, with the Gospel, is a Divine institution. Also I maintain and confess the Sacrament of the Altar, that there the Body and Blood of Christ are verily received by mouths in the bread and wine, although the priest who celebrates or those who receive it may be unworthy, or may otherwise misuse it, for it does not rest on the belief or unbelief of man, but on the word and ordinance of God. I make exception to those who alter the words of consecration, as some enemies of the Sacrament do at the present day; they receive merely bread and wine, for they have not the word and established ordinance of God, but the same altered and adapted according to their own ignorance. I believe that there is one holy Catholic Church on earth, composed of the Christians in all the world, the bride of Christ, the spiritual body of which He is the only Head. Where this Christianity is there is forgiveness of sins—i.e., a reign of mercy and the exercise of lawful indulgence. And outside such Christianity there can be no salvation nor forgiveness of sins, but everlasting death and condemnation, and although there may be much appearance of righteousness, and even good work done, this will be of no avail. Lastly, I believe in the resurrection of the dead at the last day, both of the righteous and wicked, when all will be judged according to their deserving—the righteous to live with Christ for ever, and the wicked to have their habitation with the devil and his angels. I do not agree with those who teach that the devil and his company shall at last come to salvation.” Luther then denies several doctrines taught by the Roman Catholic Church, such as the sale of indulgences, masses for the dead, Purgatory, the invocation of saints, extreme unction, etc. The fundamental doctrine on which the whole Church rests is that of justification by faith, proved by a righteous and upright life.

In the course of its existence the Lutheran Church has had formidable opponents to struggle against. It was inevitable, under the circumstances, that there should be divergence of opinion and consequent divisions. The abolition of obedience to the central power of the Papacy caused Luther to rely on the power of princes to preserve order. Melancthon had foreseen that there was here the danger of a tyranny as great as ever the Papacy had been. And this danger was even increased by reason of the number of petty princes. When peasants dared not even leave their village for a night without permission, nor fire a gun to scare the wolves that prowled by their doors, and when the authority to which they were thus tied and bound was liable to change its creed, and to expect subjects to change with it, great evils were to be anticipated. The Rhenish Palatinate underwent ten changes of creed in one century, and the bewildered peasantry could hardly be expected to retain much faith in any. It was impossible to have a united Protestant Church in a land broken into innumerable States. And the opposite views taken by Luther and Zwingli with respect to the Sacrament at once made a hopeless division. When Luther died three-fourths of Germany was Protestant, and his creed had been adopted in Scandinavia and Denmark. But the cause we have named prepared the way for a battle of dogmas in Germany almost without parallel in the history of religious controversy; and the result, as might have been foretold without hesitation, was a terrible falling off in morals. Antinomianism reigned triumphant. “Humanity,” said Luther himself, “is like a drunken peasant—he no more gets up one side of his horse than he falls off on the other.” The Thirty Years’ War broke out in 1618, and Lutherans preferred joining Catholics to helping Calvinists. When it was ended, lessons for good had no doubt been learned. There were those to whom the Gospel had been more than an intellectual exercise—even life itself—and they had kept alive that Faith which otherwise would have perished in controversy and verbal niceties. When it was over, bitter strifes about the Sacraments had ceased, and a dull orthodoxy had succeeded; vapid morality and pedantic dissertations. Spiritual life seemed dead. The names of Calixtus and Gerhardt stood out in that darkened time as men who laboured and prayed to unite all Christians in spirit, if not in doctrine. [SYNCRETISTS.] Another period of revival was that of the PIETISTS, the first most among whom was JACOB SPENNER (1695-1750). The Pietist movement began in Germany in 1674, and, like Methodism in England, sought to bring life out of death. Purity of life, charity, alms-deeds—these things were declared to be better than knowledge. Social prejudices broke down before it; the Bible, which had become so neglected that it was recorded that in the greatest book-fair in Germany not a single copy was to be found, became the peasant’s friend again, and missions to the heathen were organised. But, as usual, there came extravagances—strict regulations, frames of mind and change of emotions, interpretations of dreams, sortes of the Bible [Lottery] and manifestations of hysteria: those who played at cards or danced were excommunicated. Then came the inevitable reaction in the form of Rationalism. It was not hatred of the Christian religion, but of irrational emotionalism, which gave birth to it. The first Rationalists aimed at showing that reason confirmed Scripture. [LEIBNITZ, WOLF.] But the progress of the movement led to a further development of unbelief, and Germany suffered as much as any nation from the negations of the Sæculum infidele, as Coleridge called it in the eighteenth century. But a better time was at hand. The patriotism evoked by the tyranny of Napoleon and his warfare against the liberties and nationalities of Europe, had a deep influence upon the religious life of Germany. The theology of men like Bengel, Olshausen, Hengstenberg, furnished a new proof of the good which lay beneath the rationalistic search after Truth, when joined to reverence and to the fear of God. German Biblical criticism took the lead from that time

nity. It was this revival of which moved Friedrich Wilhelm to attempt the Union and Reformed Churches in meaning opinion was that it y making brotherly love the common ground of faith. clergy argued that Luther's ld good; that with two such ways of looking at the Holy ermanent union was possible.

Luther's idea was to retain as many of the outward forms and ceremonies to which the people had been accustomed in the Roman Catholic Church as he could consistently with his conscience, and since his time many things have been discarded by his followers as Romish which he did not consider so—notably the practice of kneeling in prayer. In every church there is one crucifix, if not more; the pastor makes the sign of the cross in pronouncing the blessing at the end of the service, and candles are always lighted for the Celebration, in some places all through the ordinary morning service. The hymns are sung to beautiful chorales, some of them very old, and, if well sung and well accompanied, the effect is very fine and impressive.

Lych-gate or "CORPSE-GATE" [A.-S. lic or lice, "a body"].—A churchyard gate covered with a roof, where the bearers sometimes paused and rested when bringing a corpse for interment. Lych-gates are to be found in some parts of England, but are very rare in Scotland.

Lychnoscope.—A narrow window near the ground, frequently found at the west end of the chancel, and sometimes in other parts of the church. It was so named because it was supposed to be used to watch the pasch light from without the church, but it is now generally supposed that lychnoscopes were confessionals.

Lyons, MARTYRS OF.—Early in the second century the Church of Asia Minor, under the direction of the venerable Polycarp, sent missionaries into Celtic Gaul. Pothinus and Irenæus were of this band, and they made Lyons the See of the province. Pothinus became Bishop, while Irenæus, being younger, was the most honoured Presbyter, of Lyons. Sanctus, a deacon under them, made his home at Vienne, near by. Through the labours of these devout men the number of Christians increased to such an extent as to attract the hostile attentions of the heathen; then arose the fifth persecution of the Church. The account of the Lyonese martyrs is supposed to have been written by Irenæus, as he survived this fierce persecution. The half-barbarous, semi-civilised inhabitants of Gaul first desired the Christians merely as contributors to the sports of the amphitheatre, for the bloodthirsty mob were not satisfied with the fights of wild beasts, nor even with the gladiatorial contests, but were ever clamouring for more excitement. The Christians were seized, brought to trial, mocked, scourged, and subjected to every indignity before being permitted to die. In the words of the narrator, "The devil himself went to and fro through the streets in the shape of a savage beast, and stirred popular excitement into ungovernable fury, so that the Christians were hooted at and pelted whenever seen." The sufferings of the martyrs are beyond description. They were torn, mangled, bound to red-hot iron chairs, tossed in nets by wild bulls, burned, bruised and distorted until their bodies were past recognition. Blandina, a female slave, received strength to endure more of these brutal atrocities than any other martyr. [BLANDINA.] The deacon of Vienne, Sanctus, also suffered excruciating torture, yet only one expression escaped his lips, "Christianus sum." Then the aged Bishop Pothinus, who had passed more than ninety years in God's service, was brought to the tribunal, tortured, insulted, and cast into prison, where the lamp of life, being nearly spent, was soon extinguished.

Lyte, HENRY FRANCIS, English hymn writer, was born at Kelso in 1793, and was educated at Trinity College, Dublin, where he distinguished himself by writing several prize poems. He was ordained to the curacy of Wrexford, and about four years after removed to Lymington, in Hampshire, where some of his hymns were written. His health was always weak, but he devoted himself to his parish duties and to his books. In 1823 he went to the living of Lower Brixham, in Devonshire, which he held till his death, in 1847. His hymns are chiefly taken from his books, Poems Chiefly Religious [1833], and The Spirit of the Psalms [1834]. The best known are "Far from my heavenly home," "Pleasant are Thy courts above"; "Praise, my soul, the King of Heaven"; and, the favourite of all, "Abide with me, fast falls the eventide": this was written on the day when he gave his last address to his parishioners before going to Nice to die.

Lyttleton, GEORGE, LORD, was born at his father's seat of Hagley, in Worcestershire, Jan. 17th, 1709. He was educated at Eton and Christ Church, Oxford, entered Parliament in 1730, became a Lord Commissioner of the Treasury in 1744, and Chancellor of the Exchequer in 1755. He went out of office at the dissolution of the Ministry in 1759, and his father being dead, was raised to the peerage as Baron Lyttleton of Frankley. From this time till his death, in 1773, he devoted himself chiefly to literature.

Lord Lyttleton's chief work is Observations on the Conversion and Apostleship of St. Paul. It is based upon the proposition that "the conversion and apostleship of St. Paul alone is of itself a demonstration sufficient to prove the truth of Christianity." He also wrote Dialogues of the Dead, History of Henry II., and an Account of a Journey in Wales. His poetry, though it has gained for him a place in Johnson's Lives of the Poets, is not above mediocrity.

M

Mabillon, JEAN [b. 1632, d. at 1707].—He was educated at the Col Rheims, and became a Benedictine monk in the Congregation of St. Maur, in the Abbey of Remigius, in 1654. His life was a course of study, the first result of which was an edition of the works of St. Bernard, published in 1666. Two years later appeared the first volume of the Acta Sanctorum St. Benedicti, with a learned preface explaining the doctrine and discipline of the institution extending over the first five centuries. Mabillon was employed by Louis XIV. in 1685 to travel in Italy, in order to make a collection of valuable books and manuscripts for the royal library, and on his return he published an account of his travels in his Museum Italicum. He had previously written a Latin dissertation defending the use of unleavened bread at the Holy Communion, and various other works, in which he maintains, contrary to the opinion of the Abbé de Rance, that a study is compatible with piety in the religious life. Two other journeys which he made with the same object as the first are described in the Iter Germanicum and Iter Burgundicum. Mabillon wrote many other controversial works, and was regarded by the scholars of his day as an authority on contested points of doctrine, which were often referred to him. He was made shortly before his death a member of the Academy of Inscriptions.

Macarians.—A sect of the Monks, so called from their leader, Macarius, of Antioch at the time of the Second Council of Constantinople [A.D. 680]. He defended his views at that Council, and the Monks of Antioch adopted his name.

Macarius, Bishop of Jerusalem. Theodoret and others praise him highly for his piety and for the great zeal which he showed both in the defence of the Church and in the propagation of the faith. Arius wrote a letter to Eusebius of Nicomedia, in which he mentions Macarius of Jerusalem as one of the opponents. During his episcopate St. Helena, as it is said, discovered the cross [the INVENTION OF], and in 326 Constantine commissioned him to erect a basilica over the site of the Holy Sepulchre.

Macarius of Alexandria, a hermit, was a priest in the fifth century and is said to have had about 5,000 monks under his tuition in the Nitrian desert. The details of his life, and his sufferings by the persecutors, made him famous. He is said to be the author of the Rules of the Monks, in 30 chapters.

Mac, JOHN DAVID, D.C.L. [b. 1788, principal of Magdalen Hall, Oxford, of Arabic. Author of a Diatessaron, which was a standard work in the Unitarian years, and of other works on composition.

Macarius, the reputed founder of the sect of heretics, was raised to the Constantinople, A.D. 342, by the opposition to Paul, whom the party had canonically elected. A schism was caused in the city by the rivalry of the rival bishops, and a party was sent by Constantius to restore the excited mob set fire to the houses, the commander, dragged him and killed him. The rivalry lasted for years during which time Paul and his followers were in alternate possession of the city. In A.D. 351 it was terminated by the death of Paul in Armenia. Freed from persecution, the Macedonians began to act with great violence against all who opposed him, fining, branding, and even putting to death. The emperor's displeasure, aroused by these proceedings, was increased by his refusal of permission, the body of the Great from the church where he was buried to a newer one. The Macedonians caused serious riots in the city, and he was deprived of his bishopric on account of his misconduct. He then joined the Arians and gave his name to a new sect which sprang out of these, though his foundation is uncertain. He died in 379. The Macedonians allowed the divinity of the Son, but denied that of the Holy Ghost. They were not agreed among themselves whether the Holy Ghost proceeded from the Father or an influence. The spread of Arianism led to the meeting of the council at Constantinople, A.D. 381, at which he was condemned, and the Nicene Creed brought to its present form by the addition of the clauses following "I believe in the Holy Ghost" (except the "Filioque").

Mal, St., or St. MALO, was preached in Wales early in the sixth century. He was first preached at first in Cornwall (then part of Wales) to the Britons who had been driven thither by the Saxons; he then went to Brittany, and preached to his converts who were pagans, and became the first bishop of the diocese, about 541. He laboured long and hard, and, as it seemed, in vain; so he retired and went to live as a hermit in a cave, spending his time in prayer. His disciples besought him, after a while, that he should return, but he refused, saying he could do more by prayer than by his presence. He died on Nov. 15th, which is his festival. The See of Alet was transferred to St. Malo, which was so named in Mackenzie, CHARLES FREDERICK [b. 1825, d. 1862], accompanied Bishop Colenso to Natal in 1855, and in 1861 was consecrated as a missionary bishop under the Universities Mission. [LIVINGSTONE.] But he died next year of fever, and the mission came to an end. Nevertheless, his great zeal and piety will always cause his name to be held in honour in the history of missionary enterprise.

Macknight, JAMES, D.D., an eminent Scotch divine, was born at Irvine, in Argyleshire, in 1721. He studied at Glasgow University, and finished his education at Leyden. In 1753 he became pastor of Maybole, in Ayrshire. Here he remained for sixteen years, when he removed to Jedburgh, and in 1771 to Edinburgh, where he died in 1800.

Dr. Macknight was a superior scholar, an energetic minister, and a good writer, but not a very attractive preacher. His principal works were A Harmony of the Gospels, which has passed through many editions; The Truth of the Gospel History, and A New Translation of the Apostolic Epistles.

Macleod, NORMAN, D.D., a famous Scotch preacher and writer, was born at Campbellton, Argyllshire, June 3rd, 1812, the son of a Scottish minister, and descended from an ancient Highland family, of which, at the time of Norman's birth, his grandfather, the minister of Morven, was the chief representative. In 1823 his father was translated to the church of St. Columba, Glasgow, and Norman entered Glasgow College in 1825, proceeding two years later to the University. At neither period did he make much mark in scholarship, and he spoke in after-life with self-reproach of his want of industry during his college days; but he spent much time in varied reading, and studied especially the poetry of Shakespeare, Coleridge, and Wordsworth. In 1831 he entered the University of Edinburgh, in order to study theology under Chalmers, and afterwards spent three years in the family of Mr. Preston, of Moreby, Yorkshire, as tutor to his son, travelling with them on the Continent, and staying for some time at Weimar. At the close of this period he received his licence as a minister, and took charge of Loudon, in Ayrshire, where he remained for five years, giving himself up heartily to the care of the agricultural population. In 1852 he was removed to Dalkeith, in the centre of a colliery district, and surrounded on all sides by poverty and misery. His powers of organisation in parish ministry, his eloquence in preaching, and his power of sympathy with the feelings of all his parishioners, and especially the poor, were brought prominently forward upon his appointment to the parish of the Barony, Glasgow, in 1851. This charge involved the care of eighty-seven thousand people, and Dr. Macleod worked with untiring zeal and energy. He started services exclusively for working people, in order to attract those whose poverty made them ashamed to come to church with those richer than themselves; and any time he could spare from parochial work was devoted to the editing of Good Words. Macleod also took part in many works in the cause of the Scottish Church. He was one of a deputation which visited the Scottish churches in Canada in 1845, and he went to India in 1868 in his capacity of Chairman to the Committee of Foreign Missions. A complimentary dinner given to him at Willis's Rooms on the eve of his departure for India was a very remarkable scene, owing to the great number of eminent persons of all schools of thought who attended it. He was much admired and esteemed by the Queen, and was her Chaplain in Ordinary for Scotland, besides which he held the appointments of Dean of the Thistle and Dean of the Chapel Royal. In 1869 he was unanimously elected to be Moderator of the General Assembly, a post for which he was eminently fitted. He died at Glasgow, June 3rd, 1872. His literary work comprises some beautiful short stories, and an account of his family and early boyhood, entitled Reminiscences of a Highland Parish. His published Sermons shew a very deep spirituality.

Macrina, St., was one of a family which has produced many saints, and Peter of Sebaste, Basil the Great, and St. Gregory of Nyssa were her younger brothers. She was born about 327, at Neocæsarea, in Pontus. She was named Macrina after her maternal grandmother (who brought up St. Basil, and is commemorated on Jan. 14th), and received the second name of Thecla after the virgin martyr. She was carefully educated by her mother Emmelia, and was taught to study diligently the sacred writings, especially the books of Solomon and the Psalms, for which she retained a preference all her life. As she grew older her great beauty and large fortune brought her many suitors, out of whom her father chose one, a young advocate, to whom she was affianced. He immediately began to study earnestly, in order to make himself more worthy of her, and had already established a reputation for himself when he died. Macrina took the resolution of remaining a virgin, declaring that her betrothed husband was still living, and that there was only a short journey between them, which would soon be accomplished. From that time she continued to live with her mother, whom she aided in the administration of the estates and with counsel, and when Emmelia had provided for all her children, the mother and daughter retired to one of their estates near Iborra, in Pontus, where they built two monasteries, one for men and one for women. Macrina governed the latter, and St. Basil was the first Superior of the former.

His brother Peter who succeeded him charge, owed his whole education to who fulfilled her task with wisdom, application.

Macrina's monastery was at first with a small number of her own friends domestics, who were afterwards joined several others, and became a flourishing community. The discipline strict and regular, and the whole society on an exact equality. After Emmelia Macrina disposed of the remaining part of her estate to the poor, and lived on the rest of her hands. Her brother Basil died at the beginning of 379, and about eleven years afterwards she was taken with her last illness. St. Gregory, who had been absent in foreign country for some years, driven away by the violence of the heretics, came to visit her, knowing of her illness. A very interesting account is given of the interview. Macrina was in great distress from the loss of her brother, but Macrina spoke so earnestly of the state of the soul, and the life of the future, that the Bishop on his return recorded it in a treatise On the Soul and Resurrection. Macrina died, it is said, in December, but is commemorated on the 22nd.

Magee, WILLIAM, D.D., Archdeacon of Dublin, born in County Fermanagh, died in Dublin, 1831. He was born in 1790, became Dean of Cork in 1814, Bishop of Raphoe in 1819, Archbishop of Dublin in 1822. His noted work, called Dissertations on the Scriptural Doctrine of Atonement and Sacrifice, puts forth a theory of substitution which was at that time a standard doctrine among what were called "orthodox Christians," so much so that a few years since few divines of the Church would have thought of questioning this acquiescence must at present be somewhat modified. Mahomet, Mahometanism.—Neither Greek nor Roman Paganism obtained more sway over the minds of the desert tribes than the military power of those nations acquired over their bodies, and it was among these that the greatest of all opponents of Christianity arose. The Arabians preserved a tolerably accurate tradition of their existence as a free nation from the day of Abraham and Ishmael; and their religion appears to have been derived from a period as remote, for it was a compound of the ancient Sabæan religion and of the patriarchal religion, of which we seem to have a new founder in Abraham himself. The Sabæan religion consisted at first in the worship of the "host of heaven," the sun, moon, and stars, without the use of idols; but afterwards images were made to represent them, and we find Terah mentioned as an idolator [Joshua xxiv. 2-14]. Laban also used idols while Jacob was in his family; and idols were in use among the descendants of Ishmael until the time of Mahomet. Their religion, so far as it was true, would necessarily be that of Abraham, not of Moses, and so far as it was false it would be of that Sabæan character which has just been mentioned. A mixture of this kind, in which Abrahamic traditions and a very corrupt form of Sabæanism were the principal elements, appears to have been the actual religion of Arabia, unaffected in the mass by Christianity, at the time when Mahomet arose. The new religion, therefore, sprang up in a soil which had already given birth to an Eclecticism in which there were probably more ancient primeval or patriarchal ingredients than in any of the known Pagan systems.

Mahomet [A.D. 570-632] was born of parents who belonged to an Arabian tribe which claimed a descent from Joktan, the son of Eber [Gen. x. 25-29], and not from Ishmael. This tribe went by the name of the Koreish, and they were considered "Araba el Araba," as St. Paul declared himself a "Hebrew of the Hebrews," on account of the purity of their blood. Some years before the time of Mahomet's public life there had been signs of dissatisfaction among some members of this tribe with the religion then current, and they craved after one more in accordance with the religion of Abraham. Four are especially remembered by name—Waraca, Othman, Obayd Allah, and Zayd—who were thus seeking for some higher faith than the superstition in which they had been brought up. The two first of these shortly became Christians; the third, after he had been for a time seduced into being a follower of Mahomet. The fourth, Zayd, became a great reformer of Arabian religion at Mecca, proclaiming the Unity of God, and denouncing idolatry; and he probably laid the foundation of the better parts of Mahometanism, though he was murdered before he could obtain an interview with Mahomet himself.

It was in the year 570 of the Christian era that Mahomet was born, and about 609 (five years after the death of St. Augustine, first Archbishop of Canterbury) that he declared himself to be the Prophet of God.

Mahomet belonged to the family of the Hashemites, who were considered the most illustrious members of the tribe, and to whom the care of the temple at Mecca (ancient when Mahomet was born) was entrusted. His father dying while Mahomet was young, the boy was brought up by an uncle, named Abu Thaleb, who was, like most of the tribe, a merchant engaged in exchanging the fruits, spices, and perfumes of Arabia for the corn and other productions of more temperate lands. It is doubtful whether Mahomet was ever able to read and write, but it is on record that he became very early proficient in the kind of commerce in which his uncle was engaged. As soon as he reached manhood, he became factor, agent, and commercial traveller to a rich widow, who carried on the trade of her deceased husband; and the cleverness of Mahomet in this occupation was so satisfactory to the rich Kadijah that she proposed to him to become her husband. They married, and seem to have retired from business with an immense fortune, the age of the adventurer being now twenty-five, and that of his rich wife forty. Up to this period he appears in the character of a mere adventurer of a very ordinary sort; but it seems probable that his rapid accession to position and fortune aroused an ambition for still greater success, and that this, combined with a certain religiousness of disposition, according to the current religion of Mecca at that time, influenced him to undertake the imposture on which his subsequent greatness was founded. As Mahometanism is a mixture of truth and error, so the character of its founder seems to have been far from one of unmixed evil; and at the beginning of his career he was neither the voluptuary nor the impostor that he afterwards became. It would seem, indeed, that, like Zayd, he began by looking for a higher and more devotional system of religion than that by which he was surrounded; that asceticism and excess of self-contemplation led him on to wild notions of his own mission as a religious reformer within the limited circle of his own acquaintance and city; that the idea of religious reformation became transmuted by success into that of a universal new religion; and that the necessities of his advanced movements made Mahomet far more of an impostor than he had been limited sphere, while his ascetic religious character broke down under cation of his enormous success.

There was an interval of some years before the marriage of the young Mahomet with the mature Kadijah and his assumption of the office of prophet. For thirteen years we have little or no clue to his life, and he is thirty-eight years of age when we see the beginning of that career which subsequently opened out for him. From until forty he was known to retire to a cave near Mecca called the Cave of Hira, where it is said that he practised religious exercises as a preparation for his mission. At the end of that time he declared his now aged wife and some other members of his family, as a prophet of God. Time more passed, and the circle of his influence was widened by his open proclamation of himself as a prophet entrusted with a mission to all the family of Hashem. In his forty-fourth year [A.D. 613] Mahomet declared publicly to the people of Mecca that he had been sent by God to reform Arabian religion, and to put down the idolatry. At first he was met by ridicule and opposition, but a religious reformer who shows himself in earnest will not long want adherents. In a few months those of Mecca who were opposed to the increase of Mahomet's religion were alarmed, and became enemies of him and his pretensions, intending to put him to death. In consequence of this opposition he sought refuge in a city named Tayef, not very far distant from Mecca, where he continued to make proclamation of his new religion—for it was now developing into this—to his neighbours. The caravans which travelled to Mecca afterwards returned to Mecca, until by an insurrection which his presence aroused to fly for his life to Yalrebah. This flight began on July 16th, 622, and has been the era from which Arabian chronology is reckoned since Mahomet, so that an event which computation Anno Domini, 1800, Mahometans [after July] reckon as the 1304th year of the Hegira or Flight.

There are only 354 days in the Islamic year, which accounts for the difference between the number of years between the birth of Mahomet and the Mahometan reckoning of the present time, and between A.D. 622 and the present Christian being equal to about 1031 years.

The city to which Mahomet fled was in no small degree prepared for him, for Pilgrims had come from thence to Mecca, and had heard of the fame of Mahomet. The city of Medina had been occupied by two tribes, one of idolaters and one of Jews. A fierce war existed between the rival races; it termin-

of the Jews, who were reduced to

Amid their sufferings they were heard to exclaim, "Oh! if the appointed time of the Messiah had arrived, we seek Him, and He would deliver us from His tyranny." When the Medinese heard the account of the new prophet, they said to one another, "Can the Messiah of whom the Jews are so eagerly speaking? Let us find him out, and bring him over to our interests." Mahomet once saw what an advantage he had by such a prepossession; he declared that the person whom the Jews expected, and whose mission was not confined to a particular people, for all who believed in God and His prophet should share its advantage. [Taylor's History of Mahomedanism, is probably from this time that Mahomet began to be an intentional impostor, and to be far more than a reformer of Judaism; and it is a curious fact that the policy of the great anti-Christian impostor, which he founded should be reckoned, and that the time when he showed himself in the character of a reforming servant of God, and in a period thirteen years later, when his pretensions were of a much less excusable

as about this period of Mahomet's life that the Koran began to be produced as a revelation. He had declared in the first instance that he had received a message from God through the angel Gabriel; and that pretended message was repeated, he alleged, by many others. These were taken down from the lips of Mahomet, and written on bones or on palm-leaves, and when they formed the Koran, a book which occupies the same place in the estimation of the Moslems that the Holy Bible does among Christians. It is said to be very beautiful in the original Arabic in which it is written.

but in English a great part of it is false, while some of it is grossly immoral and profane. This book was written by the companions of Mahomet at various periods during the course of his public life. Portions of it show that he had an intimate acquaintance with Old Testament and with the facts of the Gospel, but grossly distorted, and ludicrous fables were added on to some of the most solemn portions of Holy Writ. The great burden of the book is that Mahomet is the prophet

Christ is named, as is also the Virgin Mary; but the miraculous conception and birth of Jesus are denied, and He is declared to be the son of Joseph as well as of Mary. To win the support of ignorant masses, Mahomet allowed that Jesus was a prophet, but only in a very inferior degree to himself; the latter and not the former being set forth as the great centre, God Himself, of the religious system laid down in the book. [KORAN.]

The flight to Yalreb was the turning-point of Mahomet's career. The religion which he had already begun to found now took shape as a form of doctrine, worship, and morals: and mosques began to be erected in which it might have a local habitation. The citizens of Yalreb were predisposed in favour of Mahomet, and showed as much eagerness to receive him as those of Mecca had shown to get rid of him. They welcomed him to their city in procession as their sovereign and religious head, and changed its name from Yalreb to Medinet-al-Nabi, the City of the Prophet, by which latter name, contracted to Medina among ourselves, it has ever since been known. Then began the military character of the new religion, a character which essentially belonged to it for a very long period. Christianity mastered the world before a single sword was drawn even in its defence; but Mahometanism was propagated by violence from the beginning. At first the new "prophet" had but a small band of about three hundred military followers, but with these he made a successful raid on a caravan of the rich produce of Arabia, which was proceeding from Mecca to Syria under the escort of a thousand soldiers, headed by Abu Sophian, the successor of Abu Taleb in what was practically the sovereignty of Mecca. The small force of Mahomet was on the point of being defeated, when he pretended to have had an interview with the angel Gabriel, and as he threw a handful of sand towards the Meccans with the exclamation, "May their faces be confounded!" his followers concluded that a miracle was being wrought in their favour, and with the fierceness which such a persuasion has always given men in battle, they made a fresh onslaught, which ended in the total rout of those who had opposed them, and the capture of an immense booty. This success led Mahomet to assume a much more haughty position, and he now pretended to be guided by special revelations from heaven in all his undertakings. A second encounter between Abu Sophian and Mahomet in the following year ended in the defeat of the latter; but as the advantage was not followed up, each party remained in strong force, and for a time the whole of Arabia was the arena of most horrible petty warfare, in which plunder and murder were the objects of both sides. Then came the siege of Medina by the Meccans, which ended in a truce between Mahomet and his opponents for the long period of ten years.

The prophet then began to plunder and slay the rich Jews who thronged the towns within his reach; and by this means obtained great treasure for his further proceedings. Some of these he caused to be privately assassinated by small bands of his followers who presented themselves as guests, and became the murderers of their entertainers. By this means Mahomet gradually advanced towards Mecca, increasing his numbers and his wealth, without actually breaking the treaty which had been made between him and the army of Mecca. Then he found a pretence for invading the city itself, declaring that the truce had been broken by his opponents; but as he was now at the head of an army which numbered ten thousand men, the city surrendered to him on condition of his not entering it for a year, and of his followers meanwhile performing their pilgrimages to the Kaaba, the ancient temple of the Arabians, unarmed with any weapon but their swords. During the interval, the false prophet employed himself in extending his conquests over neighbouring tribes, and especially in subduing and plundering the Jews; and he also sent ambassadors to Persia, Constantinople, and Ethiopia, inviting monarchs and people to adopt the new religion. The King of Ethiopia was ready to become a convert; the Emperor of Constantinople, Heraclius, returned a politic but indifferent answer; and only the Persian sovereign showed indignation at the effrontery of the adventurer. He tore in pieces the letter, and denounced the message as insolent: "Thus may Allah tear his kingdom," was the reply of Mahomet.

When the time came for Mahomet to visit Mecca, he entered the city in the twofold character of conqueror and religious reformer. His first act was to go to the Kaaba, and cause all the three hundred and sixty idols to be destroyed, laying his hand on each, and saying, "Truth has come, let falsehood disappear." His opposition to idolatry was always consistent and energetic. No doubt this opposition to idolatry became one great means of gaining over most of the Iconoclasts, who had done so much harm to Christianity in the East. These religionists were powerfully impressed with the evil of using images of saints and of our Lord, and, finding the new imposture agree with their own principles in this particular, they looked on such a basis of agreement as one which they could adopt, without considering the important points of fundamental difference. Certain it is that many such Christians were gained over by the impostor.

The personal supremacy of Mahomet over the whole of Arabia was now established, and he began to carry his arms against Palestine, which was then under the dominion of Heraclius, the Emperor of Constantinople; but the expedition ending without any engagement between the Christians and the Moslems, Mahomet returned to Medina. His mode of life at this time was of the most sensual description. One of his rules in the Koran for all his followers was that they were to practise polygamy only to the extent of having four wives each. To justify himself in possessing a much larger number, he pretended a fresh revelation, by which he was to be allowed any number that he pleased; and there can be no doubt that sensual excess shortened his days.

The death of Mahomet took place on June 8th, 632, when he was at the age of sixty-three. Poisoned food had been given him some years before by a Jewish slave, but before he had partaken of it in sufficient quantity to cause immediate fatal effect, the woman's act was discovered. The poison remained, however, in his system, and acting upon a frame exhausted by dissipation, carried him off at the time named, after sixteen days of raving fanaticism. He left no son, and only one daughter, Fatima, behind him. His body was buried in a grave dug under the bed on which he had died, and a mosque erected over the spot has become the scene of as much virtual idolatry in Mecca as ever was practised in the Kaaba at Mecca.

Mahomet left to his followers a new religion and the germ of an empire. He was succeeded in his rule over the latter by Ali Beke [A.D. 571-634], the father of his favourite wife Ayesha, and the first of the four Caliphs by whom the Moslem empire was founded. Within thirty years from his death, his followers had conquered the whole of Syria, Egypt, and Mesopotamia, and had overthrown the empire of the Persians. The second of his four great successors, the Caliph Omar [582-644], took Jerusalem in the year 637, and built on the site of the Temple the mosque which has since been called by his name. It was he also who destroyed the great library of Alexandria three years afterwards, declaring that no books were needed besides the Koran; by that ignorant and arrogant act he deprived the world of some of its greatest literary treasures, including probably many Christian writings, and many primitive manuscripts of the Holy Scriptures. Omar was also the first of the Mahometan rulers who assumed the title of "Commander of the Faithful:" and he, in fact, consolidated that which Mahomet himself had founded, and to a great extent completed his work. "During the reign of Omar," says the Mahometan historian, "the Saracens conquered thirty-six thousand cities, towns, and castles, destroyed four thousand Christian, Magian, and Pagan temples, and erected fourteen hundred mosques." As to the latter item, it is certain that many mosques yet exist—as that of St. Sophia at Constantinople—which were originally Christian churches. The early course of this false religion was, indeed, that of the most sanguinary propagandism, cruelties and acts of tyranny being perpetrated, under the plea of devotion to God and his prophet Mahomet, such as no civilised conqueror had ever been guilty of.

The third caliph, Othman [A.D. 574-644] who had been secretary to Mahomet, continued the conquests of Omar, and with that the new religion. Persia was entirely subdued, the north of Africa, and some of Mediterranean. He was murdered by people in the mosque at Mecca by Ali [A.D. 661], and Mahomet, almost his first son, after some years of civil war, died in a mosque (that of Cufa), and the immediate successors of the seat of the empire was then Mecca.

It is not necessary to go into much detail of the subsequent history of Mahometanism, and it will be sufficient just to say in a few words the progress of the religion between the time of these events and the period at which we begin. Let it be said, then, that the whole of Asia (Asia Minor included) during the time of the Mahometans, and that in the reign of the Emperor Heraclius [A.D. 610] the empire was as far as Tangier and the whole of the north part of the empire, as far as the Straits of Gibraltar. In 711 Spain, on the south coast, was successfully conquered by Arab conquerors, who retained it as part of Europe until 1492.

By the greater part of Asia was conquered—that is, in A.D. 717 Constantinople was not conquered, and about the same time the islands of India were subdued. The religion penetrated into the south of Europe was not until the defeat of Charles Martel in 732 that the hope of preventing that which directed his followers to accommodation of the whole world to Islam.

It brings home the fact that the conquest very vividly to remember, that Spain was a part of the empire for eight hundred years, from the formation and down to the end of the century VII., and also that for the empire founded on the religion covered as large a globe as the Roman empire in its most prosperous days of the empire. It is remembered that when the invaders penetrated, there was the false prophet in whose name and ruled was propagated.

It will be conceived how mighty Christianity had to contend with the religion of its history. Even in the ages of its history. Even in the millions of Mahometans of the fairest portions of the world.

This religion has almost everywhere of the northern half of Africa, Europe, of Arabia, Persia, the East Minor, and some parts of the world. A few of its devotees have ever been to Christianity.

OF MAHOMETANISM.—Let us now to sum up the principles of Mahometanism, as it has been exhibited to the world for twelve centuries and a quarter.

First of all, it must be noted that Mahometanism professes an unbounded veneration for the doctrine of the unity of God. "Islamism," says the Mahometan doctor, "rests on five foundations, of which the first is the confession of God, that there is no other God beside Him, and that Mahomet is His prophet; the second is the offering up of prayer at stated intervals, the third, the giving of alms, the fourth, fasting during the month Ramadan, and the fifth is the pilgrimage to Mecca, which every person must perform who is able." In as far as this confession of one God stands by itself, it may be taken as the truth, just as it was the truth for the Jews to confess, "Hear, O Israel, the Lord thy God is one Lord." But the Koran entirely repudiates the doctrine of the Trinity, and says distinctly, "Jesus was a mere mortal, and not the Son of God." His birth by a supernatural conception is denied; His resurrection and ascension are taken no account of. Our Lord is allowed to have been a holy man, a messenger from God, but His place as the object of man's worship, love, and hope, is denied Him. Hence some hold it to be an error to call Mahometanism a heresy. Dante views it as such in the Inferno (xxvii. 36) where he speaks of Mahomet and his followers who

"While they lived did sow, Scandal and schism, and, therefore, thus are rent."

Other writers have also taken this idea, and in a lecture on the subject Dean Stanley has said that "Mahometanism must be regarded as an eccentric heretical form of Eastern Christianity" [Lect. on Eccl. Hist. p. 308]. But the essence of Mahometanism, others maintain, is rather to repudiate Christianity—i.e. the system of religion in which Christ is the centre—and to substitute a system in which He holds a very inferior place, and which would not be one iota changed if its partial acknowledgment of Christ were left out altogether. So in the creed which was lately quoted, the complement of the truth that there is one God is the assertion that Mahomet is His prophet, and the whole foundation of the system at large is that all personal messengers from God culminated in the person of Mahomet, and all revelations in the Koran. It is contended, therefore, to be a mistake to suppose that there is any ground of agreement between Christianity and Mahometanism, for when once they are brought face to face, they must be as much opposed to each other as Christianity and Paganism.

Mai, ANGELO [b. 1782, d. 1854], Cardinal of the Roman Church [1838].—A very learned and acute philologist, who made it a specialty to study manuscripts and palimpsests, and published editions of the famous Vatican manuscripts and of the Old Testament, as well as of some of the Fathers.

Maimbourg, Louis [b. 1610, d. 1686], was born at Nancy, and in 1626 became a Jesuit. Some of his writings drew on him the indignation of the Court of Rome, whereupon the Jesuits turned him out of their body, and he retired to the abbey of St. Victor in Paris, where Louis XIV. settled a considerable pension on him, and where he died very suddenly, when he was composing the History of the Schism of England. He wrote two volumes of sermons, a History of Arianism, History of the Iconoclasts, History of the Crusades, History of the Schism of the Greeks, History of Lutheranism and Calvinism, The Decay of the Empire, the Pontificate of St. Leo, etc. His books are not now read; Protestant writers charge him with passion and insincerity, and with romancing in his accounts of ancient history.

Maimonides, or, more properly, Moses ben Maimon, one of the most celebrated Jewish rabbis, was born at Cordova about 1135. He was educated by his father, a learned man, who had written some works on Hebrew and Arabic. Maimonides also studied Greek philosophy, medicine, and theology under the ablest Arabic masters of the day. In 1148 the Almohades took Cordova, and forced all Jews and Christians to become Mohammedans or fly. Maimonides and his family fled to Fez, where they remained till 1165, and then went through Acco and Jerusalem to Fostat (ancient Cairo), where his father died. The son is said to have at first gained his living by the trade of a jeweller, but he afterwards became physician to the Sultan, and chief of all the Jews in Egypt. He died, Dec. 13th, 1204.

The learning and ability of Maimonides have been universally acknowledged, and there was a saying: "from Moses to Moses no one has arisen like Moses." He it was who first put the numerous Jewish traditions, and the discussions they had given rise to, in order, so that he has been called "the second law-giver." He also was the first Jewish Biblical commentator.

His first work, written in 1158, was a treatise on the Jewish calendar, and two years later he wrote a Letter on Glorifying God by suffering Persecution, which was an apology for himself for having in Fez professed Mohammedanism, while in secret he still practised Judaism, a proceeding which called forth many reproaches in later years. But his first really great work was the Commentary on the Mishna [1158-68], originally written in Arabic, but translated into Hebrew by many rabbis. This is an historical introduction to the Oral Law, which is now considered so essential a part of the Talmud that the two are generally printed together. In this work is to be found the first defined Jewish creed which forms part of the ritual, and is recited each morning by the orthodox Jews. Maimonides' second great work was the Mishna-Torah, also called The Mighty Hand, a complete encyclopædia of Jewish literature and law, and written in beautiful Hebrew. To this is generally appended his Book of the Faith, written in Arabic, which contains 613 precepts, chiefly directed against the authors of the Asharoth, or Warnings. His third and most important work was the Arabic Delivered of Hauran, translated into Hebrew by his nephew Samuel ben Tybbon, with the title of Book of Nebuchim, or Guide to the Perplexed. This is a philosophical commentary on the Bible, and consists of three parts. The first treats of the allusions in the Bible to God's essence, the second of the Jewish religion, and the third of Ezekiel's vision. This book caused such discords among the Jews—orthodoxy versus science—that at the beginning of the thirteenth century they brought their disputes to be settled by Christians, who burnt the books; and then followed a raid upon Hebrew books, and finally upon Jews themselves. Meanwhile David Kimchi was, in 1234, chosen to settle the dispute, and Maimonides became the glory of his nation, and received the names of "Great Eagle," the "Light of Two Worlds," etc. The law of the book soon spread into other countries. The original Arabic was printed for the first time in Paris in 1556. In 1827 Tenney printed an English translation under the title of The Reasons of the Laws of Moses from the Mouth of Nebuchim of Maimonides. Another work is Maimonides' Thirteen Articles of Faith, printed at Worms in 1529.

Maistre, Le. [SACY, DR.]

Maitland, Samuel Roffe, D.D., essayist and controversialist, was born in London in 1792. His family was Presbyterian, and he was baptised in the Kirk of Scotland, and thus when he went up to Trinity College, Cambridge, he was unable to graduate. He studied for the law, and was called to the bar in 1816, but becoming a member of the English Church, he was ordained in 1821. In 1822 he became Perpetual Curate of Christ Church, Gloucester, and in 1837 was appointed Librarian to Archbishop Howley, and Keeper of the Manuscripts at Lambeth. He held this post till the Archbishop's death in 1848, when he retired to Gloucester, and died there in 1866. Dr. Maitland's works may be ranged in two classes. The first consists of essays on early Church history. The works of this class are The Dark Ages, in which he contends that the darkness has been much exaggerated; Antiquities and Documents Illustrative of the History and Rites of the Ancient Albigenians and Waldenses, and Essays on Subjects connected with the Reformation in England. The two last were much controversy, to which Dr. responded in "letters," "notes," and in some of which he criticises Fox, Faber, Townsend, and Milner. views of events which are now accepted were first started by Maitland. second class of works contains extracts of the Apocalypse and the prophetic, such as The Prophetic Period of St. John, etc., and the third and miscellaneous treats of current opinions on logic and morals. The most important: Eruvin, or the Nature, History, of Man; eight Essays on Various Sacred Art, Mesmerism, Superstition, Science, etc. Dr. Maitland also, Lambeth, prepared an Index of such books printed before the year 1600 as the Archiepiscopal Library at Lam-

He died at age in great poverty. Malin. [DUALISTS.]

Maleny, St. [b. 1095, d. 1148], was born in a family at Armagh. He was ordained in 1120, and did much to improve discipline in the diocese of Armagh, was the Assistant of Archbishop who pressed Roman practices on the church, and was the means of its spread under the authority of the IRELAND, CHURCH OF.] He was Bishop of Bangor, and in 1134 succeeded Archbishopric of Armagh. He died in 1148, in the arms of his bosom friend, who wrote a funeral panegyric for him. He was the first Irish saint canonized by the Pope. He is said to be the author of the Prophecies concerning the reign of Celestine II., 1143, down to Innocent III., 1192; but this is more than imagined as they were never heard of till Warton published them in 1595 in his Vita, dedicated to Philip II. of France, they were probably his own invention. St. Bernard, who wrote St. Malachy's

Life, and mentions his slenderest predictions, takes no notice of these prophecies.

Malakanes.—A Russian sect, so named from the Russian malako, "milk," from their use of milk on fast days. They call themselves "Istineeye Christiane," or true Christians. They were discovered in the Government of Tambof in the middle of the last century, but nothing is known of their origin. They reject the sacraments, saying that they understand by baptism not the earthly water but the spiritual, and as regards "the Lord's Supper, it was a commemoration of Christ, but the words of the Gospel are the spiritual bread of life." In 1833 Tarentius Belioreff, an enthusiast, proclaimed that the millennium would begin in thirty months, and ordered them to leave off work. He also told them he was Elias, and announced the day when he would ascend into heaven, but on making the attempt fell to the ground, and his disappointed followers delivered him up to prison. The sect is principally to be found in the Crimea, but many emigrated to Asia, Georgia, etc.

Maldonatus, JOANNES, a Roman Catholic commentator of great value, born at Las Casas, in Estremadura, 1533; died at Rome, 1583. He studied at Salamanca under a Dominican and under Tolet, a Jesuit, through whose influence Maldonatus entered the Society of Jesuits in 1562, giving up for that purpose a professorship of theology which he had held at Salamanca. He was sent by his superiors to Rome, and then to Paris, where he remained till 1576, teaching theology in the college of Clermont. He lectured and preached with such success that he drew together numbers of people, Protestants as well as others, and Charles IX. was accustomed to attend his lectures. His success aroused the jealousy of his rivals, and he was accused of holding heretical opinions on the Immaculate Conception and Purgatory. Maldonatus justified himself by referring to the Council of Trent, and the Pope took his part. He was, nevertheless, removed to the Jesuit college at Bourges, and two years later was appointed to visit the Jesuit colleges in France, and took great interest in the welfare of the university at Pont-à-Mousson, which had been recently founded. Pope Gregory invited him to Rome to assist in the publication of the Septuagint in Greek, and to teach in the Collegium Romanum. His principal work was his Commentary on the Four Gospels, and he also wrote commentaries on the Prophets and Psalms, and on some of the Epistles, besides many theological works which were never printed.

Malebranche, NICHOLAS, a French philosopher, son of Nicholas Malebranche, President of the Chamber of Accounts, was born in Paris, Aug. 6th, 1638. He was deformed and sickly, and from childhood fond of solitude. He studied theology, and in 1660 entered the Congregation of the Oratory. He was at first undecided whether to study Bible history and the Fathers of the Church or philosophy, at last, a book by Cartesius falling into his hands, he applied himself to study physics, and became the most prominent of Cartesius' disciples. In 1673 and the following year appeared his famous work, De la Recherche de la Vérité, which investigated the causes of the errors to which the human mind is liable, the nature of truth, and the way of reaching it. He maintained that we see all things in God, and that all beings and thoughts exist in Him. This book shows great depth and originality of thought, and is written with eloquence and clearness. His next work was De la Nature et la Grâce, and contains a new system of mystic idealism. This was opposed by Bossuet, Arnauld, and others. Arnauld wrote a book on true and false ideas against Malebranche, and a bitter controversy began. Some suspected Malebranche of leaning towards Spinoza's doctrine of substance, while others accused him of a tendency towards the Archbishop of Cambray's system of Pure Love. Francis Lami, a Benedictine, attacked Malebranche, accusing him of inconsistency, which was replied to by a tract on the Love of God. Being desired to write something to assist the conversion of the Chinese, he drew up a conference between a Christian and a Chinese philosopher. He also wrote Christian and Metaphysical Meditations. He was chosen an honorary member of the Academy of Science, and his probity and piety are said to have been no less remarkable than his learning, genius, and judgment.

Malmesbury, William of [b. in Somersetshire about 1096, of a Norman father and Saxon mother]. He was educated at Malmesbury, and became in course of time Librarian and Precentor of the monastery, but declined the position of abbot. He lived at Malmesbury all his life, which he spent in writing the histories which have made his name famous. Of these the most important are, De Gestis Regum, comprising the history of England from the Anglo-Saxon conquest till the end of Henry I's reign, Historia Novella, a continuation of the first, lasting till 1142; De Gestis Pontificum Anglorum, an account of the English Church from the introduction of Christianity by St Augustine till 1123, and which he continued by Lives of Aldhelm and St. Dunstan. The date of his death is uncertain, but it is evident from his works that it was later than 1142, and it is supposed by one of his translators that he lived some years after that date.

Mamertus, St. [brother to Claudian Mamertus, the writer], Bishop of Vienne, in Dauphiny. The first authentic mention of him is in the year 463, when he had a dispute with Leontius, Bishop of Arles, about the definition of the Bishop of Din, which popes claimed to lie within their dioceses. The point was submitted to Hilary, who ordered a Council which was probably held at Arles, and which decided in favour of Leontius. Hilary was specially famous as the founder of the Litanies. The land had been ravaged by earthquakes, and threatened by invaders, and the B that the Litanies which had been used before, but which had been found to be read often, and said with fervour in Procession. He fixed upon the Litanies before Ascension Day, and they became observed throughout Christendom. In 474 Sedonius Apollinaris, Bishop of Clermont, wrote a letter to Mamertus relating him on the success of these Litanies and saying that he was looking to his chief hope in the threatened invasion of the Goths. In 511 the Rogation Litanies recognised at the Council of Orange, and their continuance was directed by the canon known of Mamertus after 474, but memorated on May 11th.

Man.—We shall consider this article under two heads: 1, his physical nature, and 2, his moral and spiritual nature.

1. Of late years the theory has been advanced that man is merely the highest link in the chain of creation, so far as this world is concerned, and that he traces his origin through the ape and other less exalted forms to some remote germ of being conceivable by the imagination. This theory has been considered under the head of Evolution. It remains, therefore, for us to consider the doctrine that man is the distinct and separate act of Creation, and that he is so far from being in his present position the crown and summit of a gradual scale of intelligence and organisation, that he is, in his moral nature, at least, a creature apart from the pure and upright condition in which he first existed.

In the Bible we are taught that the successive phases of creation, as the supreme act of the Creator, need not say that the upholders of the views above named find no room for them in Revelation. Our only knowledge is the physical nature of man, with that of all other creatures, as recorded to be found in the earth has lived. Can we find any sign of a connecting link between the brute? The nearest approach to a connecting link is, of course, the gorilla, which we see the closest of to humanity that the animal world while in the aborigines of Australia the lowest form of human existence these two lines the strait which t to bridge. For thousands of years, types of being, the ape and the e existed together, but always at distance from each other, and not, reporters of the evolutionary theory us to expect, in gradually approaching. For, take the earliest known remains and compare them with those of the e two had a common origin, were nt in the far past where the human ate were one, then surely we should ter resemblance between the two e st known specimens than in those

In comparing, however, the two find that precisely the same dif- isted in the far past as exist now, an and the ape of the Tertiary e as distinct from each other as w. The brain of the gorilla still size 30.51 cubic inches, while the e Australian savage averages 99.35 ss. Between the two there is the ff 68.84 inches. But between the e lowest savage and that of the y cultured European, the product of f civilisation and select breeding, lce is only 12.64 inches. If, then, nce between the lowest and the n be so small, how great is the b between the lowest man and the ate; and this difference has never so far as we have any means of gard to the antiquity of man, there widely differing hypotheses, some existence of 230,000 years, while it it to 6,000. Historical evidence back, in its farthest limits, about ns. Beyond that we have little to ept the remains of human ingenuity iwork found in the gravel deposits r valleys, such as that of the Thames and the Somme in France. the dawn of history and the age of lements, lies a great gulf of unknown Underneath the layer of soil formed agency of causes now acting, and by geologists Recent, are what are the Quaternary strata, in the late series ch appear deposits of gravel in patches nd there upon the slopes of wide valleys, hat above the level of the streams now g along their bottoms. Had these s been deposited by slowly subsiding of water, they would have been distri- evenly over the whole surface, but, as they do in patches, they must een carried on by sudden floods, which ards covered them with the sediment t down from higher levels. In course e this dried and formed loam above In these gravel beds are found animal s, such as bones, teeth, etc., and stones, flints, shaped into implements and s such as hammers, knives and arrow ll significant of the presence of man, and of his dependence for subsistence upon the chase of wild animals. A strange and hitherto unaccounted-for fact is the absence of all human bones in these deposits; but, in spite of this, the presence of articles of human ingenuity and manufacture sufficiently proves the presence of humanity. The question, then, to be decided is, How long ago were these deposits made? Were there no other causes at work then than we see now, or were their rate of action the slow and almost imperceptible progress now going on around us, then indeed the antiquity of man would be a matter for the imagination to conceive and not for sober calculation. But it is impossible to say at what rate of progress these changes of surface have gone on, or whether that progress has been uniform or irregular. There have probably been sudden local catastrophes, and in some parts changes have developed much faster than in others, as in our own land what five hundred years ago were seaports, crowded with busy shipping, are now inland villages out of sight of the sea; and what were formerly oak forests are now the beds of deep seas. Yet this has been the work of a few hundreds of years, and not the slow achievement of ages. It does not follow, therefore, that, because traces of human handiwork have been found in the Quaternary strata, the antiquity of man is so great as many have supposed. Indeed 8,000 years might be quite long enough to account for all the changes that have taken place since the deposits of gravel occurred in which these traces of humanity are found. In fact geologists are by no means agreed as yet upon the duration of later geological periods. There is, consequently, nothing in the much debated question of the Stone Age to positively contradict the general deductions of the Biblical chronology.

Contemporary with the men of the Stone Age was the mammoth, whose teeth and bones lie scattered both on the uplands and in the valleys of the Quaternary period, and whose form has been found faithfully carved on bone and ivory amongst the other relics of prehistoric man. Now, though the mammoth most certainly existed in very late geological periods, we do not find it referred to in either myth or fable. It is probable, therefore, that since the time when men and mammoths lived together a long epoch interposed, since which the mammoth has been extinct, but man, driven from his former haunts, has reappeared. Even in those prehistoric days man was not merely a being of reason and design, able to work in stone, the material that lay next his hand, but was an artist also, depicting in rude but graphic lines the forms of the creatures around him.

There is nothing in the history of man to demonstrate the gradual development of a moral being out of a purely animal creature. Acquaintance with natural forces, and consequent employment of them in ministering to human desires and necessities, have of course increased with the lapse of time: but history strongly proves the tendency of races to degenerate, so that the savage of to-day may with just as much likelihood be the modern representative of a long-perished civilisation as the cultured man of to-day may be the outcome of a gradually ascending series of mental developments.

To sum up: Science fails to show us any traces of a connecting link between man and the brute, nor does it tell us with any approach to exactness the age of man upon the earth; but, so far as present appearances go, there is no necessity to imagine more than about 8,000 years to account for all the phenomena that exist, and they are utterly at variance with the vast and indefinite ages that some would assign.

2. We have now to consider shortly Man himself, in his individual and aggregate existence. He has a body, a soul, and a spirit. The union of body and soul constitutes his life. The possession of a spirit makes him an intellectual, moral, religious being. It is an instinct within him to preserve life, and it is part of his moral obligation to avoid whatever practices tend to injure it—intemperance, debauchery, excessive labour, reckless squandering of means. As an intellectual being he is bound to cultivate his mental faculties, to acquire knowledge, to regulate his opinions by the exercise of a sound judgment. As a moral being, he must not only obey conscience, but must seek by such means as open themselves to him to train that conscience to give a right judgment, to quicken and strengthen it continually. His duty to his fellow-men is to be truthful, even when no other person can be injured by falsehood. “Speak every man truth to his neighbour, for we are members one of another.” Covetousness, ambition, love of display, pride, apathy, are all sins against the moral and religious life, because they imply injury to others in thought if not in deed. Humility, not only towards others but within his own soul, is a necessity to one who would see God and learn his own place with respect to Him. The constant acknowledgment of dependence upon Him, and attendance upon His worship, is the true attitude of one who realises that he is not a waif and stray of the universe, but a child of the living God, who calls him to His favour now, and to the hope of perfect consummation and bliss hereafter.

Man, BISHOPRIC OF. [SODOR AND MAN.]

Manchester, BISHOPRIC OF.—The great manufacturing county of Lancashire was separated, with the exception of Liverpool and a large district around, from the diocese of Chester in the year 1848, when it was formed into an independent diocese, with Manchester for its cathedral city.

The cathedral of Manchester is the ancient parochial and collegiate church of the city. Having been the parish church from time immemorial, it was, in the year 1422, constituted into a collegiate church with a warden, eight fellows, four clerks or minor canons, and six choirmen. The college was disendowed in 1547, but refounded by a charter of Queen Elizabeth in 1578, and continued in existence until the foundation of the see, when it became the nucleus of the cathedral chapter. The present cathedral dates originally from the establishment of the college, but it was enlarged by the addition of many guild and chantry chapels in the latter part of the fifteenth century. It is a magnificent specimen of Perpendicular work, and has been carefully restored. The original tower having become unsafe, the present one was built in its place. The collegiate church was originally dedicated in the names of the Blessed Virgin Mary, St. George, and St. Denys: but the college was called Christ's College in the charter of Queen Elizabeth.

Manes. [MANICHÆUS.]

Manes.—Divinities among the ancient Romans which some think to have been the souls separated from the bodies, and others the gods, of the dead. They are said to have been so called from the old Latin word, manum, or “good.” The heathens considered souls to be of a light, airy substance, resembling shadows, but having the same organs and capable of the same functions as when in the body. This idea was adopted by some of the primitive Christians, and applied to God, and thus they received the name of Anthropomorphites. An annual festival, called Feralia, was dedicated specially to the Manes, and held on Feb. 19th.

Manichæus or Manes was a Persian heretic who flourished in the third century. The story is that he was originally a slave, but was purchased, and afterwards adopted by a rich widow, who gave him a good education, and at her death left him her property. He was finally flayed alive by the Persian King for failing in his attempt to heal that monarch's son.

Manes gave himself out to be an apostle of Jesus Christ, and the promised Comforter. He considerably increased the number of his followers by concealing himself for a year, and stating on his reappearance that he had been on a visit to heaven, whence he brought a revelation. This revelation was contained in a book, full of strange symbols, which he exhibited to his disciples.

The essential point of the Manichæan system was its recognition of two eternal and Maniple.—One of the vestments used in the Roman Church. It is three feet four inches long and three inches wide, of the same colour and make as the stole, and fringed at the ends, and is attached by a loop to a button on the left sleeve of the alb. This vestment was formerly a handkerchief held in the hand, and was probably used when handling the eucharistic vessels.

Manse [Lat. mansus, "abiding place"] denotes in ancient law-books a house or habitation, with or without land, and later was applied to ecclesiastical residences, both parochial and collegiate. In Scotland it designates the residences of the Presbyterian ministers, and it has been adopted of late years in England as the name of the houses of Congregational ministers.

Mansel, HENRY LONGUEVILLE, D.D., Dean of St. Paul's, was born on Oct. 6th, 1820. He was educated at Merchant Taylors' School, and thence went to St. John's College, Oxford, where he took a double first class. He became Reader in Moral and Metaphysical Philosophy at Magdalen College in 1855, Bampton Lecturer in 1858, Waynflete Professor of Logic in 1859, and Regius Professor of Ecclesiastical History at Oxford in 1866.
 Two years after he succeeded Dr. Milman as Dean of St. Paul's, and died on July 31st, 1871. The publication of Dr. Mansel's Bampton Lectures, entitled Limits of Religious Thought, marks an epoch in the history of English theology. It was an eager reiteration of the views of Sir William Hamilton, whose works Mansel had already edited, and maintained that man's intellect, being finite, cannot know absolute truth, but must depend upon a revelation which comes from without, and which is regulative and practical. This view was immediately assailed by Professor Maurice in a series of letters, which he published under the title of What is Revelation?
 Mansel replied with much acrimony, and a very bitter controversy began and spread among other writers. Maurice contended that Mansel, by divorcing Reason from Faith destroyed the life of both; that God does reveal, not regulative truths, but His very self to man. Certainly the doctrine known in modern days as Agnosticism is professedly an acceptance of Mansel's challenge. He said,
 "You cannot know God. All you can do is to believe what is told you on miraculous evidence." The retort was, "That evidence is not such as convinces us, and we therefore reject it, and all belief with it." But the belief that God does speak directly to the conscience, and that by appeals to that conscience Christ brought conviction, was a living faith ages before Sir W. Hamilton was born, and will outlive all such theories.

Mansel was a brilliant logician, and was also known at Oxford as a clever satirist and wit. A satire of his in the manner of Aristophanes against the Pantheism of the Neologian writers had a wonderful success, and quotations from it were on every one's tongue. His history of the Gnostic heresies was edited by Bishop Lightfoot, and there is a Life of him by Lord Carnarvon.

Mant, RICHARD [b. 1776, d. 1848], Bishop of Down and Connor in 1828, to which Dromore was added in 1832, was the son of a Hampshire clergyman, and grandson of Bingham, author of Christian Antiquities. Mant's commentary on the Bible, which work he accomplished with the aid of Dr. GEORGE D'OYLEY [q.v.], was for many years a very popular work. He also edited the Book of Common Prayer, with notes, and the Book of Psalms in an English metrical version, and published two volumes of sermons.

Mantilleto.—A vestment worn in the Roman Church by cardinals, bishops, and abbots. When worn by cardinals it is red, violet and rose-coloured, when by bishops, all of one colour. It is a garment made of silk or wool, reaching almost to the knees, with openings for the arms, and a low collar. It is worn over the rochet.

Manton, THOMAS [b. 1620, d. 1677], was a Nonconformist, one of Cromwell's chaplains, and preached frequently before the Parliament. He looked favourably upon the Restoration, became one of Charles's chaplains, and took part in the Savoy Conference, but was deprived by the Act of Uniformity. He was one of the ablest of the Puritans, and his works are still read. The best known are: CXL. Sermons on Psalm cxi.; and expositions of James, Jude, the Lord's Prayer, and Isaiah liii.

Manual [Lat. manus, "hand"] was the name given to small portable books, and became restricted to a small treatise or a book of devotion. The term was specially applied to a small book for the use of the clergy containing the occasional offices, as baptism, churching, marriage, etc., and also services for Candlemas, Ash Wednesday, Maundy Thursday, Good Friday, and Holy Saturday. The name is peculiar to England and Scotland, abroad the book was called agenda, pastorale, rituale, etc.

Manuscripts of the Scriptures.—The Hebrew MSS. of the Old Testament are those used in the synagogues, and private copies. The former are on skins, without the vowel points, and there are a great many regulations respecting these copies. The other MSS. are in form like other books, all except the most modern are on vellum. There are no very ancient Hebrew MSS., owing to the fact that the Jews, when copies of the Scriptures became worn out, buried them, but the material should be employed for any secular purpose. The oldest MSS. now do not go back further than the eighth century.

The oldest Greek MSS., which are all on vellum, are known as UNCIAL MSS., i.e., they are written throughout in capital letters. Those in which small letters are used are called CURSIVES. The Uncial MSS. are without word-divisions or punctuation. The age of a MS. can be pretty accurately determined by the form of the letters, the style of arrangement, the nature of the ink and the vellum.

Both in Uncials and Cursive some frequent occurrences are contracted. Thus ΘΣ stands for ΘΕΟΣ (God), ΚΣ for ΚΥΡΙΟΣ (Lord), ΠΝΑ for ΠΝΕΥΜΑ (Spirit), &c. In one passage a very important canon turns upon this point. In 1 Tim. ii. 8 our version has "God was manifest." The text from which this translation was made had ΘΣ. But many copies have ΚΣ, the relative pronoun "which." The collation of the manuscripts of the New Testament has been undertaken by many scholars, but the greatest and most important achievement in this direction have been wrought in our century. Tischendorf, Lachmann, and Tregelles have earned the gratitude of all students of the Holy Scriptures. There still remains Dr. Scrivener, who has worked with labor and diligence in the collation of the most copies, and Drs. Westcott and Hort have recently published a most painstaking revision of the sacred text.

Very few MSS. contain all the books of the New Testament. Some are copies of particular books, some have had leaves torn away. [BIBLE, CANON, CODEX.]

Mapes, WALTER [or MAP], (a probably Herefordshire between 1140 and 1150; d. at the beginning of the thirteenth century). He studied at the University of Paris, and on his return to England became a favourite at the Court of King Henry II. on account of his learning and courtliness of manners. The King sent him to the Court of Louis VII. of France, and later on to a Council held by Pope Alexander III., where Mapes was employed to carry on a discussion with the Waldenses. On his return to England the King showered ecclesiastical preferments upon him; he became Incumbent of Wootton, in Gloucestershire, and of other livings; Canon of St. Paul's and of Salisbury, Precentor of Lincoln; and Archdeacon of Oxford. His appointment to the last-named post took 1196, and this is the last mention to be found of him. He was a companion of the King, and accompanied in most of his journeys. Mapes wrote for many literary works, and the history of King Arthur and the of the Round Table most of the have been derived. His De Nugis is a series of historical sketches, in Latin, of life in Courts and monasteries, showing with great power the life of the English Court and of that of the English people.

He owes much of his fame to his Latin poems and drinking songs.

Marburg Confession.—This name is given to the fifteen Articles drawn up at the Diet held at Marburg in 1529, by the Emperor Philip, Landgrave of Hesse, in settling the dispute which had arisen between the divines of Germany and Switzerland concerning the manner of Christ's presence in the Eucharist. The principal names in the debates were Luther, who was opposed by Oecolampadius; and Melancthon, who was allied with Zwingli; other eminent names were also present. The conference lasted four days. Melancthon and Zwingli were able to come to an agreement as regarded the doctrine of the Trinity and the Godhead of Christ, the authority of the Divine Word, and Original Sin, which they had had some slight difference about; but on the main question they had no agreement (the manner of Christ's presence in the Eucharist) neither of the contending parties could be made to abandon, or even to modify their opinion. The Germans maintained the doctrine of Consubstantiation; the Swiss the elements were simply memorials of the body and blood of Christ.

The break of the sweating sickness broke the conference very hurriedly, and in the up of the Articles the only unity of opinion they arrived at as regarded the sacrament was, that "the sacrament of the true body and blood of Christ, and that the 'spiritual presence' of that body is the primary condition of the sacrament," but they could not determine whether the true body and blood of Christ were present bodily in the bread and wine."

Shortly afterwards drew up for the Diet of Alliance a confession of faith on the basis of the Marburg Articles, but with modifications in accordance with his own views.

Mar, Petrus de, Bishop of Conserans, Archbishop of Paris, 1661 [b. at Gant, 1614; d. at Paris, 1662]. He was a lawyer, and in 1639 was summoned to Paris where he was made Councillor of State. In 1641 he wrote a book on the Gallican Church (De concordia inter imperii seu de libertatibus Ecclesiæ Gallicanæ), which gave such offence to the Pope that when Marca was appointed to the bishopric of Conserans, the Pope refused for eight years to allow him to be consecrated, when Marca retracted. Besides his book on the Gallican liberties, Marca wrote De Encharistia, De Constantinopolitana Patriarcha, Dissertationes Posthumæ, Opuscula, and a History of Béarn.

Marcella.—One of the illustrious women who lived under the tuition of St. Jerome. She became a widow seven months after her marriage, and thenceforward lived a retired life. She strongly opposed the Origenists, who appeared in Rome at that time, and was consulted as a theologian. In one of his works St. Jerome says "It is easy to collect the virtue and quality of the mistress by that of the scholars who were educated by her." She died in 409.

Marcellians.—The followers of Marcellus, who was bishop of Ancyra in the fourth century. Marcellus was strongly opposed to the Arians, but in refuting Asterius, founder of the Semi-Arian school, he fell into the Sabellian heresy, and in maintaining the unity of the Son with the Father he lost sight of the personal distinction between them. Eusebius, of Cæsarea, wrote two works against him, and in 336 a Council was held at Constantinople, at which Marcellus was deposed. At the Council of Sardica he was acquitted of heresy and reinstated, but his views were developed by his pupil Photinus, who founded the sect of the PHOTINIANS [q.v.].

Marcian, EMPEROR OF THE EAST.—On the death of Theodosius in 450, his sister, Pulcheria, became Empress in her own right, and gave her hand in marriage to Marcian, then a senator. Marcian strongly supported the orthodox faith. He recalled the bishops who had been banished by the pseudo-Council of Ephesus (the Latrocinium), but left the question of reinstating them in their sees to be determined in a general Council. This Council was held at Chalcedon in A.D. 451. Marcian gave his consent and support to its enactments, and enforced them by several edicts. He died at Constantinople A.D. 457.

Marcion, the founder of the Marcionite heresy, was the son of the Bishop of Sinope in Pontus, and flourished in the latter half of the second century. Being excommunicated by his father, it has been said for immorality, but more probably for heretical views, he went to Rome; but the Church there refused to receive him, and he attached himself to the heretic Cerdo. Tertullian states that he afterwards repented of his errors, and obtained a promise of readmission to the Church, on condition that he reclaimed all whom he had led astray; but that death overtook him while endeavouring to fulfil this condition. But in this story Tertullian probably confounds Marcion with his master Cerdo.

There is some difficulty in arriving at Marcion's real opinions, but they appear to have been substantially as follows:—He taught that there were two eternal principles, the Father of Jesus Christ, and the Creator, or Demiurge. The latter was by nature evil, and created the world, and was the author of the Law, and the God of the Jews; the former was the author of the Gospel, and sent His son, Jesus Christ, to deliver mankind from the dominion of the Demiurge. Holding that the body, the creation of the Demiurge, was necessarily evil, he denied the truth of our Lord's incarnation, maintaining that Christ's body was a phantasm only, like the bodies assumed by angels when they appeared to men. This opinion he supported by reference to such texts as: "He took on him the form of a servant," i.e., he taught the appearance, as against the reality. Hence also he denied the resurrection of the body, though he seems to have allowed a judgment to come.

For the same reason, that it came from the evil principle, he rejected the Old Testament entirely, and published a book of "Antitheses," in which he contrasted the precepts of the Law and the Gospel.

The New Testament, in principle, he received, but it was altered and mutilated to suit his particular views, and reduced to two divisions: (1) The Gospel, which was a compilation founded mainly on St. Luke's, and (2) the Epistles, ten in number. He defended these emendations on the ground that the original text had become corrupt, a statement which appeared the more plausible from the number of spurious Gospels, etc., then in circulation.

The Marcionites became very numerous, as is evident from the number of works written against them, as well as from the direct testimony of Justin. Constantine, in 326, issued an edict against these and other heretics, and Theodoret, Bishop of Cyrus, tells us that he converted ten thousand of them. Their doctrine of the evil nature of the body led them to practise fasting and self-denial, and even to go so far as to exclude married persons from the sacraments, denying salvation to all but the unmarried. Some of them appear to have undergone martyrdom for their religion.

Marcosians.—A sect of Gnostics founded by Marcus, a pupil of Valentinus. Marcus is called by Irenæus, Marcus the Magician, and seems to have associated magical arts with the rites of Christianity. The Marcosians had many apocryphal books which they held for canonical, and from which they selected fabulous stories of the childhood of Christ, still said to be in use among the Greek monks. Marcus used two kinds of baptism—a physical baptism for the pardon of sin and the hope of eternal life in the kingdom of the Demiurge, and a pneumatical baptism, by which the spiritual nature attained to self-consciousness and to perfection, entering into fellowship with the Pleroma. The Marcosians are said to have been the first to practise the ceremony of extreme unction. They do not seem ever to have been a large sect, and were probably absorbed into the VALENTINIANS [q.v.].

Marcus Aurelius Antoninus Verus, Roman Emperor, succeeded his father-in-law, Antoninus Pius, in 161. He was brought up in the Stoic philosophy, and wrote some Reflections which breathe a deep piety. He was the best of all the Roman Emperors, though in his reign the Christians suffered a bitter persecution, Justin Martyr being one of its victims. This persecution was not the result of cruelty but of conviction; the Emperors, as conservators of the State, must put down those who, from whatever motives, were to all appearance working for the subversion of it. Professor F. D. Maurice gives us this estimate of Marcus Aurelius's character [Eccelesiastical History, page 350]: "I cannot doubt that it was the piety of the Emperor Marcus Aurelius—his genuine unaffected piety, as well as his desire of upholding the State which had been committed to his care—that led him to feel more strongly, and act more severely, against the Christians than any of his predecessors. No one felt more keenly and bitterly than he did the decay of moral strength among his people; few saw more clearly that moral strength must be grounded upon faith in the invisible. . . . If his subjects had lost so much of their faith in the gods already, so much of their sense of right and wrong, what a crime it must be to make them more irreligious still! to take from them the sanctions upon which their conduct depended! Were not the Christians doing this? Were they not teaching citizens and even slaves to despise the gods? What a duty must it be for him to do all that in him lay to stop such an infection, to preserve and strengthen the internal life of the Empire, as the only means of preserving its external machinery! So, I believe, he reasoned, and such reasoning led him to be a persecutor. . . . He was not a superstitious man; he laboured hard to deliver himself from superstition, and to preserve at once an awe, and an affection, for the Divine Power. He thought, as most statesmen and philosophers do, that the common people must be superstitious in order to be moral; that fear of the future must be the chief means of keeping them right."

Whenever any national calamity befell the country, it was attributed to the anger of the gods, who were indignant at the toleration of a new religion, and an earthquake, famine, or pestilence could only be removed by the shedding of Christian blood. Thus, when, in

Verus, the colleague of Marcus, from his Parthian campaign, brought back a pestilential disorder, the Plague, which raged several years, there was an inundation of the Arians were visited on the Christians. of the THUNDERING LEGION [q.v.] to be changed in his views, but a animosity to Christianity lasted h. [PERSECUTIONS.]

Eugenius.—One of the stoutest of the Greek Church against Papal was born at the end of the fourth century, taught rhetoric for some time, Archbishop of Ephesus, and chosen he representatives of the Council of 1438, at which an attempt to reconcile the Greek and Latin

The chief points of difference were concerning the use of unleavened bread, the doctrines of Purgatory, of the Holy Ghost, and the Primacy of the Pope. A formula of union was signed and subscribed July, 1439, Marcus was the only one to refuse. On his return to the East he continued to write against the Latins till his death, in 1455. Among his works are a tract on the Eucharist, epistles against the Arians, two circular letters addressed to the Eastern Church against the Council, a tract of Faith, a tract concerning the Holy Ghost, etc.

Heath, Moses [b. 1820, d. 1881], of Jewish parents, but was converted to Christianity, and became Vicar of the Church of St. Paul, Bucks. He wrote The Poetry of the Lord's Prayer as Adapted to Jewish Petitions, etc.

Mariolatry.—Of the worship of the Virgin Mary, our Lord there is no trace either in the Bible or in the first three centuries. In the earliest Church hymns there is no hint of it. Daniel's Thesaurus, a collection of Greek hymns dating from the fourth century to the twelfth, only has a few which are confessedly of late date. The rise of the Greek Church coming from the East, the Epiphany of Christ as God, and the history of the Virgin; it was not until the Nativity that error first crept in. When the Council of Ephesus truly decided that Christ is not God, and therefore that the Virgin might be called theotokos, opportunity was given for the worship of the Virgin, and one title after another was lavished upon her: "Surpassingly Holy," "Lady," "Queen." It was overlooked that the glory of the Virgin lay in its wonderful condescension, the glory of all connected with Christ, and exclusively in what He is. The Council had declared as much when he pointedly traced the genealogy of the Divine Redeemer through Rahab, and through "her who had been the wife of Uriah."

Another source of the worship of Mary is to be found in the growth of monasticism: the adoration of the Mother of God became absorbed in that of the "Ever Virgin." Christendom came to regard its pattern life, not as found in the home of Nazareth, in holy wedded love and parental care, but in the solitary life of the wilderness. Thus the early Latin hymns which sang her praise dwelt on her virginity, that was "the birth which became God." Still, it must be remembered that not one of the Ambrosian hymns is addressed to her. Scripture failing to furnish material for adoration, fancy supplied its place, and invented the stories of her Immaculate Conception and of her Assumption, and out of these was created a new worship—the worship of a great goddess, unknown to Scripture or to history. Figures were made of her, decked in vulgar gold and tawdry finery, and before them were poured out prayers as to one comprising in herself all that was beneficent in man, all that was tender and pure in woman, all that is gracious in God. As a consequence it followed that God was robbed of His true glory. The compassion and infinite tenderness which the Gospels reveal in Christ were taken from Him, and He was only thought of as a stern and avenging Judge. The love of the Father was forgotten in that of the mother, the consolations of the Comforter, in those of "our Lady of Pity," "our Lady of Good Help," "Our Lady of Sorrows." The Persons of the Holy Trinity were placed in some distant heaven where they took little concern of the affairs of earth, where they were worshipped indeed with formal worship; but the heartfelt worship of friend speaking to friend was kept for the mighty mother, whose intercession was all powerful, whose help was always ready. Thus the rise and development of Mariolatry were simultaneous with an obscuration of the true love of God in Christ, and especially of that truly human nature in the Saviour which the human heart craves for, and which is the true preservative against errors of this kind.

Mark, Bishop of Arethusa.—One of the principal supporters of the Arians in the fourth century. He was present at the Council of Sirmium in 352, and was charged with drawing up the confession of faith made there, and afterwards on several occasions he engaged himself in the defence of Arianism. It is said that he saved Julian's life in the beginning of the reign of Constantine, notwithstanding which service he was put to death when Julian came to the throne for having pulled down a heathen temple. He was dragged about the streets, tossed in the air, and caught by the soldiers on the points of their swords, and finally, after being covered all over with honey, was tied to a post and left to be devoured by the flies. On account of the support he had given to the enemies of the Church he has never been canonised, nor reckoned as one of the martyrs.

Mark of Ephesus. [MARCUS EUGENICUS.]

Mark's Day, St.—A festival celebrated on April 25th, in honour of the Evangelist. St. Mark was a Jew of the tribe of Levi, and was probably converted by St. Peter, whom he accompanied on his travels as interpreter and amanuensis. St. Mark, being sent into Egypt by the Apostle, founded a Christian Church at Alexandria, of which he became the first bishop. It is said that he suffered martyrdom about Easter time in the year 68.

Marlorat, AUGUSTIN, was born at Bar-le-Duc, in Lorraine, in 1506. He was educated in an Augustinian convent, became a Friar in 1524, and nine years after was made Prior of a monastery at Bourges, where he became well known as a very learned man and a great preacher; but in 1535 he joined the Reformed Church and fled to Geneva. He became a preacher near Lausanne, and afterwards removed to the village of Vevey in Switzerland. Afterwards, being recalled to France, he became minister at Paris and at Rouen. In the latter town a great part of the inhabitants were Protestants, and after the massacre of Vassy in March, 1562, they took possession of the city, and established their own religion. In October the town was recaptured by the Roman Catholics, and Marlorat was condemned to death, and burnt in front of his own church by order of Montmorency and the Duke of Guise. Marlorat wrote commentaries on Genesis, the Psalms, Isaiah, and the New Testament, parts of which have been translated into English.

Maronites.—A community of Syrian Christians whose head-quarters is in Mount Lebanon. They say that they derive their name from a monk named Maro, who collected a number of followers in the fifth century, and placed them in a monastery on the Orontes, which he named after himself. In the seventh century this sect was obliged, in consequence of opposition by the Greek Church, to take refuge in Lebanon, and so this name was taken by the whole population of the mountains. In many respects their ritual resembled that of the Greek Church, and all through the Middle Ages they preserved their individuality and independence. But during the Crusades they established some sort of relations with the Latin Church, and in the time of Gregory XIII. they formally joined the Roman Communion, and consented to be under the government of the Pope. But even so they obtained certain rights of their own, such as communion in both kinds, the marriage of their clergy, and the Mass in their own vernacular. Gregory founded a monastery on the Mount at Rome, and attached to it for the sole use of the Maronites. They are educated there by the Jesuits, sent to their own country. They have patriarch, archbishop, bishops, and curates; but the population is so opposed to the Turks that all the clergy are at work for their living. They now say Latin, with the exception of the Gospel is read in Arabic, the common language of the people. Their population is now about 100,000. Every man is armed, and their arms of great perfection at one time. In 1860, however, they were attacked by the Druze, a tribe living near them, and although superior in point of numbers to their enemies, their capital was destroyed and the inhabitants massacred. They are a fine-looking and very hospitable, especially towards Europeans.

Marot, CLÉMENT, religious poet, born at Cahors in 1495. He lived in the Court of Francis I., and was a favourite of Margaret, Queen of Navarre; but fell into disgrace, and, turning Calvinist, fled to Geneva. He soon returned to Lyons, and became a Calvinist, and served under Francis I. in the Italian campaign of 1535. He afterwards began to translate psalms into French, which became very popular at the Court. He was called "the prince of poets" and "poet of princes." He has left his style of poetry called Marotique. A first edition of his poems was published in 1541 and dedicated to the King and the Queen of France. A second edition, with a preface by Calvin, appeared in 1543; but was condemned by the Sorbonne, and Marot fled to Turin, where he died in poverty in 1544.

Marriage.—When Christ came marriage had come to be regarded by Jews and Gentiles as merely a civil contract, and in consequence divorce was easily procured. Christ taught the sacredness of the marriage bond; and forbade divorce on the ground of adultery. Henceforth marriages were considered, like that of Adam and Eve, as sanctioned by God Himself. St. Paul compares the marriage bond to the union between Christ and the Church: and in all ages of the Church marriage has been regarded as a sacrament performed in the sight of God. Ignatius writes, "It becomes those who are given in marriage to bear this yoke upon them with the commandment of the Church, that their marriage may be according to the will of God, and not their own lusts." Tertullian says, "I sufficiently set forth the law of the marriage which the Church binds by her procurement, which the Church confirms, which angels report with the Father ratifies." In such passages we have recorded the commencement of ecclesiastical control in domestic life, which the Church early began to exercise. But in the reign of Constantine, when religious fervour began to cool, discipline to grow lax, some Christians were married by the civil power, without any religious ceremony: and as this custom in after ages showed a tendency to increase, laws were passed both in the East [A.D. 400] and West [A.D. 800], ordaining marriages be contracted as religious ceremonies with the blessing of the Church, and the reception of the Holy Eucharist was made a necessary part of the marriage rite. This law, although frequently ignored, as far as the civil law was concerned, continued in force in England until the Commonwealth, when marriage was declared by the State to be a civil contract. At the Restoration, the religious character of the marriage rite was again recognised by the civil law: and the ancient Rubric, advising a celebration of Holy Communion, was added to the marriage service in the Book of Common Prayer.

A change in the English law of marriage was made by the Act 6 and 7 V. c. 85, whereby marriages might be contracted in three ways, viz.: either in the parish church; or in some registered place of worship; or in the registrar's office without any religious ceremony. The Act of England, while recognising the religious character of the last-mentioned, yet by her provisions strongly disapproves of them. More recently, in 1868, a Royal Commission reported that it is both the wisdom and the duty of the State to associate its legislation with religious habits and sentiments of the people, and to obtain, as far as possible, the sanction of a religious ceremony for the civil contract." The percentage of civil marriages is very small; in 1878 it was 11.6, and that of marriages performed in places of worship was 88.4.

Age Laws.—In all civilised countries laws have been passed regulating marriage. Laws have differed in different countries at different times, but their object has been identical—viz.: to prevent incest, and to guard against injury either to the community at large or to individuals. The law is contained in Leviticus xviii. On this chapter that "The table of consanguinity and affinity, wherein whosoever are forbidden in Scripture and our laws to marry together," in the Book of Common Prayer, is founded. Of late years a controversy has arisen as to the propriety of marrying a deceased wife's sister. Argument from Scripture has been brought forward with great heat upon both sides, and good men have been found upon each side: the moral and social argument also of being very strongly stated upon both sides, and at the last division upon the subject even such a body as the House of Lords was very nearly equally divided. Such marriages are at the present time legal in all the British colonies, in most Protestant Continental nations, and in the United States. In England the passing of Lord Lyndhurst's Act in 1835 has led to considerable misconception: it has been held by some that that Act first rendered marriages with a deceased wife's sister unlawful, they being previously lawful; but such is not the case. Previous to that Act, such marriages could not be declared invalid until the Ecclesiastical Court had pronounced sentence upon them; Lord Lyndhurst's Act simply did away with the necessity of the sentence of an Ecclesiastical Court, and declared all such unions to be void, and their offspring illegitimate.

The Roman code, as regards marriage, was nearly identical with the Levitical law: an innovation was made legalising marriage with a brother's daughter, but this was done to enable Claudius to marry his niece, Agrippina, and was never received with favour by the people. Marriages with a deceased wife's sister and with a deceased brother's wife were admissible. When the Emperors became Christians the Roman law of marriage was brought into accordance with ecclesiastical feeling. Constantius, in 339, forbade, under a penalty of death, marriage with a niece; and, in 354, forbade marriages with a deceased wife's sister and with a deceased brother's wife. This continued to be the civil law of the Empire, though the Emperor Honorius infringed it by marrying successively two sisters. Marriages between first cousins were forbidden by the earliest Roman law; were subsequently considered lawful, but were condemned by Theodosius in 384; but by the beginning of the fifth century they were sanctioned both in the East and the West.

By a law passed in the time of the Emperor Justinian, about A.D. 527, marriage was forbidden between a sponsor and a godchild, on the ground of spiritual relationship. The Church in various Councils adopted the principle of this law, and extended its application: by the Council of Trent marriages were forbidden between sponsors and the godchild, or its parents; between the baptiser and the baptised, or parents of the baptised; between the presenter for confirmation and the candidate, or parents of the candidate.

Second marriages were regarded as invalid by the Novatianist and Montanist heresies: but the Church in the 8th canon of the Council of Nicæa condemned the Novatian opinion. Marriages between Christians and unbelievers were forbidden by the early Church, which refused to solemnise such marriages, though it did not dispute their validity; resort had, in such cases, to be made to the civil power. There have been several notable instances of such unions being the means of great good; e.g. Monica, Queens Bertha and Ethelburga, and Clothilda, who were all married to unbelievers.

From very early times down to the Middle Ages marriages were not solemnised on Sundays, or on fasts and vigils. The rule laid down by the Council of Trent was that marriages are not to take place from Advent to Epiphany, or from Ash Wednesday to the Octave of Easter. In England the law of the country allows marriages on any day in the year. The morning was originally the time for marriage, because the parties were to receive the Holy Communion fasting. The hours for marriage in this country have, by an Act passed in 1886, been extended from 8 a.m. to 3 p.m. On the laws of CELIBACY and DIVORCE see under those heads. The principal marriage ceremonies have been derived from the heathen customs; they were: the arrha, or espousal gifts, an earnest or pledge that marriage should be completed; the ring, betokening fidelity; the dowry, the sum of money agreed to be paid over to the bride. All these took place at the betrothal. In the Church at the time of the marriage ceremony an oblation, or offering, was made by the contracting parties; the benediction is given by the priest: the bride is veiled, as a sign that she confines herself to her husband; the veil was in some Eastern countries a part of the ordinary dress of married women. In the Greek Church the whole ceremony is called "the veiling"; while in the West it was known as "the crowning," from the custom of placing crowns on the heads of the newly-married. Other ceremonies were the joining of hands and the giving of a kiss.

Marriott, CHARLES, B.D. [b. 1810, d. 1857], an Oxford divine of the Tractarian School. He was Fellow of Oriel, and succeeded Newman as Vicar of St. Mary's; was joint editor of the Library of the Fathers, and author of several theological treatises. Dr. Newman makes a very touching allusion to him in the account of his joining the Church of Rome.

Marriott, WHARTON BOOTH [b. 1825, d. 1871], Assistant Master of Eton College, author of Vestiarius Anglicanum, a work upon Church vestments; and also articles in Smith's Dictionaries of Christian Biography and Antiquities.

Marrow Controversy. [SCOTLAND, CHURCH OF.]

Marsden, SAMUEL [b. 1764, d. 1838], was brought up as a Wesleyan, but joined the Church of England, and in 1794 went out to Australia as Chaplain to the penal colony. He applied to the Church Missionary Society for help, but did not obtain it. He was joined by two laymen, William Hill and John King, and the three together founded a mission in New Zealand.

Marsh, HERBERT [b. 1757, d. 1839], educated at St. John's College, Cambridge, at which he became Fellow and Lady Margaret Professor of Divinity, was made Bishop of Llandaff in 1816, and of Peterborough in 1821. Bishop Marsh revived the synodical offices in his diocese, and rendered it very useful by conferences in which both laymen and clergymen take part, and of which the bishop is the president. This may be said to be the origin of Diocesan Conferences, which at the present time are exerting so considerable an influence. Bishop Marsh's writings, though largely superseded by later works, are very valuable for two reasons: they are learned and calm in judgment; and secondly, they direct the way towards a better criticism than had hitherto prevailed. They are: The Authenticity of the Five Books of Moses; Lectures on the Criticism and Interpretation of the Bible; Introduction to the New Testament; and a translation of Michaelis's Introduction to the New Testament. One act of the Bishop exposed him to severe criticism. He was a determined opponent of Calvinism, and he drew up a series of test questions to be put to a candidate for the ministry, for which Sydney Smith attacked him vehemently in the Edinburgh Review.

Marshall, STEPHEN, one of the Sautymnuans [CALAMY, EDMUND], and one of the most influential members of the Westminster Assembly. He also assisted greatly in drawing up a catalogue of fundamental doctrines as a basis of toleration, and was made a Tryer. He died in 1655, and was buried in Westminster Abbey, but his remains were removed at the Restoration. His sermons are very eloquent. The chief are Reformation and Devotion, Sacred Panegyrics, Of the Baptizing of Infants, Right Understanding of the Times. He also wrote A Defence of Infant Baptism.

Marshall, REV. T. W. M., English clergyman, and Roman Catholic convert [b. 1815, d. 1877]. He was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, and became rector of Swallowcliffe, Wilts, but joined the Roman Church in 1848. Before doing so he wrote a learned work, Notes on the Catholic Episcopate. Afterwards he became an Inspector of Schools. His History of Christian Missions is much valued by his co-religionists.

Marshman, JOSHUA [b. 1768, d. 1837], a great missionary, was a Baptist. Until his twenty-sixth year he was a weaver, then became a schoolmaster, and in 1799 sailed for India with Mr. Ward, his wife, and two others, and joined William Carey [CAREY, WILLIAM] at Serampore. Here he laboured for nearly forty years. In 1800 he and Mrs. Marshman opened two boarding schools, the proceeds of which amounted to £1,000 per annum, and afterwards to £2,000. He devoted this, however, to the support of the mission, keeping only £200 himself. With the help of Carey

he opened a college for the instruction of natives. He edited native papers, and published a Chinese Bible, and a key to the Chinese [See further under Missions.]

MARINUS, JOHN, a Benedictine of the ion of St. Maur, was born at Sever in diocese of Aire, in Gascony, A.D. died in Paris in 1717. He was Benedictine at Toulouse in August, applied himself to the study of law, and Scriptural criticism, and a new edition of St. Jerome's works, about which he had disputes with Simon and other writers. In 1711 against Father Peiron he defended authenticity and chronology of the Text of the Old Testament. He published the old Latin version of St. Matthew's Gospel, with French notes; his objects to prove the inspiration of the canonical books; a treatise of the books of the Canon, a tract for expounding the picture of St. Jerome's life, and three other tracts. This Father translated into French; an analytical harmony of a great number of passages in the Old Testament; in Translation, and the New Testament notes taken wholly from the Scriptural volumes.

MARPRELATE Controversy, begun by the publication, in 1588 and a series of seven tracts, purported to have been written by Martin Marprelate, who is supposed to have been a clergyman. The author attacked the episcopacy with much wit and the tracts had a wide circulation, rising to a storm of controversy.

M. POREA. [PORA.]

M. ST., Bishop of Braga, in Portugal, in the sixth century. He was banished, took leave of his country, and travelled into Palestine; he made a voyage into Galicia, where he met Theodemir, an Arian prince; he had been some time Abbot of Dumo, and he was promoted to the Episcopal see. He probably died in 580, and is venerated in the Roman Church on March 11th. Among his works are Formulae vitae de Moribus, a tract consisting of a collection of maxims gathered from various sources which may contain some of Seneca's; a collection of twenty-five canons of the Eastern Church, etc.

M. ST., Bishop of Tours, was born in Hungary, about 316. While his parents removed to Pavia, where he was educated. He from infancy wished to devote himself to the Church, though his parents were idolaters, and at ten years of age he was a catechumen. In 331 an order was issued that all soldiers' sons should bear arms. Martin's father was a military tribune, and the saint was forced to give up his hopes of entering the Church, and became a soldier. He was baptised and preserved his innocence in spite of the many temptations to which he was exposed. After several years' service he quitted the camp, and went to St. Hilary of Poitiers, who wished to ordain him deacon, but, not being able to conquer his humility, made him exorcist. He retired into a monastery in Milan, and in 360 founded the first in France at Loccumagum, now Leugé. Here he is said to have wrought many miracles. In 371 he was made Bishop of Tours. He resided at first near the church, but afterwards retired to a monastery two miles off, the famous Abbey of Marmoutier, which belongs to the Congregation of St. Maur. He showed great zeal for the Church by overthrowing the ancient pagan temples in his diocese, and erecting churches in their place. He died Nov. 11th, 397, and his fame must have spread with marvellous rapidity, for the church of San Martino in Monte, in Rome, existed within a hundred years after his death, and the church of St. Martin's, Canterbury, was dedicated about the middle of the fifth century.

The best known of the legends about St. Martin is, that when a soldier he divided his cloak with a naked beggar. This cloak was for long one of the most valued of French relics, and was carried as a banner in war. It is said that the word "chapel," French chapelle, is derived from "cape," French cape, meaning the tent in which St. Martin's cloak was preserved, and that "chaplain" or chapelain is the person entrusted with the care of it.

MARTIN, HENRY, a great missionary, was born at Truro, 1781, the son of a miner who had risen to be head clerk in a merchant's office. Henry was educated at the Truro Grammar-school, and was sent at the age of fourteen as candidate for a scholarship at Corpus Christi College, Oxford, which he just failed to obtain. Two years later he went to St. John's College, Cambridge, and in 1801 was Senior Wrangler. The death of his father, in 1799, had turned his thoughts to religion; he realised that the distinction he had gained was inadequate to bring him happiness, and in 1802 he made up his mind to become a missionary, following the example of David Brainerd, the story of whose life had much impressed him. While preparing for ordination he employed his time as Tutor at Cambridge, where he had been elected Fellow of St. John's College. He was ordained in 1803, and became Curate at Lolworth till 1805, when he started for India as a chaplain of the East India Company. He arrived at Calcutta in April, 1806, but did not go to his appointed station at Dinapore till September, in consequence of a fever which attacked him immediately upon his arrival, and in which he was tended by other English missionaries. He was on the most cordial terms with Carey, who writes delightfully about him. His work during his missionary life was carried on at Dinapore and Cawnpore, where he laboured among the English soldiers and residents, preached to the natives, and made for them a translation of the New Testament, which was so highly esteemed that he set about a translation of the same into Persian. Not satisfied with the results he prepared to take a journey into Persia in order to perfect himself in the language, and in January, 1811, he embarked in a vessel bound for the Persian Gulf. He went to Shiraz, where he completed his translation, and also translated the Psalms. Martyn was welcomed by the Mahometans of Shiraz, and invited to enter into a discussion with their chief, which lasted for a long time and produced no very satisfactory results. He afterwards proceeded to Tebriz, the residence of the English Ambassador, Sir Gore Ouseley, who treated him with hospitality, and undertook the publication of the New Testament translation, which was completed in February, 1812. Here, again, Martyn was engaged in discussions with Mahometan priests, and this time it might have gone hard with him but for the protection of the Ambassador. On his recovery from a severe fever, by which he was again attacked at Tebriz, Martyn decided on going to Constantinople on his way to England, as his health did not permit of his resuming his work without a period of rest. He also hoped to induce a lady, Miss Lydia Grenfell, to whom he had long been attached, to accompany him back to India on his return. He travelled as far as Tocat with rapidly decreasing strength, and here he died, in October, 1812, with none but strangers to attend him. He was buried at Tocat in the Armenian cemetery.

Martyr.—This word is Greek for a “witness,” and is applied by St. Paul and St. John to our Lord, “Jesus Christ the faithful witness” [Gr. martyr]. In common Christian usage the word is confined to one who suffers death by reason of his witness or testimony to the truth of the Gospel. According to this use of the word, the first Christian martyr was St. Stephen, and we learn by St. Paul’s confession of the part which he took in persecuting the Christians at Jerusalem [Acts xxvi. 10] that there were others who suffered martyrdom in the persecution which followed St. Stephen’s death. Each outburst of persecution—and they were many—added many noble names to the list of witnesses, and each Church jealously preserved the memory of those, its sons and daughters, who counted not their lives dear unto themselves. That subsequent generations might be fortified to bear the same noble witness, if called upon to do so, by the recollection of their fortitude, steps were taken to record in minute detail the circumstances connected with their trials, the questions put to them, the answers they made, and whatever passed during their examination, imprisonment, and execution. These “gesta martyrum” were read during the time of Divine Service on the day on which their death was commemorated—a day which was beautifully called their birthday, as the day on which they were born to endless life. These commemorations frequently took place at the tombs of the martyrs. On these days it was customary for a sermon to be preached in which the constancy and faithfulness of the martyr was held up for the imitation of the congregation. It would appear that shortly after the Whitsun Festival, and, therefore probably on the Sunday now called Trinity Sunday, a festival was kept in commemoration of all the martyrs. With regard to the honor thus paid to the memory of the martyrs, St. Augustine explains that they were “to be honoured for their imitable and worthy examples, not to be worshipped for religion.”

Martyr, PETER, one of the Continental Reformers of the time of Edward VI, was born at Florence in the year 1500. He became an Augustinian monk, and acquired a great reputation for learning and eloquence. He was favourably impressed by the works of Zwinglius and Bucer, and was at length induced to embrace the Reformed opinions by the arguments of Valdes, a Spanish lawyer. Leaving Italy he went to Switzerland, and thence to Strassburg, where he settled for a time, and married a nun who had become Protestant. In 1549 he was invited, with his friend Bucer, to England by Edward VI, and made Professor of Divinity at Oxford. His influence largely contributed to the revision of the first Prayer Book, and the issue of the second. He died and was buried at Oxford, and his bones were exhumed and burnt in Mary’s reign.

Martyrology.—A list of martyrs and other saints, with the Services connected with them. The martyrologists drew their materials from the calendars of particular Churches. The original martyrologies are lost in antiquity. Those reckoned to Eusebius and Jerome are spurious. Bede, in the beginning of the eighth century, compiled two martyrologies, one in prose and another in verse; but that which goes under his name is full of later additions. Florus, the deacon of Lyons, living in the ninth century, enlarged Bede’s martyrology, and put it almost in the condition it is at present. Valdebertus, a monk of the diocese of Treves, living in the middle of the ninth century, wrote a martyrology in verse, extracted from Bede and Florus, and now inserted in the fifth volume of Dechen’s Spicilegium. About the same time Rabanus Maurus, Archbishop of Mentz, drew up a martyrology, published by Canisius in the ninth tome of his Antique Lectiones; after these Addi-

and succeeding centuries several writers, both of the Greek and Latin Churches, compiled acts of the martyrs and saints' lives as their fancy directed them, which afterwards crept into the offices of the Church. Simeon Metaphrastes, a Greek author of the ninth century, was somewhat noted for this. 5. Other writers, who had no gift for discrimination, threw all sorts of legendary romances into the lives of saints and martyrs, without examining whether they had even an air of probability about them. 6. Bollandus, and those that came after him, exercised a little more judgment, but undoubtedly have inserted many spurious pieces in their collection.

The martyrology is read in monastic houses at Rome, and is followed by the versicle, "Precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of His saints."

Maruthas.—A Mesopotamian Bishop who was present at the Council of Antioch, which was called against the Messalians, A.D. 390. He assisted at the assembly of the bishops who met at Chalcedon against St. Chrysostom; but, having discovered the insincerity and passion of this Bishop's enemies, he went over to his party. It appears by one of St. Chrysostom's epistles that they held a correspondence, that Maruthas was imprisoned, and that St. Chrysostom solicited his discharge. Maruthas was sent Ambassador by the Emperor Arcadius to Isdegerdes, King of Persia, who gave him an honourable reception, and permitted him to build as many churches in his dominions as he had occasion for. This prelate was very successful in propagating Christianity in Persia. Socrates, the ecclesiastical historian, reports that nothing but death prevented Isdegerdes from declaring himself a Christian. The date of Maruthas's death is unknown; but he is commemorated Dec. 4th. He was author of The Acts of the Martyrs who suffered in Sapor's Persecution; Odes in their Honour; a History of the Council of Nice; a Syrian Liturgy; and Commentaries on the Gospels.

Masorites or Masoretes. — The name given to the Rabbis who made it their special work to correct the faults which had crept into the text of the Old Testament during the Babylonish captivity, and to prevent, for the future, its being corrupted by any alteration. The name is derived from Masora, i.e. "tradition," or from Massorah, "to bind." They first separated the apocryphal from the canonical books; and divided the latter into twenty-two books, being the number of letters in the Hebrew alphabet; they then divided each book into sections and verses. They counted all the words and letters of each section; and because there were words which were to be read otherwise than they were written, and which contained more or less letters than those that were to be pronounced, they made marginal notes, called Cetib, the manner of writing, and Keri, the manner of reading. They observed likewise the anomaly or irregularity of several words, as to the vowels or accents. It is said that they were the inventors of those points which serve instead of vowels. There is a great difference of opinion as to what time the Masorah was written, but it was probably not all accomplished in one century; but was finished in the tenth or eleventh century. There were several editions, varying considerably, but the received and authoritative text is that of Jacob ben-Chajim ibn Adonijah, who carefully sifted and arranged the previous works on the subject. It was published in 1524. A very interesting account of the Masoretic writings has been published by Dr. Ginsburg.

Mass.—A word derived from the phrase, Ita missa est, used in the Latin Church to signify that the service was over, and the congregation might leave. From this use the word came to denote any Church service; e.g., missa catechumenorum, the service at which the catechumens were allowed to be present; missa fidelium, the Holy Eucharist, at which the faithful only attended; vespertinalis missa, evening prayer. Subsequently it was applied only to the Communion Service, which was then known by the name of The Mass. [For The Mass of the Presanctified, see GOOD FRIDAY.]

Mass Priests are priests specially appointed to say masses for the souls of the dead in chantries or at particular altars. They were formerly Secular priests, as distinguished from Regulars.

Massillon, JEAN BAPTISTE, one of the most famous of French preachers, was born at Hyères, in Provence, 1663. He early entered the Congregation of the Oratory; but his father, wishing that his son should succeed him as a notary, withdrew him before he had completed his studies. Massillon, however, gained permission to return to the college in 1681, and began to study theology, and then to teach it in the diocese of Meaux. His first attempt in the pulpit was at Vienne, where he preached a funeral oration over M. Villars, the Archbishop, which was so successful that he was called to Paris, and gave a course of ecclesiastical conferences in the Seminary of St. Magloire, which established his reputation. Here he had the opportunity of hearing Bourdaloue, whom he did not take for his model, but who had great influence over him. Massillon did not use any of the declamatory or theatrical action which was then so popular in France, but supplied its place by great earnestness and impressiveness of look and manner. He preached an Advent course of sermons at Versaille before Louis XIV., who, it is said, said, "that when he heard other great preachers he felt satisfied with them, but when he heard Massillon he felt dissatisfied with himself." He again preached at Versailles during Lent, 1704, and the King expressed his approbation, but for some unknown reason did not invite him again. In 1709 he preached a funeral oration over the Prince of Conti, which was considered at the time one of his greatest triumphs of oratory, but when published, was severely criticised. At the death of Louis XIV., Massillon was chosen Bishop of Clermont, and in 1717 he was appointed Lent preacher before Louis XV., on which occasion he preached the celebrated set of ten sermons called Le Petit Carême. In 1719 he was consecrated to his bishopric, and was elected a member of the Academy. In 1723 he preached a funeral oration of the Duchess of Orléans, his last public discourse in Paris; and from that time gave himself up to the affairs of his diocese, where he was beloved for his piety and gentleness. He put a stop to the numerous processions which took place, and to other superstitious customs. He died of apoplexy in 1742, at the age of 79. His works, consisting chiefly of sermons and conferences, were collected and published by his nephew, in 1745 and 1746.

Massingberd, FRANCIS CHAMBERLAIN, an Anglican Church writer [b. 1800, d. 1870], educated at Magdalen College, Oxford, where he took his degree in 1822, became rector of South Ormsby, Lincolnshire, in 1825, and remained there till his death. He was appointed Prebendary of Lincoln in 1831, and Chancellor of the Cathedral in 1834. He aimed at restoring the power of Convocation, and made untiring efforts in the cause. His most important of his literary works is History of the English Reformation, published in 1857. He also wrote lectures on the Prayer Book, and a number of religious pamphlets.

Master of the Sacred Palace is a dignity conferred by the Roman Curia, believed to have been first held by St. Peter. Originally the holder of this office was required to take charge of the sermons in the Pope's palace and the attendants of the Pope, and to instruct them in religious matters. His duties have now been extended, and he has the right of appointing ecclesiastics before the Pope on important occasions, of conferring degrees in philosophy and theology, and of controlling the publication of books in Rome.

Master of the Sentences—a title given to Peter Lombard [Lombardus], of the Sentences—that is, a col-lences or passages taken from the Fathers, bearing on the fundamentals of the Church.

ism.—As the word implies, Materialism is merely with matter, with that which we can appreciate with our senses.
It says that nothing at all exists but matter, and that there is no such thing as a separate spirit. There is no God and no Heaven which can hold communion with God, since God is nonmaterial. Materialism is the basis, in one form or nearly all forms of unbelief.
It denies that there is a God,
the story of our own being and of the world as we know it has to be explained by Matter. Pantheism regards God as a living principle or impersonal world; God and Nature become one idea; matter is merged into
God. Deism has to explain
the origin of matter and life. Deism, Rationalism admit that God exists, but that, having once done his work, he has no further part in its governance; it to be regulated by fixed laws. Materialism got over, but a phase of Materialism is called in to explain how the world exists without a Divine Ruler. So the Materialist makes a clean sweep even of God, ascribing it merely to matter, and he, too, has only matter with. [ATHEISM, PANTHEISM, DEISM.] Materialism merges into Atheism, and its creed is, "There is nothing but matter."

The history of Materialism is a long one.
The whole history of mankind.
The look to which it leads is before us of the "Preacher," "Vanity is vanity." It seems to have been in the Chinese Empire early in the century before Christ, and earlier still in the time of Democritus, B.C. 460, first proposed the atomic theory," still held, with modifications by Materialists at the present time. It holds that matter is eternal, that minute atoms incapable of division exist between them. He derived the fire atoms. Epicurus, maintained that much of the un-degradation of mankind arose from the dread which they entertained of the wrath of the gods in this life. To remove these fears from the gods dwelt in sublime and were indifferent to the world and its wants, and he sought to show that the universe was not created by the union of elementary atoms, but existed from all eternity, and were governed by simple laws. Lucretius, a Latin poet, about three hundred years later, tried to popularise and make these views attractive in a long poem, De Rerum Natura, in which, whilst he apostrophised the gods, he yet sought to free his countrymen from the tyranny of their religious beliefs. He begins with the axiom that nothing can be produced from nothing, and that nothing can be reduced to nothing, and then goes on to define the ultimate atoms, infinite in number, which, together with vacant space, infinite in extent, constitute the universe. Generally speaking, these principles are maintained by modern Materialistic writers. Sir W. Thomson, however, holds that the primary substance is a perfect fluid which fills all space, atoms being only the rotating portions of this fluid.

These atoms are, however, only objects of faith to the Materialist, for they have never been seen. Lucretius endowed atoms with the power of motion and of free will, and thus he endeavoured to show how they came together to make a beginning of organised nature;
whilst Materialists of the present day deny the power of motion to atoms and, of course, of free will. Man, they say, is a Necessitarian, he has no free will, since all his passions and thoughts are mere functions of organised substance.

During the long conflict between Christ-ianity and Paganism, Materialism, as a philosophy, passed out of sight, but again came into power at the time of the French Revolution, when "There is no God in heaven, no soul in man, no future life" was the creed
of many of the rulers of the French people.
Modern English Materialism made a fresh start with H. G. Atkinson and Harriet Martineau, and at the present time, the writings of Professors Tyndall and Huxley state the Materialistic argument in a powerful as well as attractive manner, although it is only just to say that these gentlemen do not call themselves Materialists, and indeed deny some of the apparently logical materialistic conclusions.

Origin of the Universe according to Materialists.—Allowing the existence of atoms, Mate-rialists now rely on the law of gravitation to explain the movements of atoms whereby they came together and formed the various kinds of matter, organised and unorganised, with which we are acquainted. This law is "that every body attracts every other body with a force proportional to their masses conjointly, and to the square of their distances apart inversely." Hence, they say, the atoms would come together of themselves; but in order that they may do this, it has further to be assumed either that the atoms are of different sizes,
or that they are at unequal distances apart, since, if they were all equal in size and all equidistant, there could be no motion, their mutual attractions exactly balancing each other. But this assumption is fatal to the theory, since—matter being a single substance, and hence uniformly divided—it would have to be allowed that some other power had collected matter into unequal atoms, or had set these at varying distances apart. This position is in no way altered by using the terms energy and force. Energy is defined by physicists to be the power of doing work ; force, the rate at which that work is done. The energy which moves atoms must—as there is nothing but matter divided into atoms—be resident in them, but this will not help to explain how they first moved together, since physical science declares that energy is locked up in matter, and only becomes active in consequence of some previous energy exerted, i.e., of some work done (for example, the stone cannot fall to the ground until it has been, by work, lifted up ; the spring cannot recoil until it has been first bent). Hence, to unloose the pent-up energy of the atoms, to convert what is called potential into actual energy, there would be wanted the exercise of some previous energy altogether outside matter, and therefore unknown to Materialists. Materialism, then, fails to explain how the universe was first formed, and we are compelled to go back for an explanation of this to some great First Cause—in short, to God. Supposing, however, the difficulty of starting the universe to be surmounted, Materialists then make great strides with the help of the doctrine of Evolution, since, to a large extent, they are treading on firm and sure ground ; but again they break down when they try to explain, by its means, man's spirit and intellect, and moral sense. [EVOLUTION.]

There remains to be discussed the origin of life. How does Materialism explain this ? Living things, whether plants or animals, from the lowest to the highest, feed, grow, and reproduce themselves : these are the signs of life. Besides living things, there are the various lifeless substances making up the soil, and the air and water. Where is the point of contact between living and non-living things ? It has been discovered that plants have the power of taking up the various constituents of soil, water, and air, and converting them into living matter—in short, of feeding upon them ; whilst animals can only feed upon living matter, or that which has once lived—on plants or other animals. Hence we have non-living matter converted into living matter, but only by a living agent. Is there any evidence to prove that any form of life can be developed out of matter without life ? Professors Tyndall and Huxley admit that they cannot point to any proof that life can be developed, except from previous life. Life can only be produced from some living germ. Here again the Materialist theory breaks down ; it fails altogether to explain the origin of life.

Materialism necessarily dispenses with Religion ; it denies the existence of God, of the soul, of a future life ; hence prayer and worship have no meaning. It likewise undermines the basis of Morals. Man, being a complicated aggregation of atoms governed by physical laws, is altogether responsible for his actions. A man who is intelligent enough can have no conscience, no sense of sin, no idea of right or wrong. Harriet Martineau as we have finally dismissed all objection to a superior lawless will, perplexing notions of sin and responsibility. . . the relief is like that of coming out of a cave full of painted shadows into the open sky." Another Materialist, Vogt, expressed himself with great plainness: "No free will does not exist, neither does responsibility or responsibility, such as justice, and Heaven knows what we can impose upon us. At no moment are we our own masters any more than we are the secretion of our kidneys. The will cannot govern itself ; it is governed by the law of its material combination. It is impossible to demonstrate the administration of punishment." Such is Materialism and its logical conclusions. Many Materialists are vastly better than this creed. But it is a mistake to attribute their defects to their Materialism. It is due rather to their training, and to the silent influence of centuries of Christian habits and feelings. They are unknowing witnesses to the life of Christianity, which compels them to its high moral standard.

Mather Family.—This family is celebrated in the history of religion and begins with Richard Mather, born in Wiltshire in 1596. He was ordained in the English Church, but, being a Puritan, went to New England and founded a congregation at Dorchester, that State, which he kept till his death. He left six sons, four of whom followed his profession, the youngest of whom, Increase, was President of Harvard College and one of the most religious writers of his time. His daughter, Maria Cotton, the daughter of his first wife, and became the father of Cotton Mather [1667, d. 1729], the most renowned of the Puritan preachers, a zealous pastor, a great preacher, a zealous pastor, a theologist. He printed 382 works, 4 folio, and left many in manuscript. His life, however, came down to us more from his folly than through his good deeds, which were conspicuous. He wrote, in 1689, a treatise against witchcraft, in which he declared that witches were possessed with dead languages, that they had learned of the devil, and merited the heavenly punishments. He was thereby the cause of innocent blood being shed, and so late that he "had gone too far." It should be remembered that other good men were above a like superstition ; among them Matthew Hale. Franklin speaks of

to do good. His son, Samuel, the pastor of a congregation at it was not a large one, and died

THEOBALD, the apostle of Ireland, was born at Thomasberry, 1790. His father died when his children were young, and Theobald was educated by the Countess of Llandaff and Elizabeth Mathew to the Academy at Acaenny, and thence to Maynooth, where he became a priest of the Roman Church in 1814, and went to Cork Capuchin Monastery, where he exercised his influence over rich and poor, and established a society for visiting the model of those of St. Vincent. One of his fellow-workers was in, a Quaker, who was greatly interested in the total abstinence question, and he, on April 10th, 1838, joined the society, and from that time gave himself to the work. His success was such that in nine months 200,000 persons, many of Cork, had taken the pledge. Content with this, he travelled in Ireland, Scotland, and England, and was in America, travelling as far as New York. He was almost penniless, as his income had been a distillery, which was now shut up. He was deeply in debt, but Her Majesty, in recognition of his services, gave him an annuity of £300, and more was raised by subscription. He died at Queensberry, 1856, having been for some time unable to work by his failing health. A monument was put up to him in Cork.

COUNTRESS OF TUSCANY [b. 1046, daughter of Boniface, Marquis of Provence, whose father had been an adherent of the Emperor in his struggle with the Pope, and had changed sides towards the close of the twelfth century. He was followed in this by his son, who succeeded to his possessions in central Italy at a very early age. The most strenuous of the supporters of the Pope against Henry IV., carried off by Gregory's death, and his reputation for courage and his affairs. Mathilde was married to Godfrey of Lorraine, and afterwards to the Welf of Bavaria, from whom descended the Emperors.]

The name given to the first of the hours of prayer which were used before the Reformation. It is now out of daybreak. The name is now in the Prayer Book synonymous with Morning Prayer.

Paris [b. early in the thirteenth century], supposed by some to have been educated in Paris, though the fact of his surname is the only foundation for such a belief. In 1217 he entered the Cluniac monastery at St. Albans. His learning gained him the esteem of Henry III., who granted, at his request, certain privileges to the University of Oxford. He died in 1259. His chief work was the Historia Anglica Major, extending from 1066 to 1259, the first part of which was copied from the Chronicle of Roger of Wendover. It was continued after his death by another monk till 1573.

Matthew of Westminster, so called because he was a Benedictine in the monastery of that city. He is surnamed Florilegus, because he entitled his history Flores Historiarum. He lived in the fourteenth century; little is known of his personal history. His history is divided into three books. The first treats of the chief events from the time of the Creation till our Saviour's birth; the second carries down the history to William the Conqueror; and the third reaches from the Norman Conquest till the death of Edward I., in whose time he lived. He also wrote a chronicle of his own monastery.

Maundy Thursday. [HOLY WEEK.]

Maur, St., a Congregation of the Order of Benedictines in France. In the Middle Ages this order had sunk very low, and in the beginning of the seventeenth century attempts were made to revive it. Didier de la Cour established in Lorraine the austere branch of St. Vanne, and it was proposed to unite to it all the Benedictine monasteries of France. But, instead, a monk of St. Vanne, named Dom Bénard, was charged by Louis XIII., in 1618, to establish a new order, and this was confirmed by Pope Gregory XV. in 1621. It was placed under the patronage of St. Maur. The Order was divided into sixteen provinces, each of which had about twenty religious houses. In Paris the most celebrated monastery was that of St. Germain-des-Prés, but there were also those of St. Denis and of the Blancs Manteaux. There was also the monastery of St. Remigius, at Rheims, Marmoutier, etc. The monks, besides following the rule of St. Benedict, had particular statutes and constitutions; they had a Superior-General, who was elected for life, and assistants and visitors, and they held a general chapter every three years. They made, in addition to their religious vows, a particular profession of learning, and had seminaries in each province for the education of the young. What the Congregation of St. Maur has done for history cannot be overestimated. To them we owe all the Benedictine editions of the Fathers. It is impossible to enumerate all the works they have produced, but among the more important are the Gallia Christiana, the Histoire Littéraire de la France, the Art de Vérifier les Dates, the Annals of the Benedictine Order, and Lives of Benedictine Saints. These two last were written by Mabillon; other celebrated writers are Martène, Tassin, Montfaucon, etc. The Congregation was suppressed in 1792.

Maurice, ELECTOR OF SAXONY [b. 1521, d. 1553]. Under the teaching of his father he had embraced the Reformation and signed the Articles of Smalcald; but being ambitious, and desirous of gaining favour with Charles V. at the Diet of Ratisbon, in 1546, he made a secret treaty with the Emperor against his uncle, the Elector of Saxony, and the Landgrave of Hesse, the two principal Protestant princes, and invaded his uncle's dominions whilst he was away fighting against the Emperor in the cause of religion and liberty. The Elector hearing this, directed his march homeward; but was pursued by the Emperor, and the two armies met at Mühlberg, on the Rhine, on April 24th, 1547, and the Elector was completely defeated, and taken prisoner. The Emperor then made Maurice Elector, in the room of his uncle, John Frederic. Philip, Landgrave of Hesse, whose daughter, Agnes, Maurice had married, was persuaded by his son-in-law Maurice to submit to the Emperor, and by him was treacherously kept in prison. This revolution seemed to complete the ruin of the Protestant cause, and at the Diet of Augsburg in 1548 the Emperor required of the Protestants that they would leave the decision of these religious contests to the wisdom of the Council that was to meet at Trent. To these proposals, Maurice, amongst others, consented; but as by his treaty with the Emperor he was to be left unfettered in religious matters, he refused to accept the Interim which had been drawn up at Augsburg, and held a conference at Leipzig, headed by Melancthon, to modify that rule; but even that was not acceptable to his subjects. Maurice gave his consent to the re-establishing of the Council of Trent only on certain conditions: 1. That the points of doctrine which had been already decided there should be re-examined and discussed anew. 2. That this examination should be made in presence of the Protestant divines or their deputies. 3. That the Saxon Protestants should have the liberty of voting as well as deliberating in the Council. 4. That the Pope should not pretend to preside in that assembly either in person or by his legates. Maurice had no intention of submitting to the Emperor's views; he only yielded in appearance that he might carry his point, and thus in reality take the command.

All the princes of Europe had for a long time addressed their united entreaties to the Emperor for the deliverance of the Landgrave of Hesse and the Elector of Saxony from their imprisonment, but these solicitations had no effect, and Maurice, who ardently desired the liberation of his father-in-law Philip, determined to break with the Emperor, and with the utmost secrecy entered into an alliance with the King of France and several German princes. He then marched at the head of a formidable army against the Emperor in 1552, and surprised Charles at Landau where he was protected by a mere handful of troops. Thus alarmed, the Emperor was willing to make peace on almost any conditions, and consequently he shortly afterwards concluded at Passau the famous pacification with the Protestants. [TREATY OF.] He also promised six months to assemble a Diet, in which all the tumults and dissensions in religion should be removed. Thus did those who had been foremost in opposing the Emperor now procure for themselves peace and liberty. Maurice, however, did not live to see the happy issue of this peace, for he lost his life in the following year, a wound received at the battle of Siegen while he was fighting against the Emperor at Brandenburg.

Maurice, FREDERICK DENISON [b. 1802, d. 1872], was born at Normanston, Norfolk. His father was a Unitarian who took pupils. They removed to Clifton, and then to Frenchay, near Bristol. The religious difficulties of home were a great trial to him; dissatisfied with the father's views, for a while they all became Calvinists, his mother became a Baptist, and he himself being first strongly influenced by Wesleyanism, went into different forms of Unitarianism, some of them finally joined the Church of England. Anxious to escape the difficulties of his position, Frederick Maurice chose the ministry for his profession, and in October, 1823, entered Trinity College, Cambridge. Here he made acquaintance with Sterling and John Addington Symonds, who had a marked influence on him. He passed his LL.B. examination, took a first class; but left college without a degree, as he was unable on conscientious grounds to subscribe the Thirty-nine Articles of the Church of England. On leaving Cambridge he began working in London, either at the bar or as a conveyancer, and was employed for the Westminster Review. In 1825 he became editor of the Athenaeum. In 1826 year he felt a growing inclination to the Church of England and took holy orders at length, towards the close of 1829, he resided himself at Exeter College, Oxford, scrupulously anxious to remove from himself of subscribing the forty-two Articles of his former university, and determined to begin afresh. On March 29th, 1830, he was baptised as a member of the Church of England, and in Jan., 1833, he was appointed the curacy of Bubbenhall, in Warwickshire. Here he remained till the end of 1834, when he undertook the most important work of his life, a History of Moral and Political Philosophy. From the moment of growth of his spirit in Catholicism. In 1836 he seemed to be the Oxford tract writers, a pamphlet, Subscription no the liberalism of Hampden. Newman, who saw it, made it one of the Tracts.

Maurice's instincts taught him more divergencies than between him and the great pamphlet was not included in came the breach; it arose on baptism (No. 67, Tracts). In answer to it, Maurice wrote a Quaker on Baptism, letters that followed it, made a well-known work, The. In these letters Maurice of religious newspaper of d; the paper retorted, and varied the war between them.

He was Chaplain of Guy's Hospital, Professor of English Literature at King's College, London, respectively. In the latter he was Chaplain of Lincoln's Inn, great name as a preacher.

He made a fierce attack upon the of Mr. Ward when the from Oxford. In 1847 his giving the higher education of called on to teach, led to the men's College, Harley Street, the pioneer to many like 1849, in co-operation with he founded the party known "Socialists." The name of ver, caused his teaching to a suspicion, the Quarterly article against him, and ipal of King's, took fright, Maurice to vindicate himself.

He was appointed by the Council of writings, who agreed that hing inconsistent with his of Divinity in the College. ain in hot religious contro- logical Essays, published fly addressed to Unitarians, which the Record declared, and to involve the denial ment. Working Men's College, and here he gathered around him as teachers Messrs. Ruskin, T. Hughes, Lowes Dickinson, Rossetti, etc. Thus his time was as fully occupied as ever, and yet he found time for his Sermons on Sacrifice, his Commentary on the writings of St. John, and the elaborated edition of his History of Moral and Metaphysical Philosophy.

In 1858 came his pamphlet controversy with Mansel about his Bampton Lectures; Maurice believed that he detected in them an atheistical tendency, and loudly raised his voice against them. In 1860 he was appointed Incumbent of St. Peter's, Vere Street, and once more the Record uttered a loud protest, the result of which was that some of the clergy memorialised Bishop Tait not to collate him. This was in vain, and the protest, which contained no names of eminence, was met by a counter address from many of the most renowned theologians in England. His incumbency there was a very happy one until Colenso's book on the Pentateuch appeared. Maurice was inexpressibly shocked; he had a chivalrous regard for Colenso, who had shown him great kindness, but he could not endure the thought of being supposed to share his views, and he believed that the resignation of his living would be taken as a protest against them. But his friends earnestly dissuaded him from this step, and Bishop Tait refused to accept his resignation. In 1866 he was elected to the Professorship of Casuistry or Moral Philosophy at Cambridge, a post in every way congenial to him. Three years later, finding his health unequal to the two-fold duties, he resigned St. Peter's, Vere Street, and gave his whole time to Cambridge. In 1870 he accepted the charge of the small parish of St. Edward, Cambridge, and in 1871 was appointed Whitehall Preacher. He died in London on Easter Monday, 1872.

Maurice was a profound thinker and an acute critic, but his influence was mainly due to the wonderful beauty of his personal character. He seemed to those who knew him most intimately to be absolutely free from any taint of selfishness, pure and saintly in life and conversation, humble, gentle, lovable. No one who ever came in contact with him forgot the impression of his depth and earnestness and devotion of character. To his pupils, when lecturing, he seemed as one inspired; the expression of his face had that wonderful blending of humility and authority which constrained all who heard him to listen with a reverence they felt for no one else. Few persons had so wide an influence on their generation during their lifetime, and Maurice will always be remembered as one of the greatest leaders of thought in this century. His two most important works are his History of Philosophy and Kingdom of Christ. Of his many volumes of expositions The Prophets and Kings of the Old Testament are probably the best.

Maury, JEAN SIFFREIN, Cardinal, was born June 26th, 1746, at Vaurean, in Venaissin. He was educated at the Seminary of St. Gerde, at Avignon, and in 1764 went on to Paris, where he took orders. In 1772 he preached an eulogy on Fénelon, which was highly approved of, and was appointed Vicar-General of the Bishop of Lombard. However, he soon returned to Paris, and delivered two orations on St. Louis and St. Augustine, which secured his popularity as a preacher, and he was then advanced to the abbacy of Frenade, and became also preacher to King Louis XVI. In 1785 he gained the benefice of the priory of Lioris, and was elected deputy of the States-General in 1789. Here he became a noted orator of the aristocratic party, and was strongly opposed to Mirabeau. In 1790 the decree was passed requiring all ecclesiastics to swear to uphold the new constitution. Maury among many others refused, on the ground that it was hostile to the interests of the Church, and fled to Rome, where he was warmly received by Pope Pius VI., and was, in 1794, made Bishop in partibus of Niema, a Cardinal, and afterwards Bishop of Montefiascone and Corneto. In 1799 he became for a time Ambassador to the exiled Louis XVIII., who was residing at Mittau; but when the Roman Church was reconciled to Napoleon, Maury wrote him a letter on August 22nd, 1804, which resulted in the Cardinal's reconciliation with the French Government, and in May, 1806, he returned to Paris. He became a great favourite with Napoleon, who, in 1810, made him Archbishop of Paris, but a disagreement having arisen between Napoleon and the Pope, the latter was very angry when the Cardinal accepted the appointment. He was deprived, in 1814, on the return of the Bourbons, and went to Rome, but was imprisoned in the Castle of San Angelo, and not released till he had resigned his See of Montefiascone, retiring on a pension. He died on May 11th, 1817. His principal works are Essai sur l'Éloquence de la Chaire, and Lettres sur l'État actuel de la Religion et du Clergé de France.

Maximus, St., was born at Constantinople, in 580, of a noble family, and soon rose to esteem by his piety and learning. He was engaged by the Emperor Heraclius to write a history of the emperors; but when his patron joined the Monothelites, Maximus retired to the Monastery of Chrysopolis, where he soon became Abbot. Observing that heresy gained ground in the East, he travelled to Rome, Africa, and other provinces, raising his voice against it. In 646 he held a celebrated discussion with Pyrrhus, who had been his predecessor at Chrysopolis, and was now Patriarch of Constantinople, but had adopted Monothelitism and been driven from his episcopal throne. At the conclusion of the debate, Pyrrhus abjured his errors and was received back into the Church. This, which was the heaviest blow the Nestorian heresy had yet received, raised the reputation of Maximus, and many crowded about him. In 649 he was the mainstay of the assembling of the Lateran Synod of Martin I. against the heresy. In 650 Constantine II., who favoured the Nestorians, had Maximus seized, with the two monks, and banished into Thracia, where the Bishop of Bessa, visited them, and attempted to pervert their faith, but did not succeed. Maximus and his disciples were then sent to Constantinople, where their long right hands were cut off, and they were imprisoned in the castle of St. Peter. Maximus died, Aug. 13th, 662.

Maximus was one of the most able writers of his age. He wrote upon Scriptures, an ascetic discourse; liturgical, devotional, and polemical treatises; dialogues upon the Trinity; a discourse upon the ceremonies of the Church; and commentaries upon the works bearing the name of Dionysius the Areopagite. His interpretation was that of the allegorical divines, full of discoveries of allegorical Old Testament narratives. The Greeks afterwards drew largely from his works.

May.—This month is held by the Catholics to be specially the month of the blessed Virgin. Her altar is decked with special hymns sung in her honour. Brief of Pope Pius VII., in 1814, granted a hundred days' indulgence was granted to all who should mark the season by prayer, communion, and prayer, for the intentions of the Pope, at this season.

Maynooth College, County Kildare, Ireland.—A Roman Catholic College founded in 1795, by an Act of the Irish Parliament, to supply the place of the French College, which the Irish clergy had formerly been obliged to send their students to, and which had been destroyed during the French Revolution. The original endowment was settled by an annual vote of £2,000, which was continued, in spite of great opposition, after the Union. In 1846 Sir Robert Peel succeeded, with difficulty, in carrying a bill for a permanent endowment of £10,000 per year, and a grant of £30,000 for the purposes. By the Irish Church Act of 1869 the grant ceased after 1871, and an annual sum of £372,331 was appropriated to the support of the College. The College receives students, all destined for the priestly course, lasts over eight years, of which the first four are devoted to classics, two to philosophy, and four to Hebrew and Irish, Scripture, Canon Law, and Church history. The students, 250 in number, receive £100 annually. The College is possessed of extensive estates in county Meath, left by Lord Boyle, Roman Catholic Bishop of Meath, which yield £400 per annum, and Mission.—This is a mission : in 1872 by the Rev. R. W. Congregational minister at nca-shire. The first station l-leville, the artizan district, are twenty-five missions in environs, and sixty in other in Corsica, and in Algiers. umber of mission stations is ninety-four, containing 15,135 sittings. There were in 1884 10,441 meetings for adults, attend-od by 729,756 persons. There are, besides services, " Sociétés Fraternelles," which consist of a Sunday school, Bible class, and a catechism exercise for grown up people. There is also a juvenile mission, which in 1884 held 4,150 meetings, attended by 171,398 children. The income is derived from the Foreign Evangelisation Society, the Evangelical Continental Society, and from auxiliary societies in London and other parts of England, in Scotland, the United States, Australia, France, and Switzerland. It amounted in 1884 to £14,473 12s. 1d., and the expenditure to £13,981 15s. 11d. The object of the mission is to evangelise the poorer classes of France, and this work has been wonderfully blessed. Tracts, parts of the Bible, etc., are distributed in the streets, and simple services with short sermons and many hymns are regularly held in the mission rooms. In April, 1884, a new station was opened on the Boulevards to attract the artisans, etc., who spend their evenings there. At St. Etienne there is a medical mission connected with the other work. Much good was done in Marseilles during the cholera, both in instructing the people on the laws of health and in attending the sick.

McCaul, ALEXANDER [b. 1798, d. 1863], a learned Hebraist, began his ministerial work as a missionary for the Society for the Conversion of the Jews. He was Professor of Hebrew, and afterwards of Ecclesiastical History in King's College, London, and Prebendary of St. Paul's. He wrote many books on Hebrew subjects, as:—A Comparison of Modern Judaism with the Religion of Moses and the Prophets, Lectures on the Prophecies, and the Messiahship of Jesus.

McCheyne, ROBERT MURRAY [b. 1813, d. 1843], Scottish Pastor and Missionary, began his ministerial life at Larbert, Stirlingshire, 1835, and next year was called to St Peter's, Dundee, which he held till his death. In 1838, his health giving way, he went to Palestine, employing his time by enquiring into the present condition of the Jews. The published results were very valuable for the information they gave concerning the Holy Land. In fact, subsequent works, such as Dr. Robinson's, Dean Stanley's, and Canon Tristram's, are the carrying on of what McCheyne began. Returning to his parish and finding it flourishing under his locum tenens, William Burns, he again started on Evangelistic enquiries, and twice visited Ireland. He died before he had reached thirty, but the publication of his Memoirs and Remains by Bonar was a revelation of a most beautiful and pious life, and it 'as become a religious classic, having gone through more than 100 editions.

McCrie, THOMAS, D D., a Scottish divine [b. 1772, d. 1835]. He was educated at Dundee, his native town, and at the University of Edinburgh. He was ordained in 1796, and for ten years had an Anti-Burgher church in Edinburgh; but then, disagreeing with his fellow-religionists on some civil subject, he separated from them, with a few other ministers, and they set themselves forth as "The Constitutional Presbytery." He wrote a series of papers on the early history of the Church of Scotland, but his great work was the Life of John Knox, a work which did much to change public opinion on the character of the great Scottish reformer, and procured for its author the degree of D.D. from his university. Besides this he wrote the Life of Andrew Melville, History of the Progress and Suppression of the Reformation in Italy, and History of the Reformation in Spain. A memoir of him was written by his son Thomas, who is also the author of several works on Scottish Church History.

McIlvaine, CHARLES PETTIT, D.D., Bishop of Ohio, U.S. [b. 1799, d. 1873]. He was descended from an Ayrshire family who crossed the Atlantic in 1700. He was ordained in 1820, became Bishop in 1832, and by the end of his life had come to be acknowledged the leader of the Evangelical party in the American Church, being a man not only of strong opinions, but of high ability and of pure and holy character. He was a very able administrator, coming to his diocese when it was ready to die, with only four parishes and nineteen clergy. When he died there were 123 parishes and 108 clergy. But he was also highly esteemed among his countrymen for his wisdom, and when the affair of the Trent in 1871 threatened a war between England and the United States, President Lincoln sent Bishop McIlvaine to England on a successful mission of peace. He crossed the Atlantic many times, and was always cordially welcomed in England by those who had come to know him. His preaching was very popular with those who found in him a terse and vigorous expounder of their views, the more so as his voice was singularly powerful as well as melodious. His works comprise Evidences of Christianity [1831], Oxford Divinity Compared with that of the Romish and Anglican Churches [1841], The True Temple, or Holy Catholic Church [1860], and many sermons and charges.

Means of Grace.—The sacraments and other ordinances of the Church through which grace is conveyed to faithful souls. Mainly they are threefold—the Sacraments, the Word preached and read, and Prayer. In the formularies of the Anglican Church their efficacy is declared to depend on the faith of the recipient, which seems directed against the doctrine of the Roman Church that they are valid because of the OPUS OPERATUM [q.v.].

Mechitarists.—A congregation of Armenian Christians of the Roman Catholic faith

who reside in a convent on the island Lazzaro, close to Venice, and whose work is the printing of Armenian literature, with the object of instructing scattered members of their nation. Their name from Mechitar, an Armenian at Siwas, or Sebaste, in 1676. He was a priest in 1699, and in 1701 formed at Constantinople a society for the purpose of improving the moral and religious education of Armenians, and of effecting a union between Armenian and Roman Catholic Churches. Meeting with much opposition, he removed to Modon in the Morea, and here he continued his work for fourteen years; but in 1715, that part of Greece fell under Turkish rule, he removed to Venice, where the island of San Lazzaro was assigned to him, where he built his convent. He died in 1749. Branches of this Society were founded in Vienna and Trieste, and France. Mechitar published a translation of the Bible into the Armenian tongue; and his pupils have followed his example by rendering good European literature into Armenian, while they have also introduced the Western world with Armenian and other Oriental literature.

Medardus, St., Bishop of Noyon, born at Salency, in Picardy, in the sixth century. His first See was Vermandois, that being laid in ruins by the barbarians he removed it to Noyon. On the death of Gerbert, Bishop of Tournay, Medardus was chosen by the people to succeed him, but he hesitated, saying it was unlawful for a man to hold two bishoprics; but the Pope, the Metropolitan, and all the suffragan bishops applying to the Pope, laid before him the necessity of placing St. Medardus in the bishopric in order that he might root out idolatry which still remained in part of his diocese. The Pope complied with the request, and the bishoprics remained united. Little more is known of the Bishop until that when Queen Radegund fled from her husband, he made her a deaconess at his request and entreaties. Many miracles are ascribed to him, and it is also related that when the Bishop was dying, King Clotaire begged his blessing and absolution, and one of the bearers at his burial at Orléans, Soissons, and began a church and monastery to his memory, which were completed by his son Sigibert. Medardus is commemorated June 9th.

Mede, JOSEPH, was born in Bocking, Essex, in 1586. He was admitted to Trinity College, Cambridge, 1602, where he showed great proficiency in learning. He was some time inclined towards Pythagoreanism, but got over his difficulties, and gained a reputation of an exact logician and philosopher, a good mathematician, an excellent astronomer, a considerable linguist and philologist.

in history and chronology. His was a Latin tract, De Sanctitate which so pleased Bishop Andrewes invited the author into his family. However, was refused. Mede then Chaldean and the Egyptian hieroglyphs hoping they might resemble the of the prophets. He died at Cambridge 1638. His best known work is the Apocalypica, which was translated by More. It was very highly esteemed; and the "contuistic" view of apocalyptic prophecies—that is, that they are of progressive history.

Mediator.—One who intervenes to reconcile parties who are at variance. The mediation as a necessity to salvation is a great part of the religion of Paganism; the name of "mediator" was given by the Romans to their god, and by the Jews to the Messiah. It is a part of human consciousness that sin makes a separation between God and man. Christ is the appointed Mediator about the reconciliation; through Him man can be brought into a state of peace and into a state of greater friendship with God than was possible before the Fall. To accomplish this work of reconciliation it was necessary that the Mediator should be God and Man in one person. He was Man in order that He might be related to the human nature in whose cause He was to mediate; that reconciliation should be made for sin in the human nature which sinned; that the Mediator should be capable of obeying the law of God in the face of the sin of man, which God would not do; that He might be capable of suffering death, since "without shedding of blood there is no remission;" that He might sympathize with man by sympathy, having experienced all the trials and temptations; and that, being sinless, He might offer Himself as a spot to God, thereby taking away the sin of men. On the other hand He must be God in order that He might enter into a communion with God, as no mere man could do; that His obedience and sufferings might be of great effect; and that we might have confidence in His mediation as impossible were He only Man. Were He only God and not Man we could not approach Him with confidence; were He only Man and not God we should be guilty of idolatry in worshipping Him at all. His attributes are:—1. He is the only Mediator. 2. He is the Mediator of men only, not of God. 3. He is the Mediator for all men, without exception, and for all who died before the Reformation as well as for all who have since. 4. He is a constant, just, and faithful Mediator, and His mediation is successful.

Meditation.—A term used in an ecclesiastical sense to denote the union of memory, intellect, and will in private prayer. It is distinguished from mental prayer, in which the reason does not come so prominently into use, being replaced by greater devotion. Meditation has been systematised by Loyola and others to rules by which devotion may be stimulated, and good resolutions and desires formed; and the practice of mental prayer and meditation is prescribed in the directions for the use of religious communities. It is recommended by many of the Fathers, though St. Benedict affirms that it is not necessary to salvation.

Meeting-house.—The name given by many Dissenters to their place of worship. The chief difference between a meeting-house and a church is that the former is not consecrated. Meeting-houses first arose after the passing of the Act of Uniformity of 1662, when the ejected ministers met together. They were prohibited for some time by the Conventicle Act; but when all opposition was withdrawn the number of meeting-houses increased greatly.

Megilloth.—In the Jewish synagogue worship, a roll containing the books of Esther, Ruth, Canticles, Ecclesiastes, and Lamentations.

Melanchthon, PHILIP [b. 1497, d. 1560], one of the principal instruments employed by God in the work of the Reformation, was born at Bretten, a village in the Palatinate of the Rhine. His father's name was Schwarzerd, black earth, but he changed it to its Greek equivalent, melanchthon. He went to the High School at Pforzheim on the death of his father, when he was only ten years of age, and whilst here he came under the notice of his great uncle, Reuchlin, the celebrated Hebraist, who stimulated him to a resolute pursuit of the highest kind of learning. In 1509, when only twelve years of age, he became a student in the University of Heidelberg, and took his B.A. in 1511; but when he applied for the M.A. he was refused on the score of his extreme youth, and he therefore removed to Tübingen, where he studied civil law, attended lectures in medicine, read the Greek physician Galen, and made so considerable a proficiency in the liberal arts and sciences, the languages, and philosophy, that in 1513 he was admitted to a Master's degree. Tübingen is only ten miles from Stuttgart, the home of Reuchlin, and at his house Melanchthon first met with some of the leaders of the great war of intellectual liberty then going on, and in a quiet way took part in the fray. When only seventeen he gave lectures in this university on Virgil and Terence. Erasmus thus spoke of the rising scholar: "What promise there is in this young man—this boy! His attainments in both literatures are equally valuable. What ingenuity and acumen, what purity of language, what beauty of expression, what a memory for the most unfamiliar things, what a wide extent of reading!" In 1518, through the influence of Reuchlin, Duke Frederic of Saxony made him Professor of Greek in the University of Wittenberg. His opening lecture was one of the notable events in the spiritual and intellectual history of Europe; he sketched the history of the decline of literature and learning, and indicated the causes of their fall; he pointed out that the classics of Rome and Greece must be studied with devotion at once sensible and clear; that sacred learning must be reformed; the literal sense of the Bible must be had at all costs, and Christ must be made the centre and soul of theology. Luther was present at this oration; he had just begun his opposition to the Church of Rome in that place; Melancthon, in this important juncture, was therefore seasonably brought to his assistance, for which he became eminently qualified, as much by the meekness of his wisdom as the greatness of his talents. He soon entered into all the views of the great Reformer, was animated by the same ardent zeal for the truth, and willingly shared with him in all the dangers and sorrows to which the revival of pure religion unavoidably exposed them. After the death of Luther, indeed, nearly the whole burden of the Reformation rested on him.

In 1520 Melancthon gave a course of lectures on the Epistle to the Romans, and these were published by Luther without his friend's knowledge. His writings were manifold; indeed, whenever the truth needed to be defended, his pen was always in request; the University of Paris having condemned Luther's doctrines, Melancthon wrote in defence of them Adversus furiosum Parisiensium Logistorum Decretum in 1521. Of his early works none was more deservedly regarded than his first attempt to form a system of divinity from the pure fountain of Divine truth. He judged it a matter of great importance to mankind to be furnished with a clear, concise, and comprehensive view of the doctrines contained in the Bible. The Church of Rome had deserted the Scriptures, and their divinity consisted of detached sentences from St. Augustine and others; these, together with some of the subtle and barren distinctions of the Schoolmen, formed their whole system of theology. Melancthon, by uniting perspicuity with simplicity, endeavoured to place Scriptural doctrine in a clear and strong light, and published his Theological Commonplaces—a work which became very popular, and was translated into several languages. He took a very considerable part in the CONFSSION OF AUGSBURG. In 1540, when on a journey, he was seized with dangerous illness at Weimar; the Elector of Saxony at once sent for Luther, whose distress was intense, and also poured out his whole soul to God in such earnestness of supplication that his energy seemed to revive the apparently dying man, and from that hour he grew better. He had a conference of three days with Eck at Worms in 1541, but it was broken by the Emperor's command, and adjourned to Ratisbon. In 1546 Luther died, and Melancthon preached the funeral sermon. In November of that year the University of Wittenberg was dissolved, and Melancthon retired to Zerbst for a time. In 1551, at Leipzig, he helped to draw up the [q.v.]. He spent his remaining years in visiting schools throughout the Prussian provinces, and in trying to heal the divisions of his party. These disputes turned mainly on two points: the method of justification, and the doctrine of the Sacraments. He sought to heal the strife of Christians on these points with acute sorrow, and, true to the principle of his whole life, sought without cessation to find a mode of reconciling the Calvinist and Lutheran theologies. He was certainly one of the most learned men of his age, and wrote both in Latin with the freedom of his native language and in German. He was thoroughly acquainted with the text of the Old Testament. He died in peace and hope, April 18th, 1560, and was buried on the side of Luther at Wittenberg.

Melchites [Heb. melcha, "a king," "followers of the King."]—Those of the Eastern Church, whether Syrians or Egyptians, who follow the doctrines laid down by the Council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451. The name was given because the Council was declared to have been directed entirely by the Emperor Marcian. The name of Melchites was afterwards given to those who remained loyal to the Eastern Emperors after the Mahometan Caliphs had usurped the throne of Egypt. They follow the faith of the Greek Church, and are, like the Greeks, strong opposers of the supremacy of the Pope. The Melchites have translated the Bible, Acts of Councils, and Liturgy, with many of the Greek books of divinity.

Meletius, Bishop of Antioch, was originally at Melitene, in Lesser Armenia. Originally Bishop of Sebaste, he was elected to the see of Antioch on the translation of Eusebius of Constantinople, A.D. 361. He was then supposed to hold Arian views, but soon after his installation he preached a sermon in favour of the Nicene doctrine, and, through the influence of the orthodox, was deposed and banished within a month of his election. Two Bishops were chosen to fill his place—Euzoios by the Arians, and Paulinus by the Locals. That there were now three Bishops of Antioch, each with his own following, that of the orthodox being strengthened by the orthodox, which had existed in the Church since the deprivation of Eustathius, about A.D. 343, Meletius was restored to his see. He once held a Synod of Bishops, at which the Nicene Creed was signed. He was banished by Valens, but finally reinstated.

In 616, King Ethelbert and their sons, who succeeded in their dominions, renounced Christianity, relapsed into heathenism, and expelled Mellitus from his diocese. Upon this he retired into Kent, and, consulting with the Bishops Laurence and Justus, he travelled with the latter into France. Laurence being ready to follow them, his voyage was happily made unnecessary by King Eadbald's return to Christianity. Upon this occasion, Mellitus and Justus being recalled about a year after their departure, Justus was restored to his See at Rochester: but the Londoners being strongly addicted to heathenism, refused to receive Mellitus, neither was Eadbald in a condition to force them. So that Mellitus, being obliged to settle in Kent, succeeded to the See of Canterbury upon the death of Laurence, A.D. 619. According to Bede, he died in 624, after he had been Archbishop five years. After his expulsion from his diocese of London, the Eastern Saxons had neither bishops nor any religious administrations in the Christian form for thirty-eight years.

Melville, ANDREW, an eminent Scotch Reformer, was born at Baldorrie on the banks of the South Esk in 1545. He lost both parents when only two years old, and his care devolved on his eldest brother. Andrew was educated at Montrose Grammar School, and in 1559 went to St. Mary's College in the University of St. Andrews, where he remained for five years. He studied in Paris for two years, and then proceeded to Poitiers, where he was at once made Regent of St. Macrean College. Driven away by political disturbances, he went to Geneva, where he, through his friend Beza, was appointed to the Chair of Humanity in the Academy. Here it was that he gained the love for religious liberty for which he was afterwards so zealous. He returned to Scotland in 1574, and was offered the post of private tutor in the family of the Regent Morton, but refused, and became Principal of Glasgow College. He made many improvements, and gained a great influence, not only over the students, but throughout the whole of Scotland. The overthrow of Episcopacy and establishment of Presbyterianism were greatly owing to him, and he received the nickname of "Episcopomastix" or "the scourge of bishops." He was possessed of great intrepidity, and it is related of him that on one occasion, when Morton had exclaimed that there would be no peace in the country till he was hanged or banished, he replied, "Tush, man! threaten your courtiers so. It is the same to me whether I rot in the air or in the ground; and I have lived out of your country as well as in it. Let God be praised, you can neither hang nor exile His truth." At the end of 1580 he was made Principal of St. Mary's College, St. Andrews, where he worked with much zeal and ability; the number of students increased, and those of other colleges also attended. In 1592 the Privy Council revived Episcopacy, and filled up the See of Glasgow. The Scotch Church excommunicated the new Bishop, upon which the Privy Council declared the excommunication to be void, imprisoned those who refused to pay the episcopal rents, and laid Glasgow College under an interdict. Melville preached against these proceedings so fiercely that he was summoned before the Privy Council. He claimed to be tried in a Church Court, and on a refusal made his escape and fled to London, where he remained for twenty months. On his return to St. Andrews he continued his work with as great zeal as before, and was made Moderator of the General Assembly and Rector of the University. In 1605 James I. wished to make another attempt to reestablish Episcopacy, and in order to get rid of some of his opponents, invited Melville and others to come to London and take part in the Hampton Court Conference. They went and had interviews with the King, but found that they were really prisoners, and not allowed to return home. Melville wrote a Latin epigram, in which he ridiculed a service which had taken place in the Chapel Royal on St. Michael's Day. For this he was confined for nearly a year in the houses, first of the Dean of St. Paul's, and afterwards of the Bishop of Winchester; then in the Tower, where he remained till February, 1611, and then was not allowed to return home, but was only liberated on condition that he should become Professor of Sedan University, where he remained till his death in 1622.

Melville, Henry [b. in Cornwall, 1800, d. in London, 1871].—One of the most celebrated preachers of the Church of England in the present century. He was educated at Cambridge. He held many successive appointments, and in 1853 was appointed one of the Queen's Chaplains, and Canon of St. Paul's in 1856, with which, after 1863, he held the living of Barnes. He became famous as a preacher through the Golden Lecture-ship, which is delivered every Tuesday in the Church of St. Margaret, Lothbury, in the City. This lectureship he held for ten years. His sermons were regularly taken down and published for a penny, much against his will, and had an enormous circulation. Many of these were afterwards collected and published in revised and corrected form by himself. They are rhetorical and full of illustration, but not always original. He borrowed much from Chalmers. One peculiarity of his sermons is his continual reiteration of his text, always with some new light. Any one who analyses one of Melville's sermons will find nearly every paragraph ending with some phrase or other out of the text. When he was preaching the listeners waited for this culminating sentence in breathless silence. Then came a pause, during which they would move into easier positions and with bated breath once more, and so he began again, and so to end his paragraph with a fresh repetition in new setting. He belonged to the old-fashioned Evangelical school.

Member of the Church.—One who has been received into the Church by the administration of Baptism. Some religious societies do not consider those who have been baptised in infancy as members till they become communicants.

Menma.—The Greek Divinary, consisting of the offices for fixed festivals. This consists of hymns, readings, extracts from the Menologium, etc. It is in 12 vols., containing the menma for one month.

Menander, a disciple of Simon Magus was a Samaritan. His heresy was essentially the same as that of his master, but few additions were made by him. Agreeing with Simon Magus that the world was ruled by evil angels, he promised his followers power of overcoming these by magic. He also promised immortality to all who received his baptism. Two of Menander's disciples, Basilides and Saturninus, afterwards became leaders of sects. [BASILIDIANS, SATURNINIANS.]

Mendians, otherwise known as Sabians and as Christians of St. John, a sect of great antiquity, dwelling in the land of the southern part of the Euphrates. They are interesting as a survival of ancient Gnosticism—in other words, of a religious conception of Christianity corrupted by elements of Judaism and heathenism. They only became known in Europe in the middle of the nineteenth century, when two Jesuit missionaries who had gone to the East came back with an account of them, which they published in Rome in 1852. Several travellers have visited them since, among these St. John Chardin and Niebuhr. The most valuable knowledge of them is derived from the sacred books, which are written in Syriac and consist of fragments of very various age and interest. There are Maronite manuscripts in the British Museum and elsewhere. The most important of their books is the rebbis, or the Great Books, consisting of two parts, one written for the living, the other for the dead, containing prayers to be used at funerals, etc. They also have the Kitab al-Fakhs, or Book of John; the Kitab al-Sidra di Niamets (Book of Souls), containing hymns on the subject of baptism, and prayers to be used at their ceremonies, and the Driss, a book of moral and spiritual maxims.

The Mendians are sometimes called merobaptists, from their frequent washing. The following account of their rites was given by Conti, a Maronite of Mount Lebanon: "He who presides in sacred things wears vest and tiara, both of camel's skin. He favour of the secular clergy; at his death it broke out afresh, but his decision was confirmed in 1263 by the Synod of Clermont, and again in 1274 by the Council of Salzburg. The discussion was not, for a long time, satisfactorily settled; but Pope Boniface VIII. did his best to conciliate both parties by ordaining that the Mendicants might receive confessions upon application to the parish priest.

Mennonites. — A name given to the Dutch Baptists in memory of their reformer, Menno Symonis, who lived in the sixteenth century [b. 1505, d. 1564]. There are four sects who come under this head—Flemings, Germans, Frieslanders, and Waterlanders, and they were originally called Anabaptists, but changed the name in consequence of the ridicule which had attached to it. They were also known as "Doopsgezinden" or "Dippers." Menno, a priest of Friesland, who was born in 1492, and who was led at the dawn of the Reformation to cast off Papal doctrine, came to the conclusion that Infant Baptism was not sanctioned in Scripture, but rejected the enthusiasms and revelations of the first Anabaptists and their doctrines concerning the new Kingdom of Christ, and formulated tenets which are still held by his followers. He died in 1559. His treatise entitled A True Christian Belief, was in 1580 developed by two Mennonite preachers into the Confession of Waterland, which is supposed to contain the whole of the Mennonite doctrine. It declares that Christ's Body was not of the substance of His mother, but of a direct creation by the power of the Holy Spirit from the essence of the Father; that there is no Original Sin, and therefore no necessity for Infant Baptism; that it is not lawful for Christians to exercise any office of magistracy, nor to wage war upon any terms; that the ministers of the Gospel ought to receive no salary; and that it is possible for a Christian to attain to the height of perfection in this life. A supplementary Confession was written in 1632 introducing the Arian belief respecting the Incarnation; but the generality of the communities at the present day appear to be orthodox, as in most points appears to have been Menno himself. There are several congregations of Mennonites in Elsass and Bavaria, several in Poland also, and a few in France. There are also about 200,000 of them in America. [TUNKERS.]

Menologium. — A Greek book corresponding to the Roman Martyrologies, containing the biographies of the different saints and martyrs throughout the year, with the day on which they are commemorated. The first compiler of such a book seems to have been St. Eusebius of Cæsarea, and another was arranged by Palladius, Bishop of Hierapolis. There were several alterations of these as time went on, and others were compiled by Simon Metaphrastes, etc. In later times selections from the Meneologium were inserted in the Menas or Greek breviary, under the name of "Synaxaria."

Mental Reservation.—A doctrine of the Jesuits, to the effect that falsehood in certain circumstances may be reconciled to the conscience if at the same time a saving clause be added secretly. They say that even when giving evidence on oath mental reservation may be made, so that the evidence may be understood falsely, by the witness giving his words some qualification in his own mind.

Mercersburg Theology arose in 1836 at the Theological Seminary of the German Reformed Church, in Mercersburg, Pennsylvania. Dr. Rauch, President of the College, who had come from Germany, and was well read in German metaphysics, desired to establish a regular and orderly system of philosophy, which should embody the ripe teaching of the great thinkers. His method was intensely subjective, all ideas and opinions were, with him, parts of a vast unity held together by an internal law, the centre of which is the living Intelligence. His method of reasoning was cut short by his death in 1841, before he had fully developed it, and his successor, Dr. Nevin, continued it. At the same time Dr. Philip Schaff was appointed as Professor of Church History at Mercersburg, and the two together developed the principles of the Theology in different ways, Nevin regarding it from a theological, and Schaff from a historical point of view. Their aim was the revival and defence of the pure Reformed doctrine; yet, in consequence of their appeals to ancient history and the early Fathers, they were accused of Romanist tendencies, and tried for heresy, of which they were unanimously acquitted. The doctrine on which the Mercersburg Theology is based is that of the twofold nature of Christ, from which it is believed that all other doctrines are to be developed. The Church is regarded as a spiritual organism, with life like that of an individual, developing by successive stages from childhood to manhood, whence it is inferred that views and modes of expression which held good at one period of her existence need not necessarily do so at a later period. In common with others of the German Reformers, the Mercersburg Theologians reject the doctrine of Apostolical Succession. They believe in the life-giving power of the Sacraments, in opposition to the usually received opinion in America that they are merely emblems or symbols. They have also drawn up a Liturgy for the use of their disciples, being strongly opposed to the practice of extemporaneous public prayer, and in favour of the revival of the old pre-Reformation Liturgy.

Mercy, SPIRITUAL AND CORPORAL WORKS OF.—The seven chief works of mercy to the bodies and souls of men were first set forth in the Middle Ages, and are still to be found in the catechisms of the Roman Church under the term "Spiritual and Corporal Works of Mercy." The latter want the sick and prisoners, to give the thirsty, feed the hungry, clothe the naked, give shelter to strangers, and bury the dead. The former are to give counsel to the foolish, convert sinners, teach the ignorant, soothe the distressed, bear wrongs and forgive injuries, and to pray for the living and the dead.

Messiah signifies "anointed," given by way of eminence to our Lord, meaning the same in Hebrew as in Greek, and expressing the authority which He had to assume the characters of Priest, and King. The notions of the Jews regarding the Messiah were various, by their looking forward to a temporal monarch, and thus despising Jesus on account of His poverty. Many of the Rabbins believe that Messiah is one who conceals himself on account of the sins of the Jews. Others believe he is to come, and have fixed times for his appearance, and then, when they have without realizing their prediction, let those who should in future profess the time of his coming. Others again had recourse to a twofold Messiah, one in a state of poverty and one in a state of power; the first, they say, is to pass through the tribe of Ephraim, and to be slain; the second is to be of the tribe of Judah, of David, who is to bring the dead to life again, to assemble all Israel, and to reign over the whole world.

The fact that Jesus Christ is the Messiah is grounded on the following fulfilment of prophecy:—The sacrifices and laws of the Mosaic law were to be superseded by Him, Ps. xl. 6-8; 1 Sam. xv. 22. Dan. ix. 24. Now they have been fulfilled in Him. The first prophecy of His coming is in Gen. iii. 15, and repeated Gen. xlii. 1. The exact time of His coming was foretold in Gen. ix. 24. The place of His coming and where He should principally reign was determined, Mic. v. 2. His genealogy is traced in Matthew and St. Luke. The kind of His coming is specified in Isai. ix. 6-7. His coming as a King, and in a lowly state, Zech. ix. 9. His death by the hands of wicked men, Ps. xlix. 7 and liii. 9; Dan. ix. 26. His resurrection, Ps. lxxviii. 18, xvi. 10. His rejection of Him by the Jewish nation, and His preaching to the Gentiles, Isai.

WESLEYAN. — The early remarkable body will be more biographies of its founders, & WESLEY [q.v.]. “The first,” says John Wesley, “was ’29, when four of us met.” Their object in meeting their spiritual life by prayer & the Scriptures. They were first in a taunting spirit, unusually precise and “members of their religious regularity of their lives. They were joined by other Oxford men, George Whitfield. On his return, in 1738, John Wesley gathered those who attended his devotion to a Society. The members met regularly once a week at least in some private house for spiritual exercises, and were constant in their attendance at the services of the parish church; for Wesley's aim was to rekindle a spirit of piety within the Church of England, and not to set up a sect in opposition to her. Hence the meetings of his Society were not held during the hours of Divine Service, his object being to supplement the work of the clergy and not to provide a substitute for such work. His teaching on this point is most emphatic. He says "We hold communion with the Church for conscience sake, by constantly attending both the Word preached and the Sacraments administered therein." Again, he bade his lay preachers whom he had appointed to minister to his followers in different parts of the country, "in every place to exhort those who are brought up in the Church constantly to attend its services." And he wrote even in 1790, the year before his death, "I fear that when the Methodists leave the Church, God will leave them." Circumstances were, however, too strong for him. The spiritual deadness which had of itself stimulated his movement, was unable to endure it, and in 1740 this intolerance was displayed by the clergy repelling Methodists from the Lord's Supper at Bristol—an example widely followed elsewhere. The brothers were thus driven into administering the Sacrament to their own people at their own meetings, but it was not till 1788 that Wesley ordained preachers to assist in administering the Sacraments in England, and not till his death in 1791 was the last link severed which bound the Church to Methodism, the gradual severance having been against his own will at every stage of the process. The Methodists were equally excluded from many of the Dissenting meeting-houses, and by this want of sympathy on the part of others, was largely developed that wonderful system of open-air preaching which did so much to bring the neglected populace of England within the reach of the gospel.

Methodism, then, was not intended so much to be a Church or sect, as a "method" of cultivating the Divine life; and this method remains essentially the same still, in all the bodies into which the original Wesleyan Methodists have now divided. Its success as such has been simply wonderful. It has produced great works of Christian benevolence, and has exerted an influence on the religious life of England so great, that a thoughtful philosopher, F. D. Maurice, has expressed his conviction that it was Methodism which saved England from being carried into the terrible vortex of the French Revolution. In seeking to account for such success, in the first place let it be noted that Methodism was at its very heart a religious movement. It did not take its rise in any doctrinal disputes or questions of Church government. Its declared object was "to reform the nation, more particularly the Church, and to spread Scriptural holiness over the land." To the Methodist all ideas were subordinated to this need of personal holiness, in order that the soul might hold fast to God. John Wesley, says Mr. Matthew Arnold, "had a genius for godliness." Secondly, we have to take into account Wesley's marvellous powers of organisation, a power which was still predominated by the main idea we have stated, and which was subjected to the influence of the methodical habits already alluded to. Thus it was, that so simple a custom as the weekly meeting of the few at Oxford, developed into the class-meeting, and so on. In every village his Society was at work, and preaching houses were erected throughout the kingdom. In order to retain hold on those who had been moved by his preaching, Wesley formed every dozen or twenty converts into a "class," under a class leader, or sometimes under a lay preacher; these bands and classes met weekly for prayer and confession of sins. Several of these "classes" were grouped together to form a "circuit," and about eighteen "circuits" formed a "district." A "circuit" generally comprised a market town, and the neighbouring villages within a distance of ten or twelve miles. It was under the guidance of three or four ministers and some lay preachers. The management of each "district" was entrusted to the ministers, who met on certain stated occasions for discussion and transaction of necessary business. And once a year each "district" sent up representatives to attend a conference held in London or some large town.

The same features still distinguish Methodism, and the only condition exacted of those desiring to enter the Society is "a desire to flee from the wrath to come, and to be saved from their sins." The members are arranged into classes of about a dozen, more or less, under a "class leader," who meet weekly after Wesley's old Oxford custom, to relate and compare their spiritual "experience," and receive exhortation or counsel from the leader, or from one another under his superintendence. The leader also receives at these meetings the weekly contributions towards the expenses of the ministry, the customary minimum being one penny a week. These contributions are then handed to the "stewards," and in this way—in which Methodism stands alone—the humblest member is grasped by the system, and brought into direct pecuniary as well as spiritual relation with the body. A convenient number of classes is united into a society or congregational Church, and a sufficient number of these into circuits, each circuit having one or more itinerant or recognised preachers authorised by the Conference, under whom are lay or "local" preachers ministering in their own localities. It is an essential part of the modern Methodist system that every one who gives apparent evidence of the power of true ministerial gift, or of "power," should be led to exercise the responsible ministry; so that the system not only recognises, but is a vast agency for the express development, of lay power. Without this vast body of lay preachers, the work could not possibly be carried on, and the results accomplished are an ample testimony to the value of lay preaching, and proper safeguards. Owing to the permanent residence and local knowledge of the local preachers of character and ability, they exert an even superior influence to the circuit preachers. These are appointed for three years, and no circuit or itinerant preacher can be appointed again to the same circuit until he has been three years absent at some other place. Free residences are provided for these preachers, and to keep up the system, the land and utensils complete is part of the endowment of the stewards. Candidates for the unpaid ministry have to pass four years of probation, after which they are admitted to the theological colleges; and this system ensures that every minister shall (in the estimation of his brethren at least) be possessed of a certain amount of preaching power. Each circuit holds a monthly "leaders' meeting," composed of stewards and leaders; this deals with matters of discipline, etc., and is the general court of reference; but each circuit holds its quarterly "circuit" meeting, composed of leaders, preachers, and stewards. The court of all is the Conference. The basis of this in Wesleyan Methodism is the "Book of Discipline," whose numbers are kept up by election to vacancies, and who really exercise the legal power of the Conference, as attested by a deed executed by John Wesley, and enrolled in Chancery. But as a matter of fact, the representatives elected by assembly from the circuits, called "districts," deliberate with the legal hundred, which confirms their decisions, and finally sanctions all their appointments. The standard of Methodist doctrine (except amongst the Calvinistic Methodists) is found in the volumes of Wesley's Sermons and Notes on the New Testament, which are so named in trust-deeds. Methodists believe that no man can possess any knowledge of final salvation, but only of present assurance with God, and that it is fearful to fall entirely away even from a measure of grace. They also maintain the possibility of an entire deliverance from sin in this life.

It will be gathered from the above sketch of Methodist doctrine and practice that the system presents several very distinctive features. [1] As regards doctrine, no other Christian Church or system is so nakedly and avowedly the expression of the religious opinions of one man as the Methodist Church; in this respect it is absolutely unique. [2] Its system of doctrine places bodies. In 1741 the first secession took place, upon theological grounds. Hitherto the Wesleys and Whitfield had worked together, but Whitfield's strong views concerning predestination were now found incompatible with further union, and he left the Society along with many followers. Wesley's views on these subjects were mainly in accordance with Arminian theology, but otherwise may be described as what is popularly called "Evangelical." Among a large portion of the Wesleyan Methodists the whole or part of the Church Service is still used at morning worship, testifying to the desire always felt by Wesley that his movement should be considered part and parcel of the Anglican body.

The rupture, however, became inevitable, and was practically effected by his own act in 1784, though the last hope of union was not finally destroyed until his death in 1791. So far back as 1746 Wesley had become convinced by Lord King's Account of the Primitive Church that bishops and presbyters have the same meaning in the New Testament. Thirty-eight years later, when pressing representations were made to him of the need for ministers to be ordained in America to administer the sacraments, he ordained Dr. Coke as superintending "bishop" for America, who subsequently ordained Francis Asbury. Soon after, Wesley exercised the same responsibility in regard to Scotland, and in 1788 he ordained ministers for England also. His brother Charles strongly disapproved of this step; but there is no doubt that it was sincerely taken, and Southey's offensive insinuations on the subject have very little ground. Not content with imputing to Wesley more or less conscious dishonesty, Southey argues that if presbyter and bishop were synonymous the consecration was useless, as Dr. Coke was ordained already, and therefore "as good a bishop as Mr. Wesley himself." Wesley would not have questioned that for a moment; and his solemn ordination of Dr. Coke was not to the mere office of presbyter, but as a delegate of his own authority to be exercised in America. It was a step taken with hesitation, as were all Wesley's steps in the direction of separation; but it appeared to be forced on him, and when taken was practically final and irrevocable. Perhaps few thoughtful students of what Methodism has since done, will question the reality of the Divine providence which so modified Wesley's personal wishes into an entirely different direction.

At the death of John Wesley great dissensions arose within the Methodist body, now increased to over 60,000 members. The laity claimed a share in the government of their body; they protested against the Conference being solely composed of ministers; they also claimed their "right to hold public religious worship at such hours as were most convenient, without being restricted to the mere intervals of the hours appointed for service in the Established Church;” and also the right to receive the Sacraments at the hands of their lay preachers—a thing which Wesley had refused to permit. At last, in order to allay the discontent and dissensions, which had increased to an alarming extent, the Conference in 1795 drew up a Plan of Pacification. The claims of the laity to a share in the government of the Society were steadily rejected. The claims of the trustees of the various chapels to a voice in the appointment of their ministers were also denied. The whole business of electing and appointing ministers and local preachers was reserved to the Conference. But, on the other hand, in order to meet the claims of the laity to a certain extent, a new court was formed to administer discipline in each district. The Court consisted of the preachers of each district, and all trustees, stewards, and leaders of the circuit. The Court received accusations against a preacher, and had power to suspend him till the next Conference, to whom the matter must then be submitted. This arrangement still continues in force.

Owing to the dissatisfaction that many of the laity felt at the decisions of the Conference of 1795, a second secession occurred in 1797, the seceding members forming the “Methodist New Connexion;” they are sometimes called Kilhamites, after their leader, Alexander Kilham. A few years later, in 1812, the “Primitive Methodists” formed a distinct sect, after being expelled from the main body. In 1815 a further secession occurred, the Bryanites or Bible Christians forming a separate communion. The “Methodist Free Churches” consist of those who were expelled from Methodism in 1828, 1835, and 1849; they amalgamated in 1857, and are known as the “United Free Churches.”

WESLEYAN METHODISTS.—In spite, however, of these numerous secessions, amounting in a few years to the loss of 100,000 members, the Society still flourishes, and remains the leading division of the great body. At the present time they have in the United Kingdom 2,183 ministers, 469,857 class members, and 7,071 chapels. According to the official returns published at the close of 1885, Methodists of all kinds throughout the world number 32,701 ministers and 5,174,037 class members.

CALVINISTIC METHODISTS.—This sect followed Whitfield in 1741, but it was not till 1748 that a secession formally occurred, in consequence of Whitfield preaching strong Calvinistic doctrine. Some of their earliest chapels were erected in Moorfields and in Tottenham Court Road about the year 1756; but the greatest number were in Wales. On the death of Whitfield, in 1769, the various congregations supported themselves on the Independent principle. At the present time they number 970 ministers, 276,051 members, and

1,372 chapels. A section of this is known as “Lady Huntingdon’s Connexion [HUNTINGDON, COUNTESS OF.]”

METHODIST NEW CONNEXION.—From 1797, owing to the expulsion of Alexander Kilham from the Methodist ministry sympathisers formed the first members of a new sect. Alexander Kilham was the claimer of the right of the Methodist people to meet together for worship in Church and to receive the Sacraments from the ministers. In theology, the New Connexion does not differ from the old; the chief difference between the two bodies is that it admits the laity to a share in the government of the society. Ministers and lay delegates attend the Conference in equal numbers; the laity have a voice in the election and expulsion of their ministers. This body has missions abroad, especially in China; at the present time has in the United Kingdom 211 ministers, 33,964 members, and 1,372 chapels. The society is also strong in Canada.

PRIMITIVE METHODISTS.—This sect arose from the expulsion of William Clowes and Hugh Bourne from the Methodist Society in 1811. These two men had preached unducted prayer meetings among the engaged in the Potteries in Staffordshire; numbers of people attended their meetings. In 1807 they introduced the American custom of holding camp meetings, at which speakers addressed the congregation assembled in the open air. These meetings were prolonged sometimes throughout the whole day. The Methodist Conference disapproved of this, expelled the promoters, William Clowes and Hugh Bourne. In 1812 they took the name of “Primitive Methodists,” signifying by this that they wished to walk as Jesus Christ walked, as they could in the steps of John Wesley. They were named also “Ranters,” from the custom of singing aloud in the open air. In their theology they do not differ materially from the original Methodists; their prominent doctrine being “faith and present salvation.” They differ from the older Methodists in the admission of the laity to their Conference, in a ratio of two to one. Other characteristics of this body are their preference for open-air preaching, and the allowing women to take part in the distribution of bread and water, and love-feasts, the great excitement prevailing at their meetings. They are chiefly in the northern counties of England. Their present statistics for the United Kingdom are as follows:—1,042 ministers, 192,389 members, and 4,217 chapels.

BIBLE CHRISTIANS OR BRYANITES.—This sect arose in 1815, with the secession of William O’Byrne, a Methodist local preacher in Cornwall. It succeeded well in Devonshire and Cornwall, but in 1829 O’Byrne was expelled from the sect. Their Conference consists isters and people; and they act as itinerant preachers. In the United Kingdom at the 45 ministers, 28,760 class members, 8 chapels; and they have a presence in Australia.

UNITED FREE CHURCHES expelled from the Methodist Church for agitating in favour of giving the laity to a voice in the government of their society. They were founded in 1857, and differ only from the Methodists in giving increased powers to the laity. They have foreign missions in Australia; and number at the present time in the United Kingdom, 419 ministers, 1,232 class members, and 1,232 members.

SMALL SECTIONS OF METHODISM in America. AMERICAN REFORM UNION, founded in 1828. INDEPENDENT METHODISTS, founded in 1828. Together muster 13,915 members.

METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH IN AMERICA. The leading denomination, in fact, in the United States. It was founded in 1786 by some Irish emigrants, these were Barbara Heck and Richard Allen, who began to hold services in New York. Their numbers increased so quickly that in two years they built a meeting-house. They were sent out from England as missionaries to the society. Their first Conference was held in Philadelphia in 1773. During the American Revolution all the English ministers returned home. Mr. Asbury, returned home. In 1784, John Wesley consecrating Dr. Coke as first bishop to consecrate Mr. Asbury as first bishop of the American Methodist Episcopal Church. Three orders of ministers were recognised by them—bishops, presbyters, and deacons. There are three divisions of this Episcopal Methodist Church, the Methodist Episcopal Church, South; the Methodist Episcopal Church, North; the Methodist Episcopal Church, Coloured, for the coloured races. The Methodist Episcopal Church, North has 12,811 ministers and 1,045,168 class members; the Methodist Episcopal Church, South has 12,811 ministers and 1,045,168 class members. In the Methodist Episcopal Church, Coloured, the Coloured Church has 125,683 members. In the Methodist Episcopal Church, North, the Wesleyan Methodists have a directory for their worship and an abridgment of the Prayer Book of the Thirty-Nine Articles, compiled by John Wesley. A schism occurred in 1830, owing to the opposition felt by some members at the time of the separation of the Methodist Episcopal Church from the Methodist Church; and the Methodist Episcopal Church "came into existence."

METHODIST PROTESTANT CHURCH.—The first general Convention of this sect was held at Baltimore, in 1830. Eighty-three ministers attended, and lay representatives of about 5,000 members. The only difference between this and the Methodist Episcopal Church lies in the mode of government. The former admits laymen in equal numbers with ministers to their Conferences, and places all ministers on a level in authority; while the latter rejects lay representation, and adopts unlimited episcopacy. The Protestant Church has 1,500 ministers and 131,010 members.

AFRICAN METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH.—An important sect, numbering 1,882 ministers and 400,804 members. It was founded in Philadelphia in 1816. It arose through the harsh treatment accorded by the Whites to their Coloured fellow-Methodists, who accordingly decided to form a communion of their own. They do not differ from the Methodist Episcopal Church either in theology or in practice.

AFRICAN METHODIST EPISCOPAL ZION CHURCH.—This sect was founded in 1796, owing to the harsh treatment received by the coloured people from their white fellow-Christians. Bishop Asbury gave his sanction to the new community. At first they held their services only during the intervals between the services of their white brethren; but in 1799 they decided to form a distinct communion, and they accordingly erected a place of worship in New York, called Zion Church. They, however, continued subject to the control of the Methodist Episcopal Church till 1820, in which year they became entirely independent of the older body. Their characteristics are: the making matrimony a sacrament on a par with Baptism and Holy Communion; abstaining from all spirituous drinks except in case of necessity. They have 2,000 ministers and 302,750 class members.

Other sects of Methodists in America are:—

EVANGELICAL ASSOCIATION, having 953 ministers and 120,357 members.

PRIMITIVE METHODIST CHURCH, with 27 ministers and 3,878 members.

AMERICAN WESLEYAN CHURCH, with 267 ministers and 23,805 members.

FREE METHODIST CHURCH, with 263 ministers and 13,045 members.

UNION AMERICAN METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH and CONGREGATIONAL METHODISTS, both small bodies.

Methodius, missionary to the Slavs, the son of Leon, of Thessalonica, was sent, A.D. 863, with his brother Cyril, by the Greek Emperor Michael, to Moravia, on the invitation of its Governor, Rostislav, who was anxious to have the Scriptures translated into the Slavonic tongue. They first composed a Slavonic alphabet by the use of Greek letters, to which they added Armenian, Hebrew, and some original characters, amounting in all to forty letters. They then translated the Gospels and Acts of the Apostles, and afterwards the Psalter and other books. By this means many converts were made and churches built. After labouring for four and a-half years, they were, on the information of the German clergy, who were jealous at their success, summoned by Pope Nicholas to Rome; they were admitted to an audience, and, having satisfactorily explained their creed, Methodius was appointed Metropolitan of Moravia and Pannonia. He returned, therefore, to his missionary work (Cyril seems to have died in Rome) until political troubles obliged him for a time to give it up. He visited Rome a second time, and obtained from Pope John VIII. an approval of his Slavonic Liturgy, as the Pontiff confessed that he concluded from the words of the Psalmist, "Praise the Lord, all ye nations," that it could not be meant that the Scriptures should only be used in Greek, Latin, and Hebrew, which would confine them to the use of the clergy. One condition, however, was insisted on—that Mass must be celebrated in Greek or Latin. Methodius once more returned to Moravia, and there laboured till his death in 885.

Metrical Psalms and Hymns.—

The first translation of the Psalms into English metre was made in Henry VIII.'s reign by Sir Thomas Wyatt; but this version is lost. The first edition which has come down to us, and which is called the "Old Version," was begun by Sternhold, who translated fifty psalms. The work was completed by Hopkins and others, and published, together with about forty tunes, in 1562. The "New Version" was brought out by Tate and Brady in 1696.

The metrical psalms were never an essential part of Divine Service, but were used at certain intervals without disturbing the rest of the service. This use was based on the injunction of Queen Elizabeth, that "in the beginning or in the end of Common Prayer, either at morning or evening, there may be sung an hymn or such-like song to the praise of Almighty God in the best sort of melody and music that may be conveniently devised, having respect that the sense of the hymn may be understood and perceived."

The use of metrical hymns began in the Eastern Church, and was introduced into the West by Ambrose. The first attempt at translating hymns from the Breviary was made by Cranmer in 1544, and in the following year seven English hymns, one for each service, appeared in the Primer; but they were all discarded from the Reformed Prayer Book, except one—"Come, Holy Ghost, our souls inspire." Some hymns were translated in Queen Elizabeth's reign, and the Puritans wished to introduce them; but they were refused by the Revisers of the Prayer Book in 1661. [See HYMNS.]

Metropolitan.—A metropolitan town is the capital, or mother city, from which colonies are sent. It has been said that metropolitans in the ecclesiastical sense are of apostolical institution, or that at least the Apostles prepared the way for them, inasmuch as when travelling about they chose the civil metropolis as the best place to fix their head-quarters and to found the Church. The term was not used till the fourth century; but the Council of Nice speaks of the existence of metropolitans as a new thing, and, in fact, treats the still more extensive authority of the Bishops of Alexandria, Antioch, and Rome as established by ancient custom. The Council of Antioch has explicit decrees as to the precedence of the bishop of the metropolis, and as to the necessity of his presence when questions of a general nature are discussed, but with a strong reservation as to the powers of each bishop in matters affecting merely his own diocese. On the breaking up of the Roman Empire the disturbances made it difficult for distant bishops to attend the Councils, which led to independent action on the part of the metropolitans. In Africa the right of a metropolitan was not dependent upon the civil metropolis, but on the priority of the episcopal character; thus the eldest bishop in a province was metropolitan.

The privileges of a metropolitan in a province were [1] to have precedence of the other bishops; [2] to consecrate the bishops of the province; [3] to call a provincial council for preserving orthodoxy and discipline. In England there are two metropolitans, the Archbishops of Canterbury and York. [ARCHBISHOP.] And the system has been duly introduced into the Colonial Churches. Thus the Bishop of Capetown is Metropolitan of South Africa, and Sydney, of Australia.

Meyer, HEINRICH AUGUST WILHELM [b. in Gotha in 1800, d. in Hanover, 1873]. He studied theology at Jena, and became a Pastor in 1822. His ministerial life was faithful, earnest, devout, and he was admired as a preacher, but is known to the world at large by his commentaries on the New Testament, which are placed within the reach of English students of Scripture through the translations in Clark's Theological Library.

Michael, Sr.—The Feast of St. Michael and All Angels is kept by the Anglican Church on Sept. 29th. St. Michael is mentioned in Scripture in the Book of Daniel, in the Epistle of Jude, and in the Book of Revelation. The Roman Catholics celebrate three apparitions of St. Michael—one at Choncs, formerly Colosse in Phrygia; one on Mount Garganus (now St. Angelo), in Italy; and one at Tomb on the sea coast between Normandy and Brittany. At each of these places a church was built on the site of the apparition. It is said that a church was erected in his honour by Constantine, called Michaelion, about four and a half miles from Constantinople, and was

by numbers, who declared that the frequently appeared there and cured

Michael Cærularius was Patriarch of Constantinople from 1043 to 1059, and in the breach between the Eastern and Western Churches was completed. In consequence, Archbishop of Bulgaria, he wrote a letter to John, Bishop of Trani [1053], denouncing the errors of the following respects:—[1.] The unleavened bread in the Holy Communion. [2.] The practice of fasting on Wednesdays and Fridays in Lent. [3.] Of eating things of flesh and blood. [4.] Of using the hymn "Gloria" only upon Easter Day. This was followed up by the closing of the churches, and the seizure of the Latin Church in Constantinople. The Pope replied to these charges in a letter, and sent Cardinals Humbert and Frederick, and the Archbishop of Amalfi, as legates, to try to effect a reconciliation. These were well received by the Emperor Constantine Monomachus, who wished to support the Pope's interest, and they succeeded in obtaining from Nicetas Pectoratus, a monk who had written in support of the Eastern Church an anathema against his own book. He himself, however, refused all communion with the Legates. At last they closed the Cathedral of Sophia, and raised on the high altar a Bull which, while maintaining the orthodoxy of the people of Constantinople in general, excommunicated the Emperor and his adherents. They then left Constantinople, to return two days later at the Emperor's invitation, and to receive an official dismissal. Meanwhile Michael raised a counter anathema, and in the efforts of Peter of Antioch, who acted as mediator, the breach continued. A papal legation was sent by Pope Stephen IX, but without result. Michael was at length deposed in 1059 by Pope Gregory X, and died shortly after; the breach remained, and still unhealed.

Michaelis, JOHANN DAVID [b. at Halle, Prussia, 1717, d. August 22nd, 1791], a learned exegetical writer, was educated at Halle, travelled in England and became Professor of Philosophy at Halle in 1745, and was the chief in forming a Scientific Association at Halle. For nearly twenty years he edited the Göttinger Gelehrten Anzeigen, librarian of the University; but during the latter years of his life he was occupied almost entirely with his professorship. He was one of the most eminent Biblical scholars of the eighteenth century, and did much valuable work as a critic and commentator; he was also learned in archaeology and history. His commentaries on the Laws of Moses were published in English translations in 1810.

Middleton, CONYERS, a well-known divine and controversialist, was born in Yorkshire in 1683. In 1700 he went to Trinity College, Cambridge, took his B.A. degree in 1702, and was ordained. Four years after he became a Fellow, and in 1708 joined with others of his college in a petition against Bentley, the Master; and for some years he and Bentley carried on a warfare which is painful to read of, in which bitter and angry words more than once brought the two divines into the law courts as mutual accusers. In 1720, Bentley issued specimens of a new edition of the Greek Testament, which he intended to bring out. The work was prepared very hurriedly, and contained several errors, which Middleton took advantage of, and wrote so strongly that the idea of Bentley's Greek Testament was given up. Middleton was made Principal Librarian of the College, and published a new plan for arranging the library in 1723. In the following year he spent some time in Rome, and in 1729 published a Letter from Rome, showing that the present Romans derived their religion from that of their heathen ancestors—a book which was received with great favour by the learned. He afterwards wrote works containing statements which were considered by his contemporaries to have been written by an infidel, but which are now received; such as that the Scriptures were not of absolute inspiration; that the Apostles sometimes adapted the prophecies relating to Christ; and that the Jews borrowed some of their customs from Egypt. On these subjects he had a controversy with Dr. Waterland. In 1741 appeared his most famous work, A Life of Cicero, the proceeds of which brought him in enough money to purchase an estate at Hildersham, near Cambridge, where he spent the remainder of his life, and died in 1750. He also wrote a book on Miracles, denying the continuance of miraculous powers in the Church after the time of the Apostles, and in another treatise attacked Bishop Sherlock's discourses on prophecy.

Middleton, THOMAS FANSHAW, the first Bishop of Calcutta [b. at Kedleston, Derbyshire, 1769, d. at Calcutta, 1822]. He studied at Pembroke Hall, Cambridge, became Curate of Gainsborough, then Rector of St. Pancras, London, and Archdeacon of Huntingdon. He was a good Greek scholar, and an eloquent and impressive preacher; and having been selected to deliver a charge to a

Danish Missionary who was starting for India, his speech was so much admired by the Bishop of Lincoln that he recommended Middleton in 1814 to the newly-created Bishopric of Calcutta. After some hesitation Middleton accepted the post, and arrived in Calcutta in November, 1814. The duties of the diocese were very heavy, and the Bishop had unnumbered difficulties to contend with, which, added to the trying climate, enfeebled his health. In 1820 he founded the Bishop's College for the training of missionaries, and ordained some natives to Holy Orders. His literary works consist of The Doctrine of the Greek Article applied to the Criticism and Illustration of the New Testament, published in 1808, and a few sermons, charges, etc., which appeared after his death.

Mildmay Conferences.—Evangelical Conferences, now held from time to time at the Conference Hall, Mildmay Park. The first of them was held at Barnet in 1858, under the guidance of the Rev W. Pennefather and his wife, and in 1860 an iron room was built there for carrying on the mission work, which was afterwards removed to St. Jude's, Mildmay Park. In 1870 the present Conference Hall was finished, which will seat 2,500 people. It was designed to be a centre of union for Christians of all Evangelical denominations, and to facilitate the carrying on of a variety of Evangelistic and Missionary agencies. The large hall is used every Sunday afternoon and evening for preaching and various meetings, and the five basement-rooms are used for Bible classes on Sunday and during the week for helping the poor both temporally and spiritually. Once a Sunday there is a special service for the deaf and dumb. Adjoining the Hall is a Deaconess House, where ladies desiring to devote their lives to mission work live and give up their whole time to work among the poor of London, by undertaking house-to-house visitation, mothers' meetings, night schools, and classes of various kinds in districts in the East of London principally. There are also in connection with the Hall a Nursing House, a Cottage Hospital, Invalids' House, an Orphanage, an Invalids' Kitchen, a Dorcas Society, a Mothers' Meeting, Men's Night Schools, Medical Mission Hospital, Coffee and Lodging Houses at Bethnal Green, Railway Mission in Liverpool Street, and a Bible Flower Mission. A Mission to the Jews was commenced in 1876.

There is a daily prayer meeting held in the hall.

Military Orders.—The origin of these associations may be traced to the necessities of the Christian pilgrims to the Holy Land, who often reached Jerusalem utterly destitute and broken in health, and who were tended in the hospitals by the monks, who were compelled in self-defence to assume the joint character of soldier and monk. If these Orders have now fallen into disuse, some of them still exist in the form of knighthood. There were once 100; we give a few particulars of 6 important.

1. KNIGHTS HOSPITALERS.—This owed its foundation to some monk Amalfi, who obtained leave from the C Egypt to build a church at Jerusalem founded a monastery of the Benedictines to receive and entertain Christian pilgrims and a convent of nuns dedicated to the Holy Sepulchre. The hospital was founded in 1080, and the administration of it was committed to the Abbot Gerard, who Godfrey of Bouillon had taken in 1099, founded the Order of St. John of Jerusalem and became its first Grand Master. He instituted a rule and religion for the knights, who, at their reception, chastity, obedience, and self-sacrifice promised always to assist the Christian. Gerard died in 1118, and was succeeded by Raymond du Puy, who established a severe rule, which was confirmed by Pope Innocent III in 1210. Numerous hospitals and COMMANDERIES [q.v.], were established in side towns, whence pilgrims went on their way to the Holy Land. The Order had become military in 1104, and many men enrolled themselves, and they styled "knights." When Jerusalem was conquered by Saladin in 1187, the knights, with their Grand Master Deppe, fled to Margatt in Phoenicia, and thence to Rhodes, which they valiantly defended in 1292. They went to Cyprus, where they were in 1310, and in that year, under the Master, Foulques de Villaret, they took it and next year defended it against the Turks for which reason their successors bore these four letters for a device, F. L. R. Fortitudo ejus Rhodum tenuit. In 1480 the island was attacked by Solyman the Magnificent, and the Grand Master, Villaret d'Adam, was forced to capitulate, and retired to Candia, thence to Sicily. Pope Adrian VI granted them the Duchy of Viterbo. In 1530 the Emperor Charles V gave them the island of Malta, which they conquered from Tunis, on condition that they should defend his kingdom of Sicily from the Turks. In 1565 Solyman besieged it for four months, but it was gallantly defended by the Grand Master, John de Valette. They then remained undisturbed until 1798, when, by means of bribery to some knights and the cowardice of the Grand Master, Ferdinand d'Hompesch, it was surrendered to Napoleon. The Order was then suppressed in many of the States, and the office of Grand Master never since been filled up; a Deputy Master has, however, been appointed society. Matthew Paris says they had 9,000 houses or convents and 20,000 knights. Their stations in the East were Jerusalem, Antioch, Tripoli and Cyprus, and almost every country in the West had one of their Provinces. In each country they had their Governor, who was called Master of the Temple, or of the Militia of the Temple. One of their Masters fell at the siege of Acre [1291], and they then retired to Cyprus. Their work of fighting against the infidels was now done, and they took up no definite enterprise. In Spain and Portugal they remained popular for a time because of the assistance they gave against the Moors; but in France, where was their chief settlement, their immense wealth excited the cupidity of the French King. All sorts of dreadful charges were brought against them, many of them absurd and incredible, and in 1307 they were seized by secret orders of Philip le Bel and thrown into prison. Confessions were extorted from some of them by torture, which they afterwards retracted. In these proceedings Philip was aided by Pope Clement V., who owed his office to the French King. Philip, impatient at the Pope's leniency, submitted the case to the officers of the Inquisition; but the Pope suspended these proceedings and ordered that the knights should be tried by a commission of cardinals appointed by him. Two or three years passed in disputes as to how the Templars should be dealt with, and at last, in 1310, Philip called a Council at Paris, headed by the Archbishop of Sens, and under this Council the proceedings of the Inquisition were resumed. Many knights died either of torture or long captivity, and many were burnt, amongst them the Grand Master, Jacques du Molay; this was in 1313. The year before [1312] the whole Order had been abolished at the General Council of Vienne, and their property was given to the Knights of St. John of Malta, who also received from Edward II.

of England in 1323 a like grant of their English possessions. The Templars, though suppressed in other countries, were nowhere else ill-treated as in France. The seal of the Templars represented two knights riding on one horse, as an emblem of their poverty;
their war-cry was "Beau séant," and their banner bore the same name, and the motto,
"Non nobis, Domine, non nobis, sed Tuo Nomini da gloriam." Traces of the Knights Templars are still to be found in England: in the Temple Church, London, where are cross-legged figures of several of the knights; in the Round Churches at Northampton, Cambridge, and Maplestead; and in the names of several villages, as Temple Brewer, Lincolnshire; Temple Newsom, Yorkshire; Temple Cowley, near Oxford; places in which they possessed property and had small Preceptories of their Order.

3. TEUTONIC KNIGHTS, or KNIGHTS OF ST.
MARY, instituted after the siege of Acre in 1192 with the sanction of Henry of Jerusalem, Frederick of Suabia, and the Emperor Henry VI. in favour of the German nation, who had suffered greatly in that siege. The statutes of the Order were formed on the model of those of the Hospitallers and Templars. The knights were to be exclusively Teutonic or German, to be well born, to vow the defence of the Christian Church and Holy Land, and to give entertainment to the pilgrims of their own nation, and they were to be called Knights of St. Mary, or of Our Lady of Mount Zion. Pope Celestine III. ordered that they should be clad in white and wear a black cross, in the form of that of St. John of Jerusalem, on their habits, standards, and arms, and live according to St. Augustine's rule. At first the Teutonic Knights were all laymen, but soon they had priests, and in 1221 a class of half-brothers, or serving brothers, was added. Their first station was Acre. After the fall of Jerusalem they removed to Venice, thence to Marburg in Hesse, and in 1309 to Marienburg on the Vistula. In 1252 they had been joined by the Order of Christ, or Brethren of the Sword, who possessed Livonia, and for a long time the knights carried on a cruel war against the heathen nations on the shores of the Baltic, which resulted in the conquest of Prussia and other territories, and raised the Order to the rank of a sovereign Power. [See Chaucer's Prologue, "The Knight."] Their power began to decline in the 15th century, when Sigismund of Poland snatched West Prussia from them. In 1510 the knights chose his nephew, Albert of Brandenburg, for their Grand Master; this Prince embracing Luther's doctrines, treated with Sigismund to make him absolute master of Prussia, on condition of his doing homage for it to the Crown of Poland. He then drove the knights from the country, and they retired to Mergentheim in Suabia. The Order was formally abolished by Napoleon in 1809.

In Spain there were three military Orders:—

1. The KNIGHTS OF CALATRAVA, founded by a Cistercian monk named Velasquez, in 1158, to defend Calatrava from the Moors, were sanctioned by Pope Alexander III. in 1164. At first they were victorious, but in 1197 the Moors took Calatrava, and the knights went to Salvatierra and took that name till they were able to return to their former city in 1212. The Order soon became rich, and this caused so many dissensions as to patronage that in 1489 Pope Innocent VIII. annexed the Grand Mastership to the Crown of Spain. In this century the Order was suppressed with other monastic institutions in Spain, and the title is now only an honorary distinction.

2. KNIGHTS OF ST. JAMES OF COMPOSTELLA.—The relics of St. James the Apostle are said to have been buried at Compostella in Galicia, which occasioned an extraordinary concourse of pilgrims to flock thither. In 1161 thirteen Spanish nobles founded an Order of knighthood to protect them from the Moors; the Order was in 1176 by Pope Celestine III. stripped in wealth and power. Spanish Orders and gained vast. This wealth was with them, as Orders, the primary cause of their in 1522 the Grand Mastership referred to Papal authority. The Order not finally dissolved till 1824.

3. KNIGHTS OF ALCANTARA.—This was founded about the same time at Compostella, for the defence of it from the Moors. It adopted the rule of Benedict, and was confirmed in 1193 by Celestine III. It was afterwards merged in the Order of Calatrava, but in the 14th century the knights quarrelled over the election of a Grand Master, which resulted in war and ultimate separation. In 1476 Calatrava and Compostella, with the authority of the Spanish Crown, the Order was abolished in this century. It lived in 1874 by the late King of Spain.

Among French military Orders mention the ULTRAMARINE, or St. Louis Order, founded by St. Louis in 1229 to encourage his nobles to undertake expedition to the Holy Land; the KNIGHTS OF LARANTUS, to whom Louis VII. gave near Orleans, and who were united to the Knights of Malta by Pope Innocent III. but re-established by Henry IV. known also as the Order of Our Lady of Mount Carmel; the KNIGHTS OF ST. LUCAS, established by Louis XIV. in 1693—a military Order; the KNIGHTS OF THE DAME DE LIE, instituted against the Albigensians by Garcia IV., King of Navarre; then there was the Order of the FLORIN, instituted in 1429 by Philibert, Duke of Burgundy, in defence of Catholic faith, the military Order of DOMINIC, established against the Albigensians; the KNIGHTS OF JESUS CHRIST, founded about 1318 by Danya, King of Portugal, against the Moors.

In England we have the ORDER OF THE BATH spoken of by writers in the 14th century as of ancient custom, the ORDER OF THE GARTER, founded by Edward III. in 1347. In Scotland the ORDER OF THE THISTLE, instituted by James V. in 1540.

Petition.—A petition drawn itans, and presented to King April, 1603. It is so called because it was supposed to have been signed by 1,000 ministers, though in reality the number did not exceed 800. The chief reforms demanded by the Puritans were:—That the cross in baptism, questions addressed to infants, kneeling at the Holy Communion, confirmations, the ring in marriage, bowing at the name of Jesus, the reading of the Apocrypha in church, and the terms "priest" and "absolution" in the Liturgy, should be abolished; that women should not be allowed to baptise; that the use of the cap and surplice, and the keeping of holy days, should not be compulsory; that church songs and music should be moderated to better edification; that the clergy should preach at least once every Sunday; and that examination should precede the Communion. This petition resulted in the HAMPTON COURT CONFERENCE [q.v.].

Miller, HUGH [b. 1802, d. 1856], an eminent Scotch geologist, was the first editor of the Free Church newspaper, The Witness, started at Edinburgh in 1840. In 1844 an anonymous work, entitled Vestiges of the Natural History of Creation, had excited great attention in the religious world. Five years later Mr. Miller combated the views expressed in it by a work entitled Footprints of the Creator, in which he denied the literal meaning of the word "day" in the first chapter of Genesis, and also the universality of the Deluge. Such boldness of speech was a novelty then, and caused much alarm; but few persons would find anything in this to frighten them now. He was also the author of Testimony of the Rocks [1857], and of a Letter to Lord Brougham on the Auchterarder Case. His death occurred through suicide, clearly traced to overwork and worry acting upon a sensitive temperament.

Milman, HENRY HART, Dean of St. Paul's and ecclesiastical historian [b. 1791, d. 1868]. He was the youngest son of Sir Francis Milman, physician to George III. Educated at Eton and Oxford, in 1817 he became Vicar of St. Mary's, Reading. In 1820, the year of the publication of his first important sacred poem, The Fall of Jerusalem, he was made one of the Select Preachers at Oxford; in the next year, Professor of Poetry; and in 1829, Bampton Lecturer. In 1835 he was appointed Rector of St. Margaret's, Westminster, and, in 1849, Dean of St. Paul's. His works, which are of great ability and learning, were fiercely attacked on their first publication. They are among the first examples of the free handling which has become more familiar to us through the writings of Dean Stanley. The History of the Jews, written for Murray's "Family Library," scared old-fashioned persons accustomed to the mild Evangelicalism of writers like Simeon and Legh Richmond. Thus Milman called Abraham a "sheykh," and dealt with the sacred history in the critical spirit with which one would regard any other history. The book made its way in spite of opposition, and was followed by the History of Christianity to the Abolition of Paganism, and thus again by the History of Latin Christianity to the Pontificate of Nicholas V. This is a very grand work, full of learning and knowledge, though the style lacks the picturesqueness and sparkle which characterise Stanley. To be added to these works are a volume of Essays from the Quarterly Review on Savonarola, Erasmus, etc.; a fine edition of Gibbon, Annals of St. Paul's Cathedral; and his poems, The Fall of Jerusalem, The Martyr of Antioch, Belshazzar, etc. Two hymns by him are universally popular, "When our heads are bowed with woe" and "Bound upon the accursed tree." Under his deanship the popular services under the dome of St. Paul's were begun in 1858.

Milner, ISAAC and JOSEPH, brothers, eminent clergymen of the Evangelical school. They were educated at the Leeds Grammar School; but their father's death leaving them without means, Joseph was sent in his eighteenth year to Cambridge, and after ordination was appointed Head Master of Hull Grammar School, and Afternoon Lecturer in the church. Isaac had been put to work in a woollen factory, but now became his brother's Assistant Master, and in 1771 went to Queen's College, Cambridge, as a Sizar. Honours flowed in upon him. In 1774 he was Senior Wrangler; he was appointed to the two Chairs of Mathematics and Philosophy, Master of Queen's College (1788), and Vice-chancellor. In 1791 he was appointed Dean of Carlisle. At Cambridge he formed a close friendship with Wilberforce, in whose house he died in 1820, aged sixty-nine. His brother Joseph had long since finished his life at Hull, where, though he was nicknamed "the Methodist," his earnestness had gradually overcome all opposition, and the church at which he lectured was crowded, though he was not chosen to the incumbency of Trinity Church until a few weeks before his death in 1797. The work for which the two brothers are famed is the History of the Church of Christ, of which Joseph wrote the first three volumes, and Isaac the two last. In spite of its prejudices and one-sidedness, this book filled a great gap, and was the only work of the kind until Neander. The best part of it is the history of the Reformation, and especially the description of the character and work of Luther. The other works of the two brothers are obsolete.

Milner, JOHN, D.D., F.R.A.—A Roman Catholic Bishop (b. 1752, d. 1826). He was born in London, and received his early education at Sedgley Park, near Wolverhampton, and thence removed to the English seminary at Douay. In 1777 he was ordained priest, and sent to begin his missionary career in London. In 1779 he went to live at Winchester, and for twenty-four years had the pastoral care of the Catholic congregation there, and in 1792 built them a chapel. He had an ardent love of history and antiquities, a love which was fostered by the many remains of Catholic edifices in Winchester; he was made a Fellow of the Royal Society of Antiquaries, and wrote papers for them on the Glastonbury cup, on the Limerick gate and crozier, on an ancient copy of St. John's Gospel, on the use of the Pax, and on the emblematical figures on the font in Winchester Cathedral. He also wrote arduous antiquities for the Gentleman's Magazine, and a paper on Gothic architecture in Rees's Cyclopædia. In 1792 he published An Historical and Critical Enquiry into the Location and Character of St. George's. But the work which fixed his fame was The History, and Ecclesiastical, and Survey of the Abbey of Winchester, the first edition of which appeared in 1798, and a second in 1800. The book was praised by the reviewers as the highest merit. In his history Dr. Milner freely censured Bishop Hoadly, and that, "both living and dying he was a friend of the Church, of which he was a priest." For this he was attacked by Dr. B. Prebendary of Winchester, in a book called Reflections on Popery. Dr. Milner met this by a celebrated work, Lectures on Prebendary, which shows acute controversy and throws new light on those portions of English history subsequent to the Reformation. This work was extolled in the House of Commons, and its author was drawn to the Upper House by Bishop Hoadly, and attacked by the Lord Chancellor. Dr. Milner was made Bishop of the District of England, and was obliged to leave Winchester, and resided at Wolverhampton. In 1800 he was instrumental in establishing a school for Catholic youths at Oscott, near Birmingham, under the title of St. Mary's College. In later years he wrote several treatises on ecclesiastical architecture, and also some other works, the most important of which was The End of Religious Controversy. It had several controversial replies, one of the best of which was by Dr. J. H. Hopkins, Bishop of Vermont.

Milton, JOHN, the greatest of English sacred poets, the son of John Milton, scrivener, was born in London in 1608. He was educated at Christ's College, Cambridge, and after taking his degree lived a while at Horton, in Buckinghamshire, and wrote Minor Poems. He then travelled into Italy, returned to England about the beginning of the Civil Wars, and threw himself up into the ranks of the Independent party, and on the establishment of the Commonwealth became Latin Secretary to Cromwell. During this portion of his life his muse was almost silent; it was the period of his great

Minster.—A shortened form of the word
"monastery." The name is applied to churches to which a monastery or ecclesiastical fraternity was formerly attached, as Westminster, Sherborne Minster, etc. In a few cases the name has come into popular use for a cathedral, as at York, where the noble fane is almost always called "the Minster." But Ripon and Beverley in the same county are also called "Minsters."

Minucius Felix was a Christian apologist of the end of the second or beginning of the third century. He was a Roman orator, and his work entitled Octavius was in the form of a dialogue between a heathen and a Christian. It throws much light upon the treatment of Christians of those times, and is a powerful exposure of the absurdities
and the abominations of Paganism.

Miracle Plays were dramas founded on the historical parts of Holy Scripture and the lives of the saints. Such plays date from very early times. One such is attributed, though on questionable evidence, to St.
Gregory Nazianzen. The first record of an actual performance belongs to England.
Matthew Paris relates that the Abbot of St.
Albans exhibited one at Dunstable, about the beginning of the twelfth century; and in Fitzstephen's life of Becket there is mention made of dramatic representations of the lives of the saints in London. These plays were sometimes known as "Mysteries," and a distinction was made, but not closely adhered to, between "Mysteries," as representing Biblical subjects, and "Miracle Plays," legendary stories from the Hagiology; in fact, as Mr. A. W. Ward has remarked in his history of English dramatic literature, the name "Mystery," though common in France, was not applied to these dramas in England.
The performances were a distinguishing feature of the festival of Corpus Christi, established in 1264, the office for which was composed by St. Thomas Aquinas, and which comprised a recitation of the Creed and a drama of the Incarnation. The plays were performed originally in churches, but afterwards in the streets, becoming less and less religious, and more free and coarse, as time went on, until they became discredited. But they formed a large feature of mediæval amusements, and were often performed with much elaboration of language and of costume.
[See Ward's account of the Towneley and Chester Plays, i. 35-51.] Out of them were developed a third class of dramatic performances, known as "Moralities," in which the vices and virtues were personified. The popular representation of the devil with horns, tail, and cloven hoof is owing to the fact that this was his conventional style in the Middle Age "Moralities." Bishop Bale, the author of our first historical play, was also the author of the last miracle plays. When the Reformation came, Luther and others were in favour of continuing the performances. Milton's original idea of Paradise Lost was that of a sacred drama. But the sudden and magnificent rise of the secular drama in the days of Elizabeth was a death-blow to the "Moralities," by reason of its reality, truth to life, and expression of popular wants and feelings. Still, the old plays have never entirely died out. The performances of Old Father Christmas and St. George and the Dragon even yet survive in country parishes. The writer has seen both acted. On the Continent various causes led to the extinction of the sacred dramas, and in the eighteenth century they were suppressed in South Germany by law. In the village of Oberammergau the "Passion Play" still survives, and is acted every ten years. [OBERAMMERGAU.]

Miracles.—Miracles are mentioned in Scripture under four names: "wonders, signs, powers, and works." As "wonders," their immediate physical effect on the spectator is emphasised; as "signs," their moral and spiritual purpose is implied, lurking under their phenomenal aspect; as "powers," they hint at some hidden cause that produces them; while as "works," their general practical character is regarded, as the acts of a distinct person, in attestation of his mission and his message.

Still the question remains, What is a miracle? It may be replied that a miracle is not a violation of the ordinary laws of Nature, but a special interference of supernatural or superhuman power for a definite moral purpose. It is the extraordinary interposition of the Great Lawgiver Himself, modifying for the time the regular action of His own ordinary laws. Even so the human will is a potent factor in the physical world, as when a man raises his hand, or throws up a ball into the air, in spite of the law of gravitation. It is God's will making itself seen and felt in the ordinary course of Nature. A miracle, then, is a possible event, because it does not of itself deny the existence of the regular order of Nature. An exceptional phenomenon, like a miracle, simply reveals God in another way than that in which Nature reveals Him. An occasional departure does not overthrow the harmony of the cosmos, but, on the contrary, implies it. There could be no exception, unless there were also a general law.

Modern Science, which has fathomed more deeply the unbroken reign of Law physical order of Creation, denies the possibility of a miracle. The real question is, there a God, or is there not? If the miracle is possible. Once admit the One Almighty God, and a miracle is an imaginable event. And if there is room for one miracle, there is room for

But can a miracle be proved? It is denied that it could. Our belief, as to his view, is the result of experience. Ordinary experience knows nothing of miracles. He urges further that the human testimony advanced in their support is exceptional, and may be mistaken, in as all testimony is as likely to be false as true. No testimony, therefore, is to be received which contradicts the uniform tenor of the laws of Nature. The question, however, is not the general credibility of all human testimony, but the specific credibility of certain special witnesses. The character and circumstances of the witnesses, the apostles and Apostles is a distinct element in this inquiry. What they were in themselves, and what they suffered in support of the miraculous story they published, affords a strong proof that they were at least honest. But were they mistaken men, mistaken in their interpretation of the phenomena they witnessed? The answer is, No, not only because the character of some of the miracles was such as to admit only of one interpretation, and that, the supernatural interpretation, such, for instance, as the resurrection—and if we admit one miracle, we also admit others—but because of the extraordinary purity of the morality which the miracles, thus vouched for, inculcated, and also because of the lasting beneficial results that remain to this day.

It ought to be remembered that a wonder of itself proves nothing. The wonder must also be a sign, associated with a word or act indicative of design. The coincidence of extraordinary manner and purpose, which is found in most of the Scriptural miracles, and which is wanting in mediæval and so-called modern miracles, is an essential part of the evidence for the truth of the miracles themselves. What new morality, what permanent results, have followed from the fantastic miracles of the Middle Ages, or the unauthenticated vagaries of Modern Spiritualism?

Miracles, again, are necessary as the credentials of Revelation; and since Reason makes known what could not be otherwise discovered, what is beyond and above it follows that reason is not adequate to gauge the truth of a Revelation given; some other sign, some other evidence is wanted, viz., a miracle—in its purpose and its results evidently from above. A miracle, then, is not only possible, but probable if it is probable, it is also credible. The existing evidence in their favour, it credulous to renounce the miracles of Jesus than to accept them. To imagine that Christ founded His religion, and that His powers conquered the larger part of the world in His name, without miracles and their original credentials, is a strain on our reason and faith than to see that the miracles were facts, and the record given of them is true.

But all, Nature is not sufficient, apart from Revelation. There is no complete disclosure of God in Nature. It reveals Wisdom and Power, but not Love. The sum of Natural Theology, as Lord Brougham said, is only to discover "a great Mechanism." God's moral character, or His communion with ourselves, is not clearly legible in the works of Creation. "Our Father in heaven" was never found in the Bible; it was Christ Himself who authorised such a mode of address, and the Bible contains it. Under such conditions, if further Revelation was wanted, it is credible that it should be given; and so in the only way by which it can be substantiated—by the occasional disclosure of miracles; mighty, and therefore proofs of His power; beneficial, and therefore signs of His love; lasting in their results, and therefore evidences of a permanent sign; by which also He showed that there were other laws at work than the physical laws of Nature; by which, too, He lifted men's hearts and minds at once into a spiritual sphere, and made known to them His own moral perfections and influence. Nor is there an escape from such conclusions by supposing that Christ was in possession of some of the secrets of science in the time of His own day, or even of later times, and therefore wrought only what would be wonders to the ignorant eyes of the world. For as Christ appealed to miracles as proofs that He was God, and as God, He must then have been only a deceiver, even while inculcating the morality, which has since revolutionised the world. Such truth and such falsehood in the same Person would only exhibit a monster, which would be a monstrous thing in itself.

In the present day, the internal proof of Christianity most relied on is its sublimity and fitness for human wants. But, valuable as this may be as an auxiliary, internal proof is not sufficient without external evidence. Internal proof only appeals to reason, and reason is not the sole judge in such a case. Our Lord Himself said: "Believe in the Father . . . or else believe in Me for the very works' sake." This was an appeal for the truth of His doctrine from the character of His works. For instance, the facts of the Incarnation and Atonement are not proved actually to have taken place because they are exactly suitable to man's wants; such internal evidence requires historical corroboration as an additional proof in their favour. Even so, the indirect evidence from the character of the Gospel itself demanded the direct evidence of miracles in order to substantiate its claims.

In conclusion, it may be said that miracles are possible, if the existence of one Supreme God is admitted; that they are antecedently probable from the necessary character of a Revelation from Heaven; that trustworthy evidence has been adduced in their support of a very various and complex kind; and that by them a new moral and spiritual element has been introduced into the world, of which the lasting results are a standing proof of the miracles themselves. On the other hand, it should be pointed out that the question of the general credibility of miracles, as recorded in Scripture, must not be confounded with that of the actual occurrence or not of any single event presumed to be so recorded, but which may rest on less than the normal evidence, or may present less of those signs of a true miracle above mentioned, or may involve some error in interpretation. Thus, for instance, the narrative concerning Joshua and the sun and moon standing still may be held to be a quotation from a recognised poem, rather than a sober statement, and is so held by many who sincerely believe generally in the miraculous element of revelation. It is not so much the character of the marvel, as the moral surroundings and whole setting of the passage, that arouse suspicion in such a case. Again, the account of the angelic interference at the Pool of Bethesda is now known to be merely a corruption of the text, being absent from the oldest MSS. But caution is needed in the exercise of such selective processes, lest they degenerate into a mere systematic attempt to explain away every miracle where any possible grounds can be found. Such a course will be of no real benefit in the end, since, as has been partly indicated above, the miraculous element is too deeply ingrained in the Biblical revelation for one to be really destroyed without the virtual destruction of the other also.

Miserere.—The name given to Psalm li., one of the penitential psalms, which begins in Latin with the words "Miserere mei, Deus," "Have mercy upon me, O God." Sometimes any short anthem or office containing these words is so called. Also the name is given to certain stalls found in ancient churches, of which the seats will turn up, and thus give more room for kneeling. These misereres are to be found in many of the cathedrals, and are mostly carved, often with very grotesque figures.

Mishna. [TALMUD.]

Missal.—The book used in the Roman Church which contains the lessons and antiphons, with the canon, proper prayers, or collects and prefaces for the celebration of the Eucharist throughout the year.

The first mention of a missal is that of Egbert of York in the eighth century, but this contained neither the antiphons nor the lessons. About the eleventh or twelfth century appeared the Complete or Plenary Missal compiled for the use of the priests. There were different missals for various rites, as the Sarum, Roman, Ambrosian, and others; but in 1570 Pope Pius V. caused the Roman Missal to be revised, and then commanded it to be used throughout the Catholic Church. With the exception of a few alterations by Popes Clement VIII. and Urban VIII., this missal is still in use.

Missions.—The Church of Christ from its very nature was from the beginning a Missionary Church. "Go and make disciples of all nations" was the commission given to her by her departing Lord. Consequently the first records of the Church, as contained in the Acts of the Apostles, are almost entirely a narrative of the first Christian missions. The work was necessarily limited at first through the comparatively small size of the world as known to the Apostles. For the first four centuries the Roman Empire comprised the whole of the civilised world, and to the Roman Empire the preaching of the Gospel was confined during that time. Few records, however, remain of missionary preaching, simply because the facilities offered for travel in the wonderful organisation of the Empire brought the Church into the closest contact with the furthest confines, and so the Gospel spread without written records. This explains how it is that in so many cases we find distant lands in possession of the truth, without the slightest trace remaining of the conversion, or of the first missionary by whom they were visited. Gaul is a case in point. We have no record of its conversion, but by the end of the second century the Church seems to have been fully established, and its members ready, if necessary, to suffer a martyr's death. So the Church continued to spread through the Empire, partly through the indefatigable labours of its missionaries, and partly by the constancy shown by its members under persecution, until the middle of the fourth century. But at that time the Christians found themselves confronted by what must have appeared at first an almost hopeless task. Soon after Rome fell before Alaric, countless tribes of heathen poured into Europe and quickly overran the whole of the Roman Empire, and then the missionary powers of the Church were required as they had never been before. The heathen tribes who were now to be called into the Church comprised three classes—Celts, Teutons, and Slavs. They did not, of course, all come on the scene at once, but for years there was a constant stream of them flowing into Europe from Asia, those who came first being gradually pushed more and more westward as they were overtaken by the later arrivals.

The greater portion of the Celtic race had been incorporated into the Roman Empire, and therefore shared its civilisation and religion. But Northern Britain and Ireland were exceptions to this general absorption. The history of their conversion to the faith forms a very beautiful chapter in missionary history. The first missionary to the Irish of whom any record remains, was Palladius, sent by Pope Celestine about A.D. 431. He erected three wooden churches and baptised a few converts. But his work did not prosper, and he retired to Scotland, intending to make his way back to Rome, but died at Ford in Kincardineshire. Within a year he was followed by the famous St. Patrick, whose life will be found under his own name. His magnificent work was carried on with enthusiasm by his successors, Jarlath, Columba, and Dubtach. They founded schools and monasteries all over the country. The monastery of St. Bridget, at Kildare, was the most celebrated foundation for women. [Bridget.] The name of St. Columba is almost as illustrious as that of St. Patrick himself. [Columba.] To him was owing the conversion of the Picts, and of a great portion of Northern and Western Britain. The Welsh monastery of Bangor is said by Bede to have had 120 monks. Not only was their work well done in their own spheres, but its indirect influence was also mighty. To the Celtic schools were attracted from all parts of Europe. While fresh mission-fields were opened in successive years by other hands, the disciples of Patrick and Columba ever and anon appeared to quicken the flame when it grew dim. The Teutons treated them with high respect, and they made their way into far-off Iceland.

The Goths, who, led by Alaric, burst into the south, humbled even imperial Rome herself, and at last laid the mighty empire in dust, received Christianity to a limited degree from the people they had conquered, but in a limited degree only. The Arian heresy, banished by the Emperors from the Empire, found a lodgment among the Teutons, Visigoths, Ostrogoths, Saracens, Vandals, Lombards—every one was converted to an Arian Christianity. Consequently the Catholic historians are all but silent respecting the missionaries to them. One great name, however, comes before us, that of Ulphilas, the "Apostle of the Goths." [ULPHILAS.] The Eastern Church was supine, and did nothing for these Goths, who lived along the Eastern Danube, though St. Chrysostom displayed deep anxiety for their conversion. In the middle of the fifth century missionaries went forth to those who had already accepted the Arian faith, with the purpose of converting them to that of the Catholic Church.

VERINUS.] But the greatest Arianism among the Goths was when Clovis, or Chlodwig, crowned the Salian Franks and settled along the eastern line from the Maine to its mouth. But his conversion to Christianity, though it affected his own tribe, did not extinguish Arianism, was never beyond the tribe. There was no life or zeal observable, and the other side of the Rhine was still pagan.

The conversion of our own country, begun by the preaching of Augustine, was carried on by others, and was abundantly supported by missionary activity in the northern lines, but with a unity and in the long run brought about a uniformity of practice. [See AUGUSTINE; JULIUS; FELIX; OSWALD; WILFRED; SYNOD OF.]

The faith set up in the British Isles, as that of the Franks, was the nations which still re-

Of the many Irish missionaries who devoted themselves to the work of evangelism, the most distinguished was St. Columbanus, the Apostle of Southern France; also St. Gall, Fridolin, Rupert, Kilian, Livin. And the success which God gave in converting the heathen, these missionaries, even stirred up the slothful and idle preachers into Bavaria, one of whom, at Worms, founded the monastery, which in its turn became the mother of many other churches. Amalarius also went forth to convert the heathen, who made Ghent his headquarters, was bidden by the emperor Charlemagne, to baptise the Pagans all in the aid of the Frankish empire. This of course produced great prosperity; but when he abandoned the "excellent way" of redeeming the sick, and educating the heathen, he met with great success, and the Frisians heathen and destroyed the heathen. Years after him appeared St. Willibrord, whose life will be found under his name, and that of St. Wilfred, whose life will be found under his name, because he also preached to the heathen.

The latter was the first of the missionaries who went forth from England. He was also named in their several names. St. Boniface. The latter, of Germany, in his turn founded a famous school of missionaries, of whom will be found under the names of Willibrord and Sturm. The latter, under the name of Charles, was known by his French name. This mighty king, though he had many faults, was the instrument of spreading Christianity and civilisation where sheer barbarism had existed before. He kindled the torch of learning for modern Europe, and from that day it has been handed down to the nations which have succeeded. [CHARLEMAGNE.] The great monarch's reign had not come to an end when the Norse pirates began to appear in swarms along the coasts, not only of the German Ocean, but of the Mediterranean. All through the ninth century they poured forth incessantly, neither storms nor armies seemed to move them. They sacked and burnt towns on the coasts, sailed up the rivers, and carried off cattle and riches of all sorts. Known sometimes as "Northmen," sometimes as "Danes," they became a byword of terror for many generations. Yet even towards these missionary zeal was found to minister, and not unsuccessfully. [WILLEHAD; EBBO; SWEDEN, NORWAY, CONVERSION OF.]

We turn next to the Slavs, that great family which at the time when modern history begins extended from the Elbe to the Don, from the Baltic to the Adriatic. The Teutons, as we have seen, gradually became converts to Christianity. At the end of the seventh century the Bulgarians, a tribe lying between the Dnieper and the Danube, crossed the latter river, overcame the Slavs dwelling there, and became entirely incorporated with them. They were attacked by the Greek emperor Nicephorus in 811, but he was slain, and they held their ground. Soon afterwards a monk who had been captured by them was exchanged for a Bulgarian princess in captivity at Constantinople. On her return home, not only had she herself become a Christian, but she found that her brother, the reigning prince, had been deeply moved by his captive monk, though he refused to turn Christian. For a long time she entreated in vain, but at length, his deities having failed him in a famine, and the God of his sister proving strong to help, he was baptised by the Patriarch of Constantinople, the Emperor being his godfather. Unhappily the bitter jealousy between the Eastern and Western Churches displayed itself. The Bulgarians, partly moved by the quarrels of the missionaries who came to them, and partly by a reluctance to become too intimately connected with the Court of Constantinople, had applied for teachers to the German Emperor, and this had resulted in a mission from the Pope. After a tempestuous time of controversy they finally elected to place themselves under the Greek Patriarch, and a Greek episcopate was established in the country, and the faith began to spread, though it was hindered by the equal zeal of Mahometan missionaries. Connected with this centre was the conversion of Bohemia. [BOHEMIA; METHODIUS.] The Slavonic tribe which has since assumed so vast an importance in Europe is, we need not say, Russia. In early days the country was called Scythia, and there are legends of early preachers there, among them the Apostle St. Andrew. The empire which has since become so great first appears in history in the ninth century, but its Christianity dates from the baptism of the Princess OLGA [q.v.], followed by that of her grandson VLADIMIR [q.v.], under whose rule the Church was established in Russia. The conversion of the Wends, another Slavonic tribe, on the banks of the Oder and the Saale, belongs to the eleventh and twelfth centuries. [PRUSSIA, CONVERSION OF.] In 1292 RAYMUND LULLY [q.v.] began the first mission to the Mahomedans.

The Reformation for a time hindered to a great degree foreign missions, being itself a home mission to Christendom. For two centuries Christian missions on a large scale ceased to be sent out by the Reformed Churches. The only missionary work for a while after the Reformation was that of the Jesuits [XAVIER], and even this zeal presently cooled and almost disappeared. Then a few missionaries of the Reformed faith appear. Thus in 1632 Peter Heyling went to Abyssinia; he translated the New Testament into Amharic for the use of the natives. The Dutch sent missionaries to the Malay Archipelago, to South India, and Ceylon. A college for missionaries was established by Walæus, of Leyden, in 1612. In 1664 Baron von Welz laboured as a missionary in Dutch Guiana, and by his writings tried to rouse a missionary spirit among the Lutherans, but it was a long time before the claims of the heathen were considered by Reformed Christendom. The first mission of any importance was the Danish-Halle Mission, sent out at the beginning of the eighteenth century. The Danes had possessed the town and territory of Tranquebar since 1621, and in 1704 Dr. Lütken, one of the royal chaplains, persuaded King Frederick III. to give 9,000 marks (£450), with which he founded a college at Copenhagen to train missionaries to teach their Indian subjects. Soon after, two students from Halle, Bartholomew Ziegenbalg and Henry Plütschau, went out and reached Tranquebar, July 9th, 1706, and started what is known as the "Danish-Halle Mission." The first church was opened under the name of "New Jerusalem," in May, 1707, and soon after Ziegenbalg published an account of his conference with the Brahmins, which excited great interest in Europe, and help was sent from the English Propagation Society and Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge. Still the work was confined to Tranquebar, and it was not till 1750, when Christian Schwartz, also a student at Halle, arrived in India, that the missions spread. He was the first to establish Christian vernacular schools, in which he was greatly helped by a converted native, Raja Serfojee. Schwartz died in 1798, having laboured in the country nearly fifty years. At the same time other missionaries had arrived. In 1758 Kiernander, a Swede, came to Calcutta, built a church, which still remains, and was of converting 209 heathens and 300 B. Charles Grant, a Scotchman, worked in and founded a Christian Society, which came the first centre of Evangelical missionary effort in Northern India. He wrote a book called Observations on the Society among the Asiatic Subjects of Britain, which did more than any other to rouse up a feeling of interest in India, the chief enemy to the work carried on by the East India Company, which, however, won the people by their extreme intolerance. Missionaries were sent from Copenhagen to Greenland in 1721, and to Lapland at the same time. The Moravians sent missionaries to St. Thomas and to Greenland in 1731; in the latter country they established the settlement of Ny, or New, Herrnhut. In 1733 they began a mission to the Red Indians of New York and Pennsylvania, and later Zisberger became the Moravian missionary to the Delawares. In 1742 a Church of converted Indians was formed at Shoham. Previously to this the Moravians had sent a missionary from Herrnhut to America. And in 1736 they sent Schmidt as a missionary to the Bushmen of South Africa. The Moravians sent missions to the blacks of Australia and to the Tibetans in 1856. The Lutherans stood aloof from all such efforts, and had it not been for the efforts of the Moravians, missionary work would this period have ceased altogether. While, in England the first real attempt to evangelise the heathen was the establishment in 1649 of "the Corporation for the Propagation of the Gospel in New England," which was a Puritan undertaking, and the first Puritan missionary was John Eliot, who followed the Pilgrim Fathers to America in 1630, and for the remaining fifty-six years of his life laboured to convert the Indians of the tribe of the Iroquois Indians. At his death in 1696, there were 1,100 Indians carefully trained, and formed into congregations, with a native ministry, and many missionaries who laboured in the same manner. Meanwhile, John and Charles Wesley and Whitfield had been sent from England to the same enterprise. The American War of Independence, however, was a stop for a time to all missionary work, the missionaries being obliged to return to England. But in 1786 Dr. Coke was sent by Wesley to superintend the Methodist missions; he laboured till 1814, the following year, 1814, the General Methodist Missionary Society was established.

While the great body of the Churches did at first next to nothing for missionary work, the Church of Rome continued and sustained foreign missions on a avies in 1542 presided over the mission to Goa; he was a man of energy; his labours extended along the East Coast from Cape Comorin to Northern India, the Chinese Archipelago. At his death, in 1552, the missions in South India alone were numbered 1000. In 1622 Pope Gregory XV. at Rome the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith; its rich endowment greatly increased by successive popes is the wealthiest missionary society in the world, and supports extensive missions in all parts. In 1633 and 1644 orders of priests were formed in connection with mission work abroad; their principal centres were at Siam, Anam, Tongking, Japan.

The tactics of the Romanists, to convert the natives, in order to bring them to the Christian faith, have recoiled; and missions which were at first successful have in many cases ceased to exist. The rivalry between the different orders of missionary priests has destroyed the chances of successful work. Thus in Japan, where the mission was most successful, the native converts after three generations, and excluded from the country in 1637. Matteo Ricci and two others were expelled in 1579. By living as converts, Dominican and Franciscan missionaries arrived and exposed these tactics. Converts to Rome numbered 138,000 and 404,530 native disciples; 254 European priests labouring in the country. In Africa many missions were established along the coast. Missions were the result principally of expeditions sent out by the two kingdoms of Spain and Portugal.

At the latter part of the eighteenth century England began to awake to the necessity of evangelising the heathen. It is due to William Carey, through his influence "The Paris Missionary Society for Propagating the Gospel to the Heathen" was formed in 1785. The following year Carey and John Williams, an East Indian, landed in India. After undergoing great privations in translating the New Testament he succeeded in making a few converts, forming a community, who sent out missions to West Africa.

In 1799 by four more missionaries from England, and a settlement was founded at Serampore, from whence missions were sent out over Northern India and

The Serampore mission met with success; but soon after 1815 it was superseded by the Baptist Society. Some of the first converts of this mission were the first converts of the Bible into about forty different dialects of India, China, and Central Asia; the first Christian primary school in North India; the first college to train native ministers, and to teach educated Hindoos Christianity. Over thirty large mission stations sprang from Serampore. The Baptist Missionary Society has done much also in West Africa, where it has taken charge lately of the Congo Mission. The General Baptist Missionary Society, founded at Derby in 1816, maintains missions in Orissa and Ganjam, India.

The Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts was founded in 1701 by royal charter, "for the religious instruction of the Queen's subjects beyond the seas, and for the propagation of the Gospel" "in the plantations, colonies, and factories of Great Britain." It is the oldest Missionary Society of the Church of England, and has given very great assistance in spreading the Gospel among the heathen. It maintains now 527 ordained missionaries, of whom 161 are in Asia, 129 in Africa, 20 in Australia and the Pacific, 216 in America and the West Indies, and one in Europe. The income of the Society is upwards of £100,000. There are also 1,404 catechists and lay teachers, mostly natives, and 300 students supported by the Society. But it must be noted here that this Society was intended for "the Queen's subjects." It must be acknowledged that the Church of England did not show the zeal which ought to have been shown on behalf of the heathen. The apostle, as already hinted, of England to the heathen was WILLIAM CAREY [q.v.]. When he made his proposals to the assembly at Northampton in 1786, there was not a single native of Britain engaged in the conversion of the heathen. Nor indeed was it much better in Europe generally; the only spark of missionary zeal discernible was in the Moravian settlement at Herrnhut. The grand work of Carey in India was followed by the foundation of the London Missionary Society in 1795. It was undenominational in its constitution, but is practically in the hands of the Congregationalists. Its average income exceeds £125,000, and that of the Wesleyan Missionary Society is about £160,000.

The Church Missionary Society was founded in 1799. It grew out of the Eclectic Society, which had been established for the discussion of religious questions by meetings of "Evangelical" clergymen of the Church of England and Dissenters. The income of the society has risen to over £200,000, and it is at present at the head of all the evangelistic organisations of Christendom. It sent missionaries to West Africa in 1804, to Madras in 1814, and to Calcutta in 1820. In Africa there are stations at Sierra Leone, the Niger, Victoria Nyanza, and Cairo. In Asia, stations are to be found in Palestine, Persia, India, Ceylon, Mauritius, China, and Japan; missionaries also work among the Maories of

New Zealand, and in North-West America and the North Pacific. In all they maintain 320 European missionaries and teachers, and over 200 ordained native clergy. The name of Henry Martyn will long be remembered among missionaries of the present century.

In the Quarterly Review for July, 1886, is an article on modern missions, giving a vast amount of information. The tables there given show that the Church of England Missionary Societies have an annual income of £531,918; mixed societies of £288,550; Scotch, Irish, and Colonial, of £242,260; Nonconformist, of £253,770. Continental missionary societies are returned at £193,653, and American at £606,450. This classification, however, includes amongst "mixed" societies the London Society, which is entirely Nonconformist, while the Irish, Scotch, and Colonial societies are also Nonconformist. To these societies must be added the missions of the Church of Rome, under the care of the Propaganda. Upwards of a quarter of a million is poured into the treasury of missions by the flourishing society known as "L'Œuvre de la Propagation de la Foi," whose head-quarters are at Lyons. The Roman Church was never more enterprising in the matter of missions than it is at present, and the organization is very remarkable and complete. The divisions of Christendom are a terrible hindrance to missionary work, and how much remains to be done will be seen when it is stated that, calculating the population of the world at 1,440 millions, the Christians number 440 millions, leaving 1,000 millions still unconverted to Christianity.

Mitre.—The episcopal coronet or head-dress, which is always used, as distinctive, in episcopal armorial bearings. The name "mitre" was formerly given to the turban worn by Greek and Latin women, and also by Asiatic men. The cap worn by the Jewish high-priest, which is called in the Septuagint "mitra" or "ciradis," seems to have been a sort of turban, but Josephus mentions a sort of triple crown which was worn over it.

It has been thought by some that the well-known Episcopal mitre, or pointed cap with the top cloven or divided, was copied from the head-dress of the Jewish high-priest; but this appears doubtful for reasons above stated. Others have traced in it, with perhaps more reason, a symbol of the "cloven tongues" which descended on the day of Pentecost. There is little doubt that the mitre was specially connected with the Roman Church and then gradually spread all over the Western Empire. Thus we hear that in 1049 Leo IX. placed the "Roman mitre" on the head of Eberhard, Archbishop of Treves; and afterward the mitre, "which is the sign of the Romans," was granted to the Bishop of Hamburg. From that time it was widely used, and was worn by the cardinals till the cardinal's hat was sanctioned in 1268 were worn in England at the coronation of Edward VI. and Elizabeth; but with a few exceptions, they have since been in comparative disuse. In the East there are three sorts of mitres: the "mitre," ornamented with jewels; the "mitre phrygiata," without precious ornaments, made of gold cloth; and the "mitre," white silk and linen. No mitre is worn in the Greek Church.

Mixed Chalice.—Water and the wine of the Holy Communion. (See also from one of St. Cyprian's epistles, a hint, that the custom of the Church was to use wine mixed with water, and he both as necessary, from the example of Christ; adding somewhat why it should be so—viz., that the presented the people as the wine blood of Christ: and when in the water is mingled with the wine, His people are united together. A says, in sanctifying the cup of the "water cannot be offered alone, as the wine be offered alone, for if the offered by itself the blood of Christ be without us, and if the water be, people begin to be without Christ. The Third Council of Carthage seems to the same opinion of the necessity, when they determined that nothing at the altar but what the Lord commanded—that is, bread, and wine and water. Numerous other writers also refer to the same practice; yet, as there is no express command for the institution, notwithstanding the consent of the ancient Church, it is determined by modern divines, as the Roman as Protestant comment is not essential to the Sacrament. A reader that is curious may find this in Vossius in his dissertation upon this [Bingham's Orig. Eccl., book xv. ch. 10.]

Modalists.—Another name for Unitarians. Those who make the distinction of the Persons of the Trinity to consist in the mode of manifestation. (See also Unitarianism.)

Moderator. [See also Moderator.]

Moderator.—The name given to the presiding officer at the General Assembly of the Kirk Sessions, and other Presbyteries. On the introduction of episcopacy in Scotland, perpetual moderators were appointed in the presbyteries.

Moffat, Robert, D.D., the great missionary, was born on Dec. 21st 1811, in Ormiston, East Lothian. He was a sea-captain, but soon gave that up to become a gardener. In 1815, after attending a missionary meeting at Warrington, he obtained his parents' consent to take of the London Missionary Society, l at Surrey Chapel in October, 1816, hn Williams, the "Martyr of Error" and others. He at once started for Africa, and took up his abode at Afrikaal.

After two years he left for home, and in 1819 married Miss Mary who greatly helped on his missionary

He afterwards spent most of his life except for occasional trips to Cape Town in aid of Mrs. Moffat's health, among the Hottentots and Kurumans, translating St. Gospel and other portions of Scripture into Nama. One of his daughters married Livingstone. Though he went to England under the London Missionary Society, Moffat also worked on behalf of the British and Foreign Bible Society, of which, in 1845, he became vice-president. He returned to England in 1870 on account of his ill health, but she died in London in 1871. In the next year Dr. Moffat received a D.D. by the University of Edinburgh and in 1873 received a testimonial of appreciation as a mark of the public appreciation of his labours. Another testimonial was the erection of the Moffat Institution at Port Natal for the training of Bechuana pastors. Some years before his death he moved to Hildenborough, near Tunbridge Wells, where he devoted himself to the translation of Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress into Nama. He died on August 9th, 1883, in his eighty-seventh year.

Möller, JOHANN ADAM, one of the most modern polemical Roman Catholic writers, was born at Igersheim in Würtemberg May 6th, 1796. He studied theology at Tübingen, and was ordained priest in 1819, for a short time acted as missionary; but he returned to his university as Classical Professor, and was finally chosen as Theological Professor. Here he wrote most of his works, the chief being a treatise On the Unity of the Church, followed in 1827 by Athanasius the Great and the Church of his Time. His lectures were always crowded, many Protestants often among his auditors. His best work is Symbolism, or the Doctrinal Differences between Catholics and Protestants, translated into English by J. R. Mozley in 1843, in which Romanism is satirised and Protestantism is caricatured; the Reformation is acknowledged to have sprung from purely religious motives, and is answered by several Protestants, the chief work on the subject is Dr. F. C. Baur's Difference between Catholicism and Protestantism; to which Möhler replied in Other Researches into the Doctrinal Differences of Catholics and Protestants. He died at Munich on April 12th, 1838. Möhler was the author of a Church history, and is considered as one of the most acute philosophical controversialists.

Molina, LOUIS.—A celebrated Spanish

Jesuit [b. 1535, d. 1600], for twenty years Divinity Lecturer in the University of Evora in Portugal. Molina's principal works are A Commentary on St. Thomas, On Justice and Right, and the celebrated treatise on the Consistency of Grace and Free Will, of which some account will be found in the article on JANSENISTS.

Molinos, MIGUEL DE.—A Spanish priest, born at Saragossa, 1640, of a noble family in Aragon. He was patronised by the Pope and Cardinals on account of his learning and theology, and published in 1676 a Guida Spirituale, and shortly afterwards a Breve Trattato della Cottidiana Comunione. In these works he put forth a new and startling theory, namely, that men ought to practise entire abnegation of self, so as to bring themselves into close union with God, after which they should remain in quietness of mind, with no further care for their bodies. The theory took the name of Quietism, and held much the same place in Spain as Jansenism held at the same time in France, and Pietism in Germany. It gained many supporters, but was looked upon with deep suspicion by the Jesuits, who foresaw a decline of the power of the Church, when outward symbols should be set aside, and the worship of the Church regarded as secondary to private devotion. The matter was brought before the Inquisition, who at first acquitted Molinos; but Louis XV. urged the Pope to interfere, and the Inquisition was again required to examine into the case. This time the doctrines were condemned, in Aug., 1687. The writings of Molinos were confiscated, and himself arrested and sentenced to be burned; but the sentence was afterwards commuted to imprisonment for life, in consequence, it has been said, of his recantation. A Bull was issued against him in the same year by Pope Innocent XI., who had formerly been his patron. He died at Rome, in the dungeons of the Inquisition, Dec. 28th, 1697.

Mollah.—A Mahometan Doctor of the Law, and, as such, possessed both of spiritual and civil authority; an expounder of the Koran, and also a judge in civil and criminal cases.

Monarchians.—Heretics who deny the distinction of Persons in the Divine Nature. The term comes from the Gr. monarchia: monos, "alone," and archo, "to govern," literally, the government of a single individual. The heresy of the Monarchians may be traced in the very earliest times of Christianity; they are mentioned by Tertullian. The opposite views to be found among them involved them in more violent disputes with each other than with the Church, but they all agreed with regard to what was conveyed by this term of Monarchianism—a zeal to preserve the unity of the consciousness of God, which made them unwilling to acknowledge any other Divine Being than the one God, the Father. Either they absolutely rejected the doctrine of the Logos, or they understood by the Logos simply a Divine energy, the Divine wisdom or reason, which illuminates the souls of the pious. There were amongst them two great classes. With the one class, the dialectical, critical faculty of the understanding was supreme; with the other, the practical element and Christian feeling predominated. While the first class saw nothing in Christ but His human nature, and kept the Divine element entirely out of sight, the others could see nothing but the Godhead, and wholly suppressed or overlooked the human element. Accounts of the various sects included under the comprehensive term of Monarchians, will be found under their respective heads, viz., ALOGI, ARTEMONITES, PATRIPASSIANS, SABELLIANS, PAUL OF SAMOSATA, THEODOTIANS.

Monasticism. — A monastery may be defined as a house of religious retirement or seclusion. The word is an English form of the Greek word monasterion, "a secluded dwelling." The popular form of the word was "minster," as in Westminster or Newminster.

As Christian institutions, monasteries took their rise from the days of persecution. In the Decian persecution [A.D. 250-3], and again in that of Diocletian [A.D. 303-13], many Christians took refuge in the deserts, where they were obliged to lead lives of great privation. Some of them became so attached to such a kind of life, that they still continued to pursue it after the necessity for doing so had passed away. These gradually acquired distinctive names, some being called Ascetics [Gr. askētai], "men training, or exercising, or disciplining themselves." As St. Paul says, "Herein do I exercise myself" [Gr. en touto de askō]. Others went by the name of ANCHORITES [Gr. anachōrētai], "men who had retired from the world;" while others again were named HERMITS [Gr. erēmitai], "men of the desert."

After persecution had ceased, large numbers of the hermits formed societies for the purpose of living in common, calling themselves by the name of Cœnobites [from two Greek words, koinos, "common," and bios, "life"], and thus were formed the first actual monasteries among Christians. They were of a simple and voluntary character at first, but when St. Basil [b. 329, d. 379] put them into a more definite form, he probably introduced the practice of vows, which in early times were binding upon the monks as long as they resided in the monastery, but permitted them to leave and give up the monastic life when they pleased.

It was by St. Athanasius, the friend of St. Antony, that the system was introduced into Europe [about A.D. 340]; and after his day it made great progress under Augustine, of Tours, and others of a similar character. By them monasticism was consolidated into a much better and more practical form than which it had assumed in the East.

Formerly the monks were all laymen; only were monks prohibited the priesthood, but, as appears from the letters of St. Cyprian, priests were expressly prohibited from becoming monks. Pope Siricius was the first who called them to the clericate, on account of some great scarcity of priests that there was then supposed to labour under, at that time the priesthood was usually filled by the monastic profession.

Towards the close of the fifth century monks, who had formerly lived by themselves in solitary retreats, found themselves in a condition to claim an equal station among the pillars and supports of the Christian community. The fame of their sanctity was so great that bishops and emperors were often chosen out of their order, and their learning made them useful to the bishops in refuting heresies, chiefly in the great Nestorian controversy; but many abusing their authority, it was ordered at the Council of Chalcedon that monks should be wholly separated from bishops, and should build no more monasteries without their leave, and should be exempted from ecclesiastical employments, except such as were thereto by their bishops. From this condition they were exempted by the Council of Nicaea in the seventh century, and in return they devoted themselves wholly to advancing the interest and maintain the dignity of the Bishop of Rome. This immense authority was a fruitful source of contention and disorder, and occasioned a greater part of the vices with which the monks were afterwards charged. In the eighth century the monastic discipline was relaxed both in the East and West. All efforts to restore it were in vain. Nevertheless, this kind of institution continued to the highest esteem, and nothing comparable to the veneration paid in the ninth century to those who thus retired from the world. Some were called to Court and employed in the affairs of the greatest moment.

Lateran Council in 1215, however, decreed that no one should be admitted to the monastic life without the advice of Innocent III. to prevent any new monastic institutions.

The monastic system in its integrity may be best represented by the Benedictine Monks [q.v.]. A monastery of this kind was a collegiate institution, in which a number of laymen and a few chaplains lived together for the purpose of living a religious life and doing work for religion. They took three vows: the first, to remain single and to observe chaste lives; the second, to be obedient to the regulations under which they were to live, and to those who were appointed with the government of the society; the third, to live without any property.

e.—A pastor of the French of very great power and influence as a preacher. Though the last six months of his life were scarcely ever free from intense suffering, he was enabled to gather strength on Sundays to preach to his flock up to within a week of his death. He had even summoned them for the day of his death, April 6th, 1856, but died before they could assemble, God thus answering the prayer he had so often expressed, "May my ministry only end with my life." Some of his sermons, with a memoir, are published in English by Nisbet, 1857.

Monogamy of the Clergy.—The di- rection of St. Paul to Timothy that bishope and deacons should be "husbands of one wife" admitted of and received two interpretations, and gave rise to a different usage in different Churches. Some regarded it as excluding from ordination those who had married twice; others modified this view by confining the prohibition to the case of those who had married twice after their baptism; while others, again, thought that those only were excluded who practised polygamy. The same variety of interpretations obtained with regard to the condition that the widows recognised on the Church roll should have been the wives of one man.

Monogram.—A symbol representing any name; in an ecclesiastical sense, the abbrev- iation of the name Jesus Christ. Such are X (the Greek ch), to which is sometimes added P (R) thus P and sometimes the final letter T, which is X also regarded as a symbol of His death. Another monogram is Q i.e. "Alpha and Omega," which finds its A explanation in Rev. i. [See I. H. S.]

Monophysites [from monos, "alone," and physis, "nature"].—A general name given to all those sects who acknowledge only one nature in Christ. Such were the EUTYCHIANS [q.v.], condemned at the Council of Chalcedon in 451. The decrees of that Council, however, were fiercely opposed by the followers of Cyril, Patriarch of Alexandria, who declared that the Council had reinstated the Nestorian heresy. Theodosius, a fanatical monk, spread the seeds of discord in Palestine, and pro- cured the banishment of Juvenalis, Bishop of Jerusalem, and his own election for a time to that dignity. In Alexandria Proterius was nominated Patriarch in the room of the deposed Dioscurus, and a great schism arose, which was only quelled by military force. The Monophysite party was headed by the Presbyter Timotheus Ailurus, and on the death of the Emperor Marcian, he was ap- pointed Patriarch. The Emperor Leo appealed to Pope Leo the Great as to the legitimacy of the election of Ailurus, and in 460 he was banished to Cherson; but Timotheus Salo- phaciolus, a neutral person, was appointed in his place. In Antioch Petrus Fullensis was supported by Zeno, son-in-law and successor to the Emperor, and when in 476 Basiliscus expelled Zeno, and secured the imperial throne to himself, the Monophysites became the ruling party in the East. In 477 Zeno once more made himself master of the Empire, and to settle the manifold dissensions which were disturbing Church and State, he, in 482, offered to the disputants the formula of concord called the HENOTICON [q.v.]. For a moment it seemed successful. Petrus Mongus, the Patriarch of Alexandria, accepted it, and the Monophysites who had looked on him as their leader, separated themselves from him, and having no principal leader they were designated the headless sect, ACEPHALI. On the other hand the conviction grew upon the Roman Pope that the Henoticon was really in favour of the Monophysites, and then the schism grew worse than ever. Instead of two parties, there were now four—the zealots on both sides, and the moderates of the two parties who accepted the compromise. The Roman Church stigmatised the ruling party of the Oriental Church as heretical; and a schism between the Eastern and Western Churches was the consequence. In 491 Zeno died, and was succeeded by Anastasius, whose partiality for the Monophysites caused riots and bloodshed at Constantinople. Then two men of vigorous activity took the lead of the Monophysites. One of these was Xenayas, a Persian, whose name was changed into the Greek form Philoxenas, and who is best known as the promoter of the Philoxenian Syriac translation of the New Testament. The other was Severus, a learned monk of Palestine, who had been made Patriarch of Antioch, and was deposed about 520. Severus held peculiar views regarding the united wills in the united natures, and thus prepared the way for the opinions of the MONOTHELITES [q.v.]. One of his deacons, Themistius, invented the tenet of the AGNOËTÆ—that the human soul in Christ was like ours in everything, even in ignorance. Anastasius had been succeeded by Justin in 518, who was a tool in the hands of his nephew Justinian, and was persuaded by his chief ministers to depose all the Monophysite clergy. Severus fled to Egypt, where his party was strong, and here he headed that portion called the PHTHARTOLATRÆ or CORRUPTICOLÆ, who maintained that Christ's human nature was corruptible, all qualities of human nature being retained in our Lord after His Incarnation, though so incorporated with the Divine nature as to have no longer any identity of their own.

Justinian, who became emperor in 527, meant to be orthodox, but his wife Theodora, who was attached to Monophysitism, successfully plotted for the advantage of that party, moved by hatred of Roman ascendancy. Her agent in these schemes was Anthimus, who had once been a bishop in Pontus, and who had resigned under pretext of living a more Christian life as a monk; he came to

Constantinople, drew around him all important men of the Monophysite party amongst them Severus, and was made archbishop of Constantinople in 535. Just then no idea that his bishop was unorthodox. A year later, when the Pope Agapetus visited Constantinople, and a complaint was made against Anthimus by the dissatisfied monks which ended in his deposition and the election of Mennas to the patriarchate. Agapetus died the following year, and Theodora visited her son-in-law, the General Belisarius, and secured that a deacon named Vigilius, who was his successor on condition of joining the Monophysite party. Vigilius, however, was afraid of committing himself. While professing to submit to Chalcedon, he wrote letters of sympathy to Anthimus, and that Theodora could not effect more, she then endeavoured to gain her point by citing quarrels amongst the opponents of Monophysitism; she represented to Justinian that the chief objection of the Monophysites to the Council of Chalcedon was that it had approved of the writings of Theodore of Mopsuestia, Theodoret, and Ibas of Edessa, which favoured Nestorianism; and that if these writings were condemned, an important obstacle would be removed to the reunion of the Council of Chalcedon, and the object he was striving for would be attained, viz., the reuniting of the Monophysites to the dominant Church. The result was that Justinian in 544 issued an edict condemning the writings of the three obnoxious above-named, which were known under the title of "The Three Chapters." No matter how much as all these writers had been in communion with the divines of Chalcedon, the condemnation of their writings was regarded as a condemnation of that Council, and the Church long refused acquiescence, and for eight years were spent in unfruitful controversies. Mennas, the Patriarch of Constantinople, and others, agreed in condemning the three articles, but Justinian could not do as he wished with the Bishops of the East and North Africa. Vigilius thus encouraged, refused to subscribe, and in 551 was obliged to abscond. Then it was determined that a General Council for the determination of the dispute should be assembled at Constantinople in 553, under the Patriarch Eutychius, who succeeded Mennas; Vigilius was invited to take part in this Council, but declined, and the Council therefore decided according to the imperial edict. Several bishops of the East and North Africa were deposed and exiled. Still the object sought of reconciling the Monophysites to the dominant party was not attained, and the unstable character of the Roman Bishop caused a schism in the Church, the Churches of Istria renouncing fellowship with the Roman Church.

It will thus be seen that these mono- theistic religions depend on special revelations from God—that to the Jews, of the unity of the Godhead, being the starting point of all; for Mohammedanism doubtless borrowed its strict belief in one God from the Jews.

Monothelites.—This heretical sect arose in the Eastern Church in the seventh century, through a desire to bring the doc- trines of the Monophysites [q v] into har- mony with the orthodox doctrines of the Church. The Emperor Heraclius was assured by one Paul, a man of great influence among the Armenian Monophysites, that the peace of the Church might be restored by the reaffirm- ation of the decrees of Chalcedon with the ad- dition of the proposition that after the union of the two natures, there was in Jesus but one will and one operation, which was partly Human and partly Divine. Cyrus, whom Heraclius had raised from the Bishopric of Phasis to the Patriarchate of Alexandria, as- sembled a Synod at Alexandria in 633, whereat this doctrine was affirmed, and, in consequence, vast numbers of the Eutychians became recon- ciled to the Church. The Patriarch of Jeru- salem opposed, and appealed to the Bishop of Rome, Honorius, who declared in favour of the Monothelite doctrine. In 639 Heraclius is- sued his Ecthesis, or "exposition of the faith." It was accepted by the Eastern Church, but condemned by Pope John IV., successor of Honorius. This was followed by the "Type," issued by the Emperor Constant II., forbidding all controversy concerning the Will of Christ. But both parties were too embittered now to keep silence, and a Council called by Pope Martin in 649 condemned the heresy, heretics, and both edicts together—an act which caused the Emperor to condemn Pope Martin to death, though the sentence was commuted to banishment to Cherson. The Monothelite doc- trine was finally condemned at the Sixth Lateran Council at Constantinople [680-1], and it was decided that Christ has "two natural wills and two natural operations, without division, without conversion or change, with nothing like antagonism or confusion;" but that the Human will is subject to the Divine. Anathemas were also pronounced on the leaders of the heresy, and repeated for three centuries by the successors of Pope Honorius.

Monseil, HARRIET, sister-in-law of John B. B. Monseil, died Easter Day, 1883. She was the daughter of Sir Edward O'Brien, of Dromoland, in Ireland, and married the Rev. Charles Monseil. On her widowhood in 1850 she resolved to give herself up to the work of the Church, she accordingly resided at Clewer, and gave her active help in the House of Mercy which the Rev. T. T. Carter had originated in 1849. She lived with an invalid

sister in Windsor, and when she went to and fro to the old house which had been purchased for the House of Mercy, there was not even the nucleus of a sisterhood; but no more happy association of characters can be imagined for the creation of a work like the sisterhood of St. John the Baptist at Clewer than Harriet Monsell's and Mr. Carter's. She was neither literary, scholarlike, imaginative, nor critical; but hers was the brightest and gayest of natures, with a quick, clear knowledge of men and manners, and the sharpest common sense. Her sympathy was a vast power. A community larger than most colleges, having within the walls of the mother house almost an equal number of female penitents, with about twenty other centres of work in hospitals, schools, orphanages, penitentiaries, and missions, besides a large number of associates of both sexes,—the bare enumeration of these represents a sphere adequate to the capacity of the widest sympathy. But quite outside all these demands on the Mother Superior of a "religious house," Harriet Monsell was the adviser and comforter of numerous friends; no one could be said to be more accessible than "the Mother of Clewer." She was one of the most hopeful women in the world. With a consciousness that she was dead against the stream of public opinion during twenty-five years of a notorious work, having to overtake and overpass prejudice at every stroke, committed to a venture of great audacity, insisting on the creation and extension of a work absolutely new in the English Church, with no optimistic and sentimental ignoring of hard and ugly facts,—she lived by hope, and the cheerfulness of her life was the beautiful product of this hopefulness of her soul. Seventy sisters followed their foundress to her grave.

Monsell, JOHN S. B. [b. 1811, d. 1875], sacred poet, born in Ireland and educated at Trinity College, Dublin, was examining chaplain to Bishop Mant, and became Vicar of Egham, Surrey, in 1853, and Rector of St. Nicholas, Guildford, in 1870. His poems are very sweet and devout, and some of his hymns are very popular.

Monstrance or Expository.—The vessel in the Roman Church in which the Sacrament is exposed to the gaze of the faithful on solemn occasions. The vessel is usually of gold or silver, with a tall stand, on which is a circle of crystal through which the host is visible, and this is surrounded by rays to represent the sun.

Montalembert, CHARLES FORBES, COUNT DE [b. 1810, d. 1870].—A devout lay writer of great influence of the Roman Church. He was born in England, but came of an ancient family of Poitou; his father was for some time French minister in the Court of Sweden; his mother was Scotch. He was chiefly educated in the University of but spent a good deal of his youth in France. While quite a young man he formed an intimate acquaintance with the Abbot de Mennais, then the ardent advocate of the alliance between Catholicism and Democracy, and they started as their organ a paper called the Avenir. They entered on a contest with the University of Paris, and pronounced its monopoly of education, and proved the superiority of their system. Montalembert, in conjunction with Lamennais, opened a "free school" without the sanction of the authorities, for which he was prosecuted. In 1835 he was censured by Pope Gregory XVI. for advocating the union of Catholicism and Democracy, and two years later he was in collision with the Government of France on the question of religious liberty, and delivered his three famous speeches in the Chamber of Peers—on the Liberty of the Church, the Liberty of Instruction, and the Liberty of the Monastic Orders. On this occasion he declared himself the defender of the rights of Jesus. In 1845 he founded the Association of Religious Associates, and after the Revolution was accomplished he became a member of Louis Napoleon's government, and received the Legion of Honour. At this period he was constantly in contact with Victor Hugo. His adherence to Bonapartism did not long endure, and he was banished at the decree of 1851 confiscating the property of the Orleans Princes, he withdrew himself from the Government, and for the time till his death was a bitter opponent of the Imperialists. In 1851 he was elected member of the French Academy. His parliamentary career came to an end, and the following year he was sentenced to a fine and imprisonment for having published in the Correspondant (a liberal periodical, the organ of the Liberal party) referring to the Indians in the English Parliament, and the institutions of France. The Government remitted the penalties, much to the relief of the accused, who professed to consider himself dishonoured by this course, and he brought on himself a new prosecution by an article in the same periodical on the policy towards the Pope.

Montalembert was a great orator, and the speeches mentioned above, he delivered, especially famous, on the murder of Pope's minister Rossi and on the proprio of the Pope. He spoke English perfectly, and had an acquaintance with English literature. His political views may be found in his admiration of Edmund Burke; he had strong sympathies with Ireland and Poland, the best known in England as a brilliant writer. His first important work was a History of Elizabeth of Hungary, published in 1845, and his latest, and most important

Monte Casino.—A celebrated monastery built on a mountain of the same name, which overhangs the town of San-Germano, between fifty and sixty miles north-west of Naples.
 This monastery was founded by St. Benedict in 529. Towards the end of the sixth century it was destroyed by the Lombards, and the monks took refuge in Rome, where Pope Gregory gave them St. Andrew's Church.
 In 720 the monastery was restored, but in the ninth century it was plundered by the Saracens, and then finally it was re-established towards the close of the tenth century.
 It was one of the very richest of the Benedictine establishments, having four bishoprics and many livings attached to it, besides a great deal of landed property, which brought in enormous revenues. Its library contained many treasures, and from its printing press
 some important works have issued, its monks being noted for their learning. The medical school, founded by Abbot Bertharius in the ninth century, had a great reputation. The buildings suffered much from an earthquake in 1349. The monastery was secularised in 1866.

 It is under the Most Holy Synod of Russia,
 but differs from the Oriental Church in re-dictine of the Congregation of St. Maur and a great antiquarian [b. in Languedoc, Jan.

 Paris, 1741]. He entered the military profession, but on the death of his parents left the service, and in 1675 entered the Congregation of St. Maur. In 1688 he, together with the Fathers Anthony Pouget and James Lopin, published a collection of Greek remains, Analecta Græca; also a tract upon the history of Judith [1690] and a new edition of the works of St. Athanasius in Latin and Greek [1697]. In 1698 he started for Italy, where he collected many antiquities and consulted the manuscripts in the Italian libraries, and,
 on his return three years after, published an account of his experiences in the Diarium Italicum. Among his other works are two volumes of the Greek Fathers never before printed, with a Latin translation and notes [1706]; the Palæographia Græca, a tract concerning the original form and progress of the Greek alphabet [1708]; a new edition of the works of Origen and St. Chrysostom, and a French translation of Philo's Contemplative
Life, with notes to prove that the Thera-—Religious poet. He was the son of Irish parents, but born at Irvine in Ayrshire.

 His father was a Moravian preacher, and,
 at seven years of age, James was sent to the Moravian school at Fulneck, near Leeds, with the object of his ultimate training for the ministry. But he was unable to fix his mind to the severer studies, and a poetic instinct developed in him; he read by stealth Milton and Cowper, and gave much of his time to composing hymns. His teachers declared him dull and incompetent to carry out the studies of the place; he was therefore taken from school and apprenticed to a baker at Mirfield, near Fulneck, but ran away when sixteen years old. In 1789 he was employed by Mr. Gales of Sheffield, and eventually he became editor and proprietor of the Sheffield Iris. He was twice imprisoned on account of publishing some political articles. In 1806 he published his poem The Wanderer of Switzerland, and, taking a great interest in the emancipation of the slaves, he wrote in 1809 a poem on this subject called The West Indies. The World before the Flood was published in 1812. After this time his life became a distinctly religious one; he wrote many hymns and minor poems, which were collected and published in 1851, and another volume called Original Hymns, etc., in 1853.

Montgomery, ROBERT, was born at Bath in 1807. Nothing is known of his boyhood, but he appeared before the world as an author at an early age. In 1828 he published The Omnipresence of the Deity, a poem which was so popular that it passed through eight editions in as many months. In 1830 he entered at Lincoln College, Oxford, and was ordained five years afterwards. From that time till 1842 he produced no literary work. He became curate of Whittington in Shropshire for a few months, and then went to Percy Street Chapel, London. In 1838 he removed to St. Jude's Episcopal Chapel in Glasgow; but his preaching raised so much controversy that, after four years, he returned to London. He died in 1855.

His works were severely censured by Macaulay, but commended by Southey. Among them the most famous, after The Omnipresence of the Deity, are Satan, The Messiah, A Vision of Heaven, A Vision of Hell, Lyra Christiana, The Angel of Life, etc.

Monumental Brasses. [BRASSES.]

Monuments of the Dead.—A monument, from the Latin monere, "I remind," is a structure intended to keep some remarkable person in memory. Thus among the religious monuments may be reckoned memorial churches, windows, altars, schools, etc.; but those which are usually understood by the name are the tablets put up on the walls of churches or raised in the cemeteries.

The earliest monuments now extant in England seem to date from the Norman Conquest. The form is often that of a stone sarcophagus, prism-shaped, to preserve them from the weather, as they were in the open air and without inscription. They were first ornamented about the year 1160. Carvings appeared on them, armorial bearings, the insignia of those to whose memory they were raised, etc., and as the sculpture improved, the sloping roofs disappeared, so that in the thirteenth century the monuments were flat. Soon the human figures were added with their insignia and in full dress, so that antiquaries often ascertain the costume of the times from the monuments. In the fifteenth century skeletons in shrouds were first used, and these were succeeded by corpses with the head bound up and the feet tied. Also religious allegories were more and more used, such as pictures of the soul of the dying carried to heaven by angels, etc. The tombs gradually rose in height, and arches were raised over them and canopies to protect them from the weather, till it became the custom to place them inside churches. It was found, however, that they took up too much room, so in the fifteenth century the custom began of annexing chapels to churches to contain the monuments. The custom of fixing memorial tablets against the wall in order to gain more room, did not come into use till after the Reformation.

With regard to the inscriptions, as has been said, the first monuments have none. Up to the twelfth century the churchyard epitaphs were written in Latin. Then French was used written in Lombardic characters till the middle of the fourteenth century; from that time English and Latin have been used.

Moralities.—A form of religious drama in which allegorical representations of vices and virtues took the place of biblical characters. They were invented in France at the beginning of the fifteenth century, and found much favour in England, but seldom occurred in Germany.

Moral Law is distinguished from [1] Natural and [2] Judicial Law. By the former we mean the Laws of Nature, which we are compelled by necessity to obey, seeing that they are out of our control. Judicial Law is law made by a State, the infraction of which involves penalties ordained by that State, and to which a man may be said to be bound by the fear of those penalties only, seeing that he may, in his conscience, doubt whether the law is, in the abstract, right. Thus a man who pays his tithe or poor rate, or refrains from his business on Sundays, may consider, in any of these cases, that the law ought to be altered; but, so long as it is not, he has no choice but to obey. But Moral Law being with the human will; does not say to it, "Thou must recognise the necessity of obeying whether you agree with the commands or not," but says instead, "Obey because obedience is right in itself." The moment of eternal compulsion comes in, Moral Law ceases to be of effect. The basis of Moral Law, then, is religion, the sense in the soul of man towards its Creator, and the purpose of

In the first two centuries of Christianity lived two noble heathen moralists, Seneca and
M. Aurelius. The seat of the first Christian School of Philosophy was Alexandria, and it has a splendid roll of names to show, of which Clement of Alexandria is the greatest. [CLE-MENT; NEO PLATONISTS.] In the fourth century we have ATHANASIUS, and a little later AUGUSTINE; in the fifth, Boethius; in the sixth, Pope GREGORY THE GREAT: he may be said to close the first period of Christian philosophy.
The second begins with the time of Charlemagne. In the first ages the great controversies had been on the Nature of God. Then began those on the subject, first, of Predestination and Freewill; then on the Sacraments, and chiefly on Transubstantiation. The Dark Ages, as the ninth and tenth centuries have been truly called, were barren as to learning, full of political intrigues and ignoble struggles,
while the Papacy was a centre of harlotry.
During this period philosophy found its most congenial home with the Mahometans, among whom Mathematics and Natural Science made great progress. Then came the age of the SCHOOLMEN [q.v.], Lanfranc, Anselm, Abel-ard, Peter, Albert, Aquinas, Lombard, and the rest. The rise of the Mendicant Orders in the beginning of the thirteenth century marked the beginning of a new age. They acquired dominion in the universities, beginning at Paris, and the benefit they wrought was to substitute common sense and practical usefulness for the word-splitting and trifling to which the School Philosophy had sunk.
Their theology was more human and real;
not profitless dialectic. The fifteenth century saw the dawn of the Reformation; the foremost name is that of SAVONAROLA. The revival of learning is followed by the preaching of Luther in the first half of the sixteenth century, and in the second half comes the great battle between the principles of Loyola and of Calvin. This may be regarded as the last great battle fought on the old ground, the division being between the principles of absolute obedience to the Church, and freedom of the conscience. New ideas have sprung up since then, which have modified the opinions of the partisans of both sides. The main elements of those new ideas have been the vast discoveries in science and in historical criticism, and also the new political doctrines which changed conditions have brought into being. Questions concerning right and wrong, the absolute good, the final destinies of men, are still debated as keenly as ever,
but in very different methods from those used by the controversialists of the sixteenth century.

In the above sketch we have not attempted to distinguish between varying opinions of

abstract doctrine. We return to the fact that moral philosophy means questions concerning human action and moral excellence. The two words Ethics and Morals, the one of Greek and the other of Latin derivation, are commonly regarded as synonymous, yet there is a difference between them illustrative of the difference of the Greek and Roman character. An ethos is a habit of the mind, an inward disposition; the mores are the outer result of such habit, "customs" or "manners." The will, then, being set in some given direction, moral philosophy inquires concerning that direction, and asks, "What is good?" Or, in other words, what should man set before him as his supreme aim? Is seeking after happiness the same as seeking after goodness? The answer of the conscience and of Christianity declares that there is a supreme good, and that the duty of man is to conform himself to the acknowledged standard of good. Hence there is a right and a wrong per se, which, though defined by human enactments, do not rest upon them, but are determined by the Divine Will, and have their foundation in the character of God. The faculty by which we recognise such distinction, and judge actions according to it, we call the "Conscience." "There is a principle of reflection in men," says the greatest English moral philosopher, Bishop Butler, "by which they distinguish between, and approve or disapprove, their own actions. We are plainly constituted such sort of creatures as to reflect upon our own nature. The mind can take a view of what passes within itself, its propensions, aversions, passions, affections, and of the several actions consequent upon them. In this survey it approves of one, disapproves of another, and towards a third is affected in neither of these ways, but is quite indifferent. This principle in man is conscience." Conscience implies responsibility, and hence comes the anticipation of judgment, the sense of guilt or of merit.

But this general principle has modifications. An act may be in itself good or bad, but the agent's part will be affected by circumstances out of his own control. Virtue implies deliberate choice of good for its own sake when there is free will, and resolution to hold that choice. And good for its own sake is love, first towards God and then towards all which is like Him, or is capable of being made like Him. But society is so complicated that one man may be hindered from pursuing methods which to another are easy. We cannot therefore judge one another; only Omniscience can determine the responsibility of individuals. We are bound to judge overt acts by the Divine law, and in a thousand cases to visit offences by penalties; but to dissect motives, to reckon all the thousand influences within and without each individual, his education, his circumstances, his constitution, this is beyond our power. Moral philosophy declares to man his duties and obligations. Those discern himself, his own being and his and also his fellow creatures. Thus "to God and my neighbour" in the Catechism of the Church of England may be taken as a Church compendium of Moral Philosophy. The final result of all such duty is happiness, i.e. the rest of man on finding all that he has been seeking after. But religion teaches us that this peace cannot be long as our aim is selfish, and is only obtained by seeking the supreme good—God—we realise the truth of the Divine Word of Christ, "He that will save his life it, but he that will lose his life for the sake of the same shall find it." Not Utilitarianism nor yet selfish ease or enjoyment, but duty, because that is obedience to the Supreme Good, this is the perfect duty, and towards this the voice of God is calling His children.

Moravians or United Brethren

After the expulsion of the Protestants from Bohemia, as described at page 165, they met secretly for devotion, and from time to time fled into the Protestant States of Germany. In 1722 they were permitted by Count Zinzendorf to settle in his territory, and he himself became the head of their Church. He was in contemplation to affiliate them to the Lutheran Church, but on account of this it was decided to remain a separate body, and they took the name of "Unitas Fratrum." They once began to send out missionaries to preach the Gospel in distant lands, Count Zinzendorf who had been banished from Germany, himself taking the leadership of the "Society of Pilgrims," as he termed his labourers. Their first field of work was the West Indies, then in Greenland, and then in South Africa, Australia, and among the North American Indians. Their first establishment in England was in 1749, and they now have about thirty-four chapels.

The Moravian doctrines are in accordance with the Confession of Augsburg. The following Declaration was adopted in 1747 at a General Synod held at Barby near Magdeburg.

"The chief doctrine to which the Brethren adhere, and which we preserve as an invaluable treasure commended unto us, is this—that by the sacrifice first made by Jesus Christ, and by that alone, grace and deliverance from sin are to be obtained by mankind. We will therefore, without lessening the importance of any other doctrine of the Christian faith, steadfastly maintain the following five points:—

"1. The doctrine of the universal fall of man: that there is no health in us, and that, since the Fall, he has no power left to help himself.

"2. The doctrine of the Divinity of Jesus Christ, that God, the Creator of all things, was incarnate in the flesh, and reconciled us to and they have separate communities in Silesia,

Christianfeld in Holstein, Zeyst near Utrecht, and Sarepta on the borders of Asiatic Russia,
besides organised societies at Berlin, Potsdam, Copenhagen, Stockholm, St. Petersburg, separate communities at Bethlehem (which ranks in size next to Herrnhut), Nazareth, and Litiz in Pennsylvania, and at Salem in North Carolina. Besides these there are congregations at Newport in Rhode Island, Philadelphia, New York, etc., and several country congregations scattered through Pennsylvania, the members of which generally dwell on their plantations, but have a common place of worship. In their separate communities they do not allow the permanent residence of any persons as householders who are not members in full communion, and who have not signed the written instrument of brotherly agreement upon which their constitution and discipline rests; but they freely admit of the temporary residence among them of such other persons as are willing to conform to their external regulations. Each community has to provide for the erection and maintenance of a church, the support of its ministers and schools; but the individuals are as entirely independent in their private property as other persons, and do not have, as has often been stated, a community of goods. Their schools have sustained a very considerable reputation in Europe and America; there is, especially, one at Niesky, in Upper Lusatia,

where they maintain a higher classical institution, where those receive a preparatory education who intend to embrace the liberal professions, or be prepared for the ministry.

The Moravians have been particularly active in missionary work; among their principal missions are those among the negro slaves in the three Danish West Indian islands; in Jamaica, St. Kitts, Antigua, Barbados, Tobago, and Surinam; in Greenland; in Labrador among the Esquimaux; at the Cape of Good Hope among the Caffres and Hottentots; and in North America amongst the Indians and Cherokees.

It is a general principle of the society that their social organisation is in no way to interfere with their duties as citizens, or as subjects of Governments under which they live, and wherever they are settled.

More, HANNAH, was born at Stapleton, near Bristol, in 1745, the daughter of a village schoolmaster, who soon after her birth removed to Bristol. At the age of sixteen she wrote a pastoral drama, The Search after Happiness, and in the following year a tragedy based on the story of Regulus and called The Inflexible Captive. She was introduced to Garrick, through whom she became known to Dr. Johnson, Sir Joshua Reynolds, and others, and became a great favourite in society. But after living in London for about five years she became convinced that the life she led was not befitting to a Christian, and determined to give up the drama and retire into the country. During her transition state she wrote her Sacred Dramas. In 1786 she fixed her residence at Wrington, about ten miles from Bristol, where, four years later, she was joined by her sisters. In 1802 they all removed to Barleywood, where her sisters died, and she remained there till 1828, when she went to Clifton, and died there in 1833.

The works which Hannah More wrote during the second part of her life are too numerous to mention, but the chief were:—Thoughts on the Manners of the Great, Strictures on the Modern System of Female Education, Estimate of the Religion of the Fashionable World, Cælebs in Search of a Wife, Practical Piety, Christian Morals. She was the writer of one of the first of the Cheap Repository tracts, which she called The Shepherd of Salisbury Plain.

She was one of the great reformers of the manners of English society. She is said to have gained thirty thousand pounds by her books, a third of which she bequeathed to the poor.

More, HENRY, Christian Platonic philosopher [b. 1614, d. 1687], was educated at Eton and Cambridge, where he devoted himself to the study of philosophy, and was dissatisfied with all systems till he found rest in the writings of Plato. He became a Fellow of Christ's College, and lived there as a private tutor, refusing the mastership of his college, a bishopric, and other preferments, the only one he would accept being a prebendal stall at Gloucester.

More was of opinion that the Hebrews had transmitted their wisdom to Pythagoras, and he to Plato, and that therefore Platonism contains the principle of Divine philosophy. His writings, though tinged with mysticism, show great piety and a liberal spirit. The chief works are Philosophical Poems, which were published in 1647, and contain the germ of most of his speculations; Conjectura Cabalistica, The Mystery of Iniquity, A Key to the Revelation, Enchiridium Ethicum, Enchiridium Metaphysicum, An Apology for Descartes, The Immortality of the Soul, etc.

Morelstshiki or Self-immolators.

—A fanatical sect of the Eastern Church residing chiefly in Siberia. They have received their name from their custom of meeting on a certain day in each year, and digging a deep pit, which they fill with wood, straw, etc., and, having set fire to the pile, several leap in and perish, while the others sing triumphant hymns. Their doctrines are unknown, as they have never been committed to writing, but they are believed to hold the Sabellian heresy and also to deny the Death and Resurrection of Christ.

Morganatic Marriages are which take place between a man of high rank and a woman of inferior standing, in which it is agreed that neither the woman nor her children shall enjoy the rank of her husband.

Morin, JOHN, Father of the Oratory, illustrious for his virtue and learning, born at Blois in 1591, of Protestant parents, fled to Leyden, and, returning to Paris during the controversies between the Calvinists and Arminians, turned Roman Catholic, and entered into the Congregation of the Fathers of the Oratory. He devoted himself specially to the conversion of the Jews, and wrote the defence of the Septuagint's translation, which he caused to be printed at Paris in 1629, and entitled Exercitationes. His learning and judgment were so great that Pope Urban VIII. desired to see him, and he went to Rome, where he endeavoured to advance the union of the Greek Church with the Roman. But Cardinal Richelieu obliged his superiors to call him home. He edited and translated the Hebrew Samaritan Pentateuch (which had not been mentioned since Jerome's time), causing it to be printed in the Paris Polyglot Bible. He died in 1641.

Morley, GEORGE, D.D., Bishop of Chester [b. in Cheapside, 1597, d. at Clifton, 1684]. He was educated at Westminster and Christ Church, Oxford. Charles made him a canon in 1640. He was a faithful follower of the King during the Civil War, and gave the profits of his canonry for some years to the Royalist cause; but he refused to sit in the Westminster Assembly though nominated thereto by both Houses. In 1648 Morley was imprisoned by the Parliament, but went abroad in the following year. He remained at the Hague for ten years, and only returned, at the request of the Royalists, to convert the Presbytery to Episcopacy, and to restrain the impetuosity of the Royalists from leading them in rash actions. At the Restoration he was rewarded for his services by a presentation to the Deanery of Christ Church, and then to the Bishopric of Worcester, whence he was transferred to Winchester in 1662. The enthusiastic Royalist, Morley was a Calvinist in his theology. He was a munificent benefactor to his See.

Mormons or Latter-Day Saints.

Mormonism is one of the most remarkable religious movements of modern times. It is derived from the Gaelic mor, "great," and the Egyptian mon, "good," thus meaning "good." The founder of the sect was Joseph Smith, born in 1805, of humble parents.

 prophets that had existed on this continent.
 The angel appeared to me three times the same night and unfolded the same things.
 After having received many visits from the angels of God, unfolding the majesty and glory of the events that should transpire in the last days, on the morning of the 22nd of September, 1827, the angel of the Lord delivered the records into my hands. These records were engraven on plates which had the appearance of gold; each plate was six inches wide and eight inches long, and not quite so thick as common tin. They were filled with engravings in Egyptian characters, and bound together in a volume, as the leaves of a book, with three rings running through the whole. The volume was something near six inches in thickness, a part of which was sealed. The characters on the unsealed part were small and beautifully engraved. The whole book exhibited many marks of antiquity
 in its construction and much skill in the art of engraving. With the records was found a curious instrument which the ancients called 'Urim and Thummim,' which consisted of two transparent stones set in the rim on a bow fastened to a breastplate.

"Through the medium of the Urim and Thummim I translated the record by the gift and power of God."

This translation, it is said, constitutes the Book of Mormon, which is considered by its disciples as revealed Scripture.

The news of his alleged discovery attracted much attention, and Smith was so persecuted that he had to take refuge in Pennsylvania, carrying away his precious book in a barrel of beans. Mormon was said to be a prophet in the fourth or fifth century, who had engraved on plates the history of the troubles of the American Israelites, and his son Moroni concealed them in a hill called Cumoræ, about A.D. 420. They are said to contain many prophecies concerning the colonising of America
 by a direct tribe of Jews, for which reason the Mormons claim direct Jewish descent.
 The Mormons urge in favour of the authenticity of the Book of Mormon, that it was an impossibility for it to have been written and invented by an uneducated man like Smith;
 and to account for the non-production of the engraved plates, they say that Smith was forbidden by distinct revelation to show them to any of his disciples. It is alleged, on the other hand, that about 1809-12 Solomon Spaulding, who had once been a clergyman, wrote a tale on the supposition that the American Indians were the lost ten tribes of Israel, in which the names Mormon and Moroni frequently occur; and that the MS.
 found its way into the hands of Sidney Rigdon, one of Smith's earliest followers.

The Book of Mormon was followed by a Book of Doctrine and Covenants, which contained the further revelations which it was supposed were made to Smith as the Church needed them.

The "Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints" was organised on April 6th, 1830, at Manchester, in the State of New York. There were about thirty members. Churches were formed in the States of New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, and Missouri, notably in the last-named State, in Jackson County. Here they made large purchases of land; but popular hostility was so great that, in 1833, they were driven from their settlement, and they removed to Clay County. But they were not to be left unmolested. In 1838, Joseph Smith and his brother Hiram were imprisoned, and the Mormons sought a new resting-place at Commerce, in the State of Illinois. This place they at once enlarged, and called Nauvoo, or "Beautiful." Their prophet was made "Mayor" of the city, and "General" of a body of militia. In 1841 they were commanded by a "revelation" to build a superb temple, towards which each member should give a tithe of his property. In a few years they numbered 20,000 inhabitants. But suspicion and hatred followed the Mormons; every crime committed in the neighbourhood was charged on them; their doctrine of polygamy made them a public scandal; and at length the editors of a newspaper which had been suppressed for publishing some scandal about Smith, in revenge got a warrant against him and his brother Hiram, and they were thrown into prison at Carthage, where they were shot by the mob, June 27th, 1844. This act of lynch law made a martyr of one who otherwise would have been detected as an impostor or fanatic, for his own followers had become suspicious of him, and the folly of the revelations was becoming more and more apparent. But now all was changed.

Sidney Rigdon and Brigham Young were competitors for the supremacy; the latter was chosen to be the "Lord's Prophet and Seer to the Saints," under the title of First President. He lived till 1877. The Mormons now determined to seek a home far from the haunts of men, and in February, 1846, a pioneering party went beyond the Rocky Mountains to the basin of the Great Salt Lake; the rest followed in detachments, and through great hardships; and at length, in 1848, they founded a State under the name of Deseret, a word from the Mormon book, signifying the "Land of the Honey-bee." Here they have made great progress, and founded several cities. Utah State has an area of 84,476 square miles, and a population of about 150,000, of which not above 20,000 are non-Mormons.

The following is the printed "Creed" given to the Mormons by their founder, Joseph Smith:—

"We believe in God the Eternal Father, Son Jesus Christ, and in the Holy Ghost.

"We believe that men will be punished own sins, and not for Adam's transgression.

"We believe that through the atonement all men may be saved, by obedience to the ordinances of the Gospel.

"We believe that these ordinances are Faith in the Lord Jesus Christ; 2nd, Rep 3rd, Baptism by immersion for the remission of sins; 4th, Laying-on of hands for the gift of the Holy Ghost.

"We believe that a man must be called of 'prophecy and by laying-on of hands,' by those who are in authority, to preach the Gospel and administer in the ordinances thereof.

"We believe in the same organisation as in the primitive Church, viz., apostles, pastors, teachers, evangelists, etc.

"We believe in the gift of tongues, revelation, visions, healing, interpreting of tongues, etc.

"We believe the Bible to be the Word of God as far as it is translated correctly; we also believe the Book of Mormon to be the Word of God.

"We believe all that God has revealed, all that he does now reveal, and we believe that he will reveal many great and important things pertaining to the Kingdom of God.

"We believe in the literal gathering of Israel in the restoration of the Ten Tribes; that Zion will be built upon this continent; that Christ will personally appear upon the earth; and that the earth will be renewed and receive its paradisaical glory.

"We claim the privilege of worshipping God according to the dictates of our own conscience, and allow all men the same privilege, let them worship how, where, or what they may.

"We believe in being subject to kings, presidents, rulers, and magistrates; in obeying, supporting, and sustaining the law.

"We believe in being honest, true, chaste, virtuous, and in doing good to all men; indeed, we may say that we follow the adage of Paul—'We believe all things, we hope all things, we have endured many things, and hope to endure all things. If there is anything lovely, or of good report, or praiseworthy, we seek after it.'"

This is not, however, the whole of the Mormon Creed. Instead of believing in a Trinity, they believe in a duality of Persons in the Godhead, the Father and the Son, the Holy Ghost being merely a spirit. They also believe that God has partaken of the body of man, and not differing from him in size. They hold the priesthood, the Melchisedek and the Aaronic; they believe in a "baptism for the dead," i.e. that a living person may be baptized for a dead friend by being immersed for him. Polygamy is not so much tolerated as a positive duty, a man's rank being alleged to be largely dependent on the number of his children. One who is baptised at the age of eight, never

Mr. Gunnison gives the following of their Church government:—"The hierarchy of the Mormon Church consists of grades of offices and gifts. The presidency of three persons, which is understood, answered to the Father in heaven, but more particularly James, and John, the first president of the Gospel Church.

"Next in order is the travel of the Apostolic College of twelve ap-church model, who have the power over affairs in any foreign country to seniority; then the pastors, Elders, Bishops, Teachers, together with Evangelists and the 'Three Seventies.' Each has a full quorum for the decisions and transacting business in action; but appeals lie to the whole Church is the court assembled in general pastors arise out of every grade, and resides at head-quarters to advise the members, after the manner of the sons, and that of Israel his brother.

A council is selected out of the members, consists of twelve members, in a special session to advise the church which each is free to give and receive. The president sums up the matter, gives the decision, perhaps by a great majority, but to which all yield implicit obedience; there has never been known, at head, a dissent when the decision has been given, for it is the divine sanction of a god.' "

They have been wonderfully energetic in their missionaries all over the world, and have made very many converts among all classes of Great Britain, &c. Many yearly emigrate to Prayer, to be said, as stated in the Prayer Book, daily throughout the year. The present arrangement in the Prayer Book of England is a combination of the ancient offices of Matins, &c. It consists of five distinct parts, thus enumerated in the Exhortation:—to acknowledge and confess their sins, to render thanks for the great mercies received, to set forth God's righteousness, to hear His most holy Word, and to ask those things which are necessary as well for the body as for the soul. The prayers are collected from some of them very ancient. The Prayer Book of Edward VI. [1549] began with the Lord's Prayer, the second [1552] the Sentences, Confession, and Absolution as well, were introduced.

—The controversy between Catholics and Protestants on this subject thus: the Protestant holds that all sin is deadly in its nature, and would ruin the soul but for the intercession of Christ. Even infirmities and frailties, inasmuch as they injure the soul, are deadly; but our "Advocate with the Father" pleads for us. But when a man does not strive against his infirmities, he is contemning the Divine intercession. But to those who have faith in Christ sin is not imputed.

The Roman Catholics hold that justification is a renewal of man's nature by the grace of Christ, and those who really love God are incapable of committing sins which condemn their souls to death. Therefore as no human being is perfect, and even the saints committed sin, there must be two classes of sin—which they call venial and mortal. Mortal sins are those committed against God wilfully and deliberately, and are irreparable, utterly destroying the soul, but are remitted by the absolution of the priest in the Sacrament of Penance, and must be expiated either by satisfactions and good works in the present life or in Purgatory hereafter. The Roman Church has not defined what is and is not mortal sin, but declares that there are cases in which only God can judge. Thus, perjury and impurity are, if deliberate, mortal; but theft is put down as venial, if the injury done is small.

Mortmain [French, "a dead hand"].—The law of mortmain in England was designed to prevent land being withdrawn from general use, and to restrict acquisition by ecclesiastics. The law was probably borrowed from the Roman legislation, and was in use among the early Christians; and about the fifth century it was ordained by Justinian that certain restrictions should be laid upon money or lands bequeathed to the service of God, so as to prevent their becoming common property. Early in the second century all corporate bodies, or collegia, were forbidden to receive legacies, unless by a special privilege, and by this means the Christians were deprived of all money which was left them for the use of the Church. The law of mortmain which first really deserved the name was one passed by Valentinian the Elder, which forbade the clergy to inherit the property of wards or widows, or to accept donations from the wife of any man who was a member of their body. In Charlemagne's Capitularies the only restriction was that property should not pass into the hands of ecclesiastics without due deliberation on the part of the owner. The English law of mortmain is contained in a statute of George II., by which it is enacted that no property may come into the possession of the Church unless the bequest was formally drawn up and signed by the testator and two witnesses at least twelve months before the death of the donor. This statute does not apply to the Universities or to certain public schools; and it only holds good with regard to money or actual property, and not with regard to lands whence interest arises, which may be devoted to charitable uses.

Morton, JOHN, Cardinal and Archbishop of Canterbury, was born at Bere, in Dorsetshire. At Oxford he became so eminent in Civil and Canon Law that Archbishop Bourchier recommended him to King Henry VI. for a seat at the council board. And here he displayed such honesty and ability, that King Edward IV. kept him in the same post at his coming to the throne; but Richard III., on his accession, finding it impracticable to corrupt the integrity of Morton, who was now Bishop of Ely, had him imprisoned with several other lords. This prelate made his escape to the Continent, where he made the acquaintance of Henry VII., who, on his accession, nominated him to the Archbishopric of Canterbury, made him Lord Chancellor, and procured him a cardinal's hat from Pope Alexander VI. in 1493. It was Morton who projected the marriage between Henry VII. and Elizabeth, daughter and heir to King Edward IV., by this means uniting the two Houses of York and Lancaster. He died in October, 1500, and left the character of a learned prelate and a great statesman behind him. The gateway at the entrance of Lambeth Palace is his work.

Mortuary in ecclesiastical law seems to have been originally an oblation made at a person's death. In Saxon times a funeral duty called pecunia sepulchralis, or the soul-scot, was ordered by the Council of Aenham, held in the reign of King Ethelred, to be paid to the Church. Mortuaries and corpse presents are generally considered to be the same, but Dr. Stillingfleet distinguishes them by saying that the former was a right settled on the Church, while the latter was a voluntary oblation. The mortuary, which was often a horse, ox, or cow, followed the corpse to burial, which is probably the origin of the custom of a warrior's horse attending its master's funeral. In the reign of Henry VIII. it was enacted that the mortuaries should be paid in money, and should be limited to 10s. The Welsh bishoprics and the diocese of Chester were excepted from the operation of this statute, and therefore subsequent Acts were passed with respect to them.

Mosarabes or Mixarabes.—Spanish Christians who lived among the Moors in Spain, and were under their jurisdiction. The name is derived from mosa, which in Arabic signifies a "Christian." Their Liturgy, known as the Mosarabic Office, was used in Spain till the reign of Alphonsus VI., when it was discontinued by the order of Pope Gregory VII. It is still used in the Cathedral at Toledo, and at Salamanca, upon fixed days.

Mosheim, JOHANN LORENZ VON, a distinguished Church historian of Germany, was born at Lübeck, 1694. He was educated at Lübeck and at Kiel University, where, in 1716, he succeeded Albert von Feh as Professor of Philosophy. In 1723 he was invited to Helmstadt, and received the post of Professor of Theology. He became the chief support of the University, and received many honours: but in 1747 yielded to the pressing invitations that came from Göttingen, and became Professor of Theology and Chancellor of the University. He died there on Sept. 9th, 1755.

Mosheim was a great preacher, and has been compared to Fénelon for the purity of his style. His learning was immense, and he was possessed of great talents. He is considered one of the founders of modern German literature.

The most important of his voluminous writings relate to ecclesiastical history. The chief was written in Latin, under the title of Institutiones Historiæ Ecclesiasticæ, which first appeared in 1726. It was translated into English by Dr. MacLaine, an assistant minister at the Hague, in 1764. The history extends from the birth of Christ to the beginning of the eighteenth century, each century being treated of separately under the two heads of external and internal history. Under the first head he put "prosperous events or the events which led to the extension of the Church, and calamitous events or persecutions and infidel attacks;" under the second, biographies of the Fathers, histories of the Councils and their canons, heresies, etc. The work gave the impetus to the numerous German Church historians who followed him, as Noander, Schrockh, Baumgarten, Pfaff, Böhle, Semler, etc. Mosheim also wrote a large work on the first three Christian centuries entitled, De Rerum Christianarum ab Constantino Commentarii, and a history of the first century, called Institutiones Historiæ Christianæ Majores: Dissertationes Historiæ Ecclesiasticæ Pertinentes, and finally einer unparteyischen Ketzergegeschichte, which is an account of the heresies.

Among his other works are a book on Ethical morality, called Sittenlehre der Heiligen Schrift; a Latin translation of Cudworth's Intellectual System, with notes, and six volumes of sermons.

Mosques.—A Mohammedan place of worship. The word is derived, through the Italian moschen, from the Arabic masjid, "place of prayer." The form of the oldest mosques in Jerusalem and Cairo is evidently derived from that of the Christian basilica, the narthex being the origin of the court with its arcade, and the eastern apse representing the principal buildings of the temple facing Mecca. The original forms have, however, obliterated. They vary considerably in style in different countries, but many points are always the same. They

His Bampton Lectures, for which he chose Miracles as his subject, was considered the

Another work of his, *Ruling Ideas in Early

Faith*, was also a work of much thought and value, and consisted of lectures delivered at Oxford. A volume of his letters published in 1885 is full of interesting notices of the men and doings of his time.

Mozzetta.—A vestment worn by the higher officials in the Roman Church. It is short, and open in front, covering the shoulders, and with a hood behind. It is the state dress of bishops when not performing sacred functions. The Cardinals wear it only in their own churches. The Pope has five mozzetti: of red satin for the summer, except on fast days, when it is of red serge; of red velvet for the other half of the year, except in Lent and Advent, when it is of red woollen cloth; and of white damask for the octave of Easter. A Cardinal has four mozzetti: of red silk, violet silk, rose-coloured silk, and violet serge.

Muggletonians.—A sect which arose
about the middle of the seventeenth century, originated by Ludovic Muggleton, a journeyman tailor, of London, and a man named Reeves. Muggleton declared that he and his associate were the two witnesses foretold in Rev. xi. 3-6, and that they represented Moses and Aaron; that they had received power from Heaven to prophesy, and to destroy all who did not believe in their mission. Among other heresies, they affirmed that God the Father, leaving the government of heaven to Elijah, came down to earth in human form and suffered on the Cross; and that Satan became incarnate in Eve. They denied the doctrine of the Trinity, the creation of earth and water, the immortality of the soul, the authority of government, and some denied the lawfulness of magistracy. After the death of Reeves, Muggleton gave out that a double portion of the Spirit rested upon him. Muggleton died in Moorfields in 1697. His sect survived in places till within the last few years.

Mühlenberg, HEINRICH MELCHIOR, D.D.
[b. in Hanover in 1711, d. in Pennsylvania in 1787], was one of the founders of the Lutheran Church in Pennsylvania, having been sent there in 1742 at the desire of some of the German settlers. He met with some opposition from Count Zinzendorf, who had established some Moravian congregations, but succeeded in founding many Lutheran Churches, both there and in the neighbouring States, and Pennsylvania was looked on as the mother Church of Lutheranism in the United States. The first Lutheran Synod was held under his organisation in 1748, and at his death the Synod numbered twenty-four congregations.

Muhlenberg, WILLIAM AUGUSTUS, D.D. [b. in Philadelphia in 1796, d. in New York in 1877], an eminent American Episcopalian, great grandson of the above. He was ordained priest in 1820, and did much for Christian education by establishing schools. He was much interested in the improvement of Church hymns, and wrote many himself, which, with others, were adopted for use by a General Convention. He founded St. Luke's Hospital in New York in 1854, and the Church Village of St. Johnland on Long Island in the same state in 1870. He was born a rich man, but spent his whole substance in benefiting others, and died very poor in the hospital he had founded.

Munster. [ANABAPTISTS.]

Münser, THOMAS, a leader of the Anabaptists, born at Stollberg in the Harz Mountains, studied at Wittenberg, and became Master of Arts, and travelled subsequently in various parts of Germany, preaching the doctrines of the Reformation. His zeal grew into fanaticism, and during the Peasants' War he stirred up the people to plunder the houses of the rich, and, after their defeat in 1525, he was taken prisoner and beheaded with other ringleaders.

Muratorian Canon.—A fragment of a canon discovered by Muratori in the Ambrosian Library at Milan, and published in 1740. It is very mutilated, but of great importance. It claims to have been written by a contemporary of Pius, and therefore cannot be placed later than 170 A.D. The fragment mentions as canonical the first four Gospels, the Acts as written by St. Luke, thirteen Epistles of St. Paul, nine of them addressed to individuals, and four to individuals, Jude, the first and second Epistles of St. John, and the Apocalypse of St. John, the latter not for public reading. Thus, it will be seen, he omits Hebrews, James, 1st and 2nd Peter, and 3rd John.

Music.—That music has been in use in the Church from its very foundation is perfectly clear from the notices we have in the New Testament [Matt. xxvi. 30; Acts. xvi. 25; Col. iii. 16; James v. 13], as well as in the writings of the early Fathers. But we know very little of the character of it. The first great name in the history of Church music is that of Ambrose, after whom the AMBROSIAN CHANT [q.v.] is named; the next is that of St. Gregory the Great, after whom Gregorian music is named. The traditional belief is that four of the chants known as Gregorian, viz., the first, third, fifth, and eighth tones, date from St. Ambrose, and that the rest are due to St. Gregory. The scales out of which these tones are formed differ from the modern scales in the varying positions of the semitones. They consist, of course, of eight natural notes; and one octave, known as the Hypo-Lydian, is that which was as the natural scale with the semitones between the third and fourth and seventh and eighth notes. A favourite scale, among some of the earliest of English writers, was the Dorian, starting from the key-note, and therefore like a minor in the place of its first semitone, but that of the second. Tallis and Palestrina composed services and anthems in this.

The music of the Middle Ages all took the Gregorian mode as a basis. Later accompaniments date back from the time of St. Ambrose, and some also accredited to the introduction of antiphonal singing others give it to St. Hilary of Poitiers borrowed it from the practice of the Eastern Church. The instruments were "rich" later "organs," but originally there was unison only with the voices. Of one tendency was more and more to rich smoother melody, but an outcry was from time to time that the sacredness was being departed from, and the value of the music destroyed by too much decoration, as well as by the introduction of secular melodies. The greatest Church music was Giovanni Pierluigi (1594), the Master of the Pope's Choir in the Lateran Church, then at St. Maggiore, then at the Vatican. He not only the singers demoralized, but sacred service, even the most solemn, it, set to music which only seemed to be its object the display of the artistic composers, and the pleasing of the utterly secular and frivolous melody. Masses and other compositions of Palestrina marked the beginning of a new epoch in music. Pope Gregory XIII. commissioned him to revise and reform the whole, and, although he died before the work was fully completed, there was sufficient to enable the reform to be carried out. He was a splendid melodist, but he used his art for the purpose of display, and not all to the sense of the words, and of purity and beauty. His works, astonishing in quantity, are still as keenly as ever they were.

The rise of the English School of music synchronizes with the dawn of the Reformation. The first anthem in Boyne's Music is by King Henry VIII., who was originally intended by his father for Italy with a view to his appointment to the papacy. Consequently, all the greatest English compositions were written with a view to performance in the service of the Church. The first great ecclesiastical composer of the first period was John Merbecke, of St. George's Chapel, Windsor, whose Te Deum, adapted from the old Mass, is very popular in our own day. The second period was John Dowland, whose Flow My Tears, an adaptation of an old plainsong of the Church to the basis of the English Choral republished by Mr. Dyce in 1841. There have been many editions since. It was written a theological treatise, but has been burned as a heresy. Had he not hidden himself. It was by Redford, the author of the anthem "Rejoice in the Lord," Thomas Tallis [d. 1585], and Richard Farrant. Choral responses and liturgy of the 16th century have been superseded. His anthem, "I will praise Thee, O Lord," and Byrd's sublime "Bow down, O Lord, our first-class anthems. For Thy tender mercies' sake" are popular, and his service in G. D. is more suited to modern passages beautifully pathetic. The service in F, by Orlando, has been used by many musicians then for the English ritual, and the setting of the 47th Psalm is almost unrivalled for its beauty.

He died in 1625, and is buried in St. Andrew's Cathedral. The great change put a complete stop to the old English Cathedral music.

Printed and music books torn to shreds, so great had been the change that there was difficulty in the services of the Church, the King and his Court was obliged to use other melodies than those of the old.

But a new school slowly arose, worthy of its predecessors. Its members were Child, Michael Praetorius, and Henry Purcell, the greatest composer which this country has produced. Under this school a new style began, i.e. anthems with voices, ending, and generally with a chorus, and with interludes. One of the most curious is Purcell's "They that go down to the sea in ships," which opens with a long on upper D, and running on. It was written for a singer with a large voice compass. Such performance is consistent with the solemn and grand character of the service, and it is due to Purcell's genius that forgetfulness is not a mark of the age.

Great composers who followed, such as Jeremiah Clarke, Nares, Thomas Greene and Boyce, Goldsmith, were quite worthy of being named with the amateurs Creighton and the cathedral dignitaries. The grace of the latter never fails to distinguish. The arrival of Handel in 1711 must not pass unmentioned in the history of the oratorio in our province. It created a new style when it was first started in the reign of George I. and Newton both wrote fiercely against it. But the opposition was not unreasonable, considering that the performances in church were, as far as it could be done, divested of all religious character; payment at the doors and fashionable lounging stood in the way of all idea of worship. The anthem music of later times in England is, some of it, very beautiful. Such names as Attwood, Walmisley, S. S. Wesley, Goss, Sterndale Bennett, Turle, to say nothing of living masters, are an honour to any national school of composers.

We have said nothing of the use of hymn singing in public worship. It had been the intention of Cranmer to translate some of the grand mediæval hymns for the use of the Church, but he only carried it out with respect to the Veni Creator, which is inserted in the Ordination Service. Consequently, the metrical singing of the Church was long confined to the translation of the Psalms by Sternhold and Hopkins, known as the Old Version. This was largely supplanted by the New Version of Tate and Brady in the days of Charles II. Nearly all the metres were either 8. 8. 8. 8. ("Long Metre"); 8. 6. 8. 6. ("Common Metre"); or 6. 6. 8. 6. ("Short Metre").

But the Evangelical movement of the eighteenth century made large use of hymn singing, and this was greatly objected to by the old-fashioned church folk, e.g. Bishop Mant preached against it, and fifty years ago it was a distinguishing mark of "Low Church men" to find hymns sung in churches. Now, however, this is all changed. When there is a good choir in a parish church one anthem is generally sung in the day, but the hymns form one of the most popular portions of the service. There has been also a remarkable revival of the ancient Gregorian chanting, partly from a dislike of the florid styles into which chant music had fallen at the beginning of the century, partly from the revived love of mediævalism which has been the outgrowth of the Oxford movement. [See ANTHEM; CHANT; CHOIR.] The use of Choral Services again, which formerly was confined to cathedrals and college chapels, is now common in places where a choir can be gathered together. This is largely owing to the extended knowledge of music among the people. The objection which was formerly made to the chanting of the Psalms, that the unlettered could not follow it, is obviated now that everybody can read.

Mynchery.—A Saxon name for a nunnery.

Mystery [from muein to stoma, "to shut the mouth"].—The word is used to denote something secret, which is not revealed to mankind, or only partly revealed. The word is applied both to doctrines and facts. Thus the Incarnation of Christ, and the Resurrection from the Dead, are often spoken of as mysteries.

In the ancient Church the Sacraments were so called, more especially the Holy Communion, and the Fathers frequently speak of the "sacred" and "tremendous mysteries" of this Sacrament. It is used in this sense in the Exhortation at the beginning of the Communion Office, where Christ is said to have "instituted and ordained holy mysteries as pledges of His love," etc.

Mystical Interpretation of Scripture.—The belief of universal Christendom that certain facts and persons of the Old Testament are types of Christ is sanctioned by many passages in the Bible itself. The Epistle to the Hebrews is in great measure founded upon this belief, and St. Paul, writing to the Galatians, calls the history of Abraham and his two sons an allegory. In ancient times this method of interpretation was so widely extended that almost every event was turned into a type, and invested with a secondary and spiritual meaning; thus the scarlet thread of Rahab was regarded as a symbol of the blood of Christ, and even the relation of Bathsheba to David was interpreted as the Church forsaking the Devil and joining herself to Christ. The critical study of the Bible, consequent upon the revival of learning in Europe, caused these fancies to recede into the background, and the historical narratives to be more closely studied. Milman and Stanley and Dr. Farrar, in our own country, have aimed at showing us the characters of the sacred Volume as men saw them in the flesh, and to bring before us their very times and the circumstances which surrounded them. There was an outcry made when Milman called Abraham a powerful Bedouin sheykh, as if he had said something irreverent, instead of striving to make the Bible characters living men and women who become more truly examples to us when we realise them as of like passions with ourselves. Yet the old mystical interpretation is by no means cast away. It does not follow that because we have learned to realise that Isaiah and Jeremiah were politicians with opponents and partisans, and throw themselves into the burning strifes of the day, that there is no place left for the doctrine of types and secondary senses. No doubt, as in the grotesque exegesis above referred to in the case of Bathsheba, there has been much which repels us, and so there is still. Some is fanciful, some to us repulsive. Thus in Bishop Wentworth's Commentary, which is very full of mystical meanings, the bulrushes of Moses's ark are likened to the manuscripts and books which have carried his writings down the stream of the World. Such a fancy, however far-fetched, is not so grotesque as that which sees in the outrage of Reuben on his father's concubine a type of the Pope debauching Christendom. [Wordsworth on Gen. xxxv. 22.] Bishop Horne was much given to spiritualising, so are Mr.

Spurgeon [e.g. in his Sermons on the Canticles], and Dr. Littledale in his Commentary on the Psalms. No doubt this method of exegesis was derived from the Jews. It was carried on by Origen and Clement of Alexandria, and, though more cautiously, by Augustine and Jerome. Nor is the mention of these great Fathers of the Church the only sanction which such a method of interpretation receives; the very fact that our Lord interpreted the Old Testament Scriptures concerning Himself, the brazen serpent and the deliverance of Jonah—all these things are sufficient to justify the principles of mystical interpretation. But the examples above quoted are a warning to us not to let fancy run riot with unreasonableness. Thus many fanciful views are founded, as has been thoroughly proved, upon false etymologies, and, therefore, as one able commentator of our time has well said, "the grammar and the lexicon must be supreme."

The father of mystical interpretation as a system in the Christian Church was Origen. He drew out four senses from the sacred narrative. There was, first, the literal; secondly, the allegorical; thirdly, the tropological, in which the allegory was transferred from the Church at large to each individual soul; and fourthly, the anagogical, in which the whole was transferred again from the earthly to the heavenly. Thus literally Jerusalem became allegorically the Church militant; tropologically, the Christian soul; anagogically, the heavenly city. Manna became first the Eucharist, then the continued inner life of the soul, and lastly, the marriage supper of the Lamb. This is surely reasonable enough; but one feels on doubtful ground when we are taught by Gregory the Great to see in Job an allegory of Christ, because Job means "grief," and Christ was a Man of sorrows, and he dwelt in the land of Us ("counsel"), and Christ rules in the heart by wise counsels; and then he goes on to interpret the seven sons and three daughters, and the 7,000 sheep and the 3,000 camels. One may safely assert that the sacred narrator had no idea of such meanings in his own mind. The growth of critical and reasonable interpretation will probably form a correction of most extravagances, as the interpreters recognise the need, first of all, of mastering the text, and next of resting interpretations, not upon fanciful resemblances, but upon essential analogies, such as that of Isaac and Ishmael, the sons of freedom and bondage, with the liberty of Christianity and the bondage of the Law. Such principles commend themselves at once to the reason and the conscience, and such interpretations become, as so many have already become, part of the heritage of Christendom.

Mystics.—A class of theologians who profess to be able to see mysteries hidden from the uninitiated. They are to be found in ed in every age. There are that is an impossibility. What it is to be understood as meaning is, that we are conscious of being wholly in God, and at the same time also wholly in ourselves; that we are united with God, and yet at the same time remain different from Him."

Mysticism was further developed by Gerhard in the Netherlands, and by John Tauler in Germany. Tauler, a Dominican, of Strassburg, and a great preacher, who was called Doctor Illuminatus, was very practical in his mysticism, and held the school of thought which was afterwards developed in the Reformation. His great friend, Henry Suso, of Ulm, a pupil of Eckhart, thus expressed his views:—"A meek man must be deformed from the creature, conformed to Christ, and transformed to Deity." Thomas à Kempis's works are pervaded by the longing for annihilation of self, and oneness with God, common to all the mediæval mystics. In the fourteenth century appeared a little book, named German Theology, to which no name is appended, but which is attributed to the Custos of the Herrn Haus, at Frankfort, one of the "FRIENDS OF GOD" [q.v.]. This book remained comparatively unnoticed till brought forward by Luther, who ranks it third among his favourite books, next to the Bible and St.
Augustine. In 1621 it was prohibited in the Roman Church, but the edition published by Luther in 1518 met with great favour.

The Reformation, which had thus been aided by mysticism, almost caused its downfall when Luther proved the fallibility of oral tradition and individual intuition, and proclaimed the Scriptures the standard of Christian faith. But it soon broke out in more extravagant modes, especially among the ANABAPTISTS [q.v.], though under a different form. The first Reformers who professed mysticism were Paracelsus of Hohenheim [d. 1541] and Weigel of Meissen, in Saxony [d. 1588]; but the leader of the movement was Jacob Böhme, whose views show a mixture of Gnostic theosophy and naturalism.
[BÖHME, JACOB.] Arndt [d. 1621], a Lutheran of Anhalt, who gave up his post when his province adopted Calvinism, was also a mystic, but his mysticism took the form of a spiritual religion. He wrote True Christianity and The Paradise of Christian Virtues, which are still read in Germany. Gerhard's Sacred Meditations and School of Piety are of the same tone as Arndt's works. Towards the close of the seventeenth century, Michael de Molinos, of Saragossa, published The Guide to a Spiritual Life, the substance of which is that, in pursuance of good, the mind must be withdrawn from all worldly objects, and be wholly merged in God; therefore his followers are called QUIETISTS [q.v.]. This book was condemned by Innocent XI., and Molinos was imprisoned. Among the most famed of the Quietists in the seventeenth century were Madame Guyon, Madame

Bornignon, Peter Poiret, and Madame de Krüdener. In modern times the chief mystics have been EMANUEL SWEDENBORG and WILLIAM LAW [q.v.]. In the same category we must place the Hutchinsonians, the Jansenists, and those who substitute the subjective revelation of consciousness for the objective revelation of the written Word.

Mythology.—Mythology is the science of myths or legends relating to the worship of primitive nations. All races of men have confused and hazy traditions as to the origin of the world and of their own existence which have been handed down to them in the form of stories. At first these stories are taken literally; but with the progress of civilisation they are interpreted allegorically, and their absurdities and impossibilities are explained away as being the poetical way of stating familiar facts. Almost all national mythologies contain much that is "silly, savage, and senseless," and it has been the object of philosophers like Max Müller and Herbert Spencer to account for and explain the contradictions between the honour paid to mythological deities and heroes and the abhorrent deeds they are said to have committed. A certain resemblance runs through nearly all heathen mythologies, as they chiefly relate to the same matters—such as how all things came into being, the conflict between good and evil, the phenomena of summer and winter, day and night, storm and sunshine, etc. They may be briefly classified as follows:—The Mythology of Savage and Semi-Savage Tribes. In it the powers of nature are looked upon as beings very like themselves, allied to and interchangeable with animals, and endowed with magical powers. There is recognised a dual principle, one of good and another of evil. Thus amongst the Aborigines of Australia the creative power is symbolised by the eagle-hawk, and the destructive by the crow. Amongst the Bushmen of South Africa an insect takes the place of a bird; and with the Indians of the prairies the coyote, or prairie-dog, is the subject of their myths of the origin of matter. But most savage tribes start their mythology with taking for granted the existence of the earth or sea. They do not trouble themselves with questions as to the beginning of creation. With the Maoris of New Zealand the heaven and the earth were at one time indissolubly united in a close embrace, and of them were born the gods, who cut them asunder. But these gods were engaged in incessant conflict, as is the case in every system of mythology.

We know very little of the myths of the far East, nor is it easy in a short space to give much idea of the different beliefs of India as contained in the Vedas. The philosophic tendency of the Oriental mind does not find much expression in myth or legend, which have found their most perfect development in the poetry of Greece. But the leading ideas of a creative power opposed by a destroyer are to be found in the myths of the East as everywhere else, but here we meet with the idea of sexual relationships between the gods, which is developed to such an extreme in classical mythology.

In Egypt Osiris was worshipped as the king and giver of life. He was the son of Seb, answering to the Greek Chronos, or Time, and was represented in human form. His great enemy was Typhon, the spirit of evil, who succeeded in killing him, and scattering his remains over the country. One of the chief objects of adoration was the sun-god Ra, and each divinity was symbolised by certain animals, such as the bull, the calf, the cat; and plants, as the tamarisk.

When we come to Greece the field is so large as to preclude any attempt to summarise it. Suffice it to say that almost every natural phenomenon was associated with the name of a god, the legends concerning which were in many instances grossly obscene. It is very difficult to say what the original sources of the stories that have come down to us were. No doubt they have been greatly distorted and amplified by the imagination of their narrators.

In Scandinavian mythology we meet with Loki, the evil spirit; and Odin, the all-powerful husband of Frigga, and father of Baldur. "On the whole, the Scandinavian gods are a society, on an early human model, of beings indifferently human, animal, and divine, some of them derived from elemental forces personified, holding sway over the elements, and skilled in sorcery."

The question now arises, How are we to account for the origin of all these myths? Men in a savage state accept them as true and undoubted facts; nor to them does it appear at all strange that a man should become a kangaroo, a bear, a snake, or a prairie-dog. Such they imagine they were before they became men, and such they are likely to be after they are dead. There is no inconsistency or contradiction in the ridiculous stories they hear about the world around them, for, beyond the outward resemblance, they recognise no difference between themselves and the wild animals they fear or which fear them. But it is very different with races that have any pretence to civilisation. Their prophets and teachers have been obliged to account for the absurdity of much of their legendary mythology, which, indeed, had its natural effect in disgusting the more refined and reflective minds of Greece and Rome, and making them sceptical as to all religious teaching.

A very natural explanation was that of Euhemerus the Messenian, B.C. 316, who maintained that the gods, equally with the heroes, were originally men, and all the tales about them in facts, as they had been distorted and created by the imagination of their shippers. In later times mythology spoken of as a disease of language. Max Müller maintains that in the stages of society men could only see what they saw under personal names. Thus the sun would be to them the Shining One, the dawn of day the Burning One, and as the shining of the sun brought a dissipation of the cold and darkness they would describe the process of the Shining One following the Burning One as gradually giving rise to the legend of the God of Light, pursuing Daphne, who then became a tree called Daphne, the property of being easy to burn. In time the original meaning of the names would fade away from the recollection of those using them, and remain only names, so that what was originally a plain statement of fact, such as the sun shining following the dawn of day, became a romantic story of an amorous god pursuing a coy and fugitive maiden, who was embraced when overtaken by being changed into a laurel-tree. With great detail Max Müller endeavours to support his theory, pointing out the close connection existing between the names which form a branch of the great Aryan family and the different subjects of their local lore. But it is hardly necessary to trace such an origin for mythology. To the child of childhood the idea of personality is primary. The child does not inquire into the cause and origin of what he meets and finds. The storm, the sunshine, the rain, the rain are to its imaginative mind sufficiently explained as being the acts of natural beings, and savage tribes are but a further stage of a larger growth. And what at these early stages is a plain way of stating facts, at later stages of mental growth a representation of them. You say to a child it trembles at the sound of the voice of God, "That is the voice of God," and the child gives it to be so in a plain and literal way. When it grows up it uses the same language, to which, however, it attaches a figurative meaning. Neither the savage nor uncivilised races can understand names unassociated with personal experience. If anything happens, some one must name it. If the sun rides through the sky as if driving his burning chariot: if lightning flashes overhead, Jupiter is hurling underbolts. Thus the earliest myths relating to physical events. After these come myths relating to ethics. They are found amongst all races, and are exemplified in legends as Perseus and Andromeda, the Giant Killer, and many others, which pass on as nursery tales. Then come the myths, which have an inevitable tendency to gather fresh details as they pass from mouth to mouth. The stories of Hercules amongst the classics, and of Arthur in our own literature, are illustrations of these. Around a nucleus of actual fact gathers an accretion of fable.

But myth should not be confounded with allegory. They belong to different stages of social life, and are the results of different processes of mental working. Myth is only possible in the infancy of a race, allegory demands considerable mental development for its conception. Myth is the outcome of the unconscious action of the general mind of a whole people, allegory the result of a conscious and careful adaptation of means to an end on the part of an individual. It must have an object, myth has none. Allegory is meant to accomplish something yet to be done, myth to explain something already in being.

The chief subjects of myth, then, amongst all nations are: the origin of the world, the origin of man, sun and moon myths, death, and heroes; but all these have to be sought for amongst many books, for at present there exists no one trustworthy work on the very interesting subject of comparative mythology.

N

N or M.—The letters used to represent the child's answer to the first question in the Church Catechism, "What is your name?" Many explanations are given of the meaning of these letters; some say that they stand for typical Christian names, "Nicholas or Mary," others that they are a corruption of "N. or NN.," from the Latin Nomen or Nomina. But against this is the fact that before the sixteenth century no one received two names at baptism, and therefore Nomina would be out of place. It has been suggested that "N. or M." is a misprint for Nom. In the marriage service N. is the only letter used to represent the names of both parties.

Nag's Head Consecration. [PARKER.]

Name.—It has been the custom from very early times to give the Christian name at baptism, probably in accordance with the practice of the Jews, who named their children at the ceremony of circumcision. It was usual also among the heathens to give their children names on the day when they were cleansed by lustration from natural pollution, and which was called "Dies Nominalis." There is no evidence in the works of early Christian writers to show that the Christians had adopted the practice, nor does the New Testament give any authority for it, but many instances are known of cases where new names were given at baptism, though many persons retained names which they had received before. It was usual in early times that Christian names should be taken from the Bible, or have reference to the Christian religion.

Names of Reproach.—From the earliest times the Christians have received nicknames, or names of reproach, from their enemies. The chief of these were [1] Nazarenes, a name given them by the Jews, which was adopted afterwards by a sect who kept up the Mosaic ceremonies with the Christian rites. [2] Galileans, a term always used by the Emperor Julian when speaking of the Christians. [3] Atheists, because they derided the worship of the heathen gods, and worshipped none that could be represented by art. [4] Greeks and Impostors. St. Jerome tells us that Christians in the streets were greeted by this epithet. Some say that they were called Greeks because of the proverbial falseness of that nation, and some because the Christian philosophers wore the Greek habit. [5] Magicians. The miracles of Christ and of his followers were frequently ascribed to sorcery, and Celsus and others said that He had studied magic in Egypt. Also the endurance shown by the martyrs was attributed to the same cause. [6] Sibyllists, so called by Celsus from the use by the Christians of the Sibylline books. [7] Biothanati, or self-murderers. [PARABOLANI and DESPERATI.] These names were given to them from their readiness to suffer martyrdom rather than deny their faith. [8] Sarmentarii and Semarii, from the faggots [sarmenta] with which they were burnt and stakes [semaris] to which they were tied. [9] Crucidae, or cross-worshippers, and ASINARII, or ass worshippers, probably from the lowliness of the Redeemer's earthly state. Scrawled on the walls of Pompeii was found a crucified figure with an ass's head, underneath which was written, "This is the Christian's God." [10] Plautinians. They were so called by Celsus as a ridicule upon the poverty and simplicity of most of the early Christians, in which they were supposed to resemble Plautus, who was said, in a time of famine, to work for a baker. The orthodox Christians often also received names of ridicule from the heretics. Thus the Novatians called them Cornelians, because they sided with Cornelius, Bishop of Rome, against Novatianus; and also Apostatics, Capitolina, and Synedrians, because they agreed to receive back penitent Apostates and those who had sacrificed in the Capitol into their communion. The Montanists called them Psychici, "carnal," as opposed to themselves, who were spiritual; the Millenarians, Allegorists, for looking upon the prophecy of a thousand years as allegorical; the Aetians, Chronitæ, because their religion was said to be temporary; the Manichæans, Simplices, or idiots; the Apollinarians, Anthropolatæ, or man-worshippers; and the Origenists Philosarcæ, "lovers of the flesh."

Nantes, EDICT OF, issued by Henry II. of France in 1598, secured to the Huguenots religious toleration so far as freedom of conscience went, but they were allowed their own worship only under certain conditions, and were obliged to observe the festivals and fasts of the Roman Catholic Church. Louis XIV., at the instigation of the Jesuits, revoked the Edict of Nantes in 1685, on the ground that there were no Protestants left in France; notwithstanding which, about a hundred thousand were driven from the country by the fierce persecutions which they underwent. Their ministers were expelled, their schools closed, and dragoons were quartered among them to get rid of them by any means short of murder. [HUGUENOTS.]

Narthex.—The antechapel of an ancient Church in which the catechumens and "the hearers," or the second order of penitents, was placed. In some churches an outside corridor or cloister was called the exterior narthex, and was occupied by the "mourners" or those penitents who were in the first stage of their penance.

Natalis, ALEXANDER. [NOEL, ALEXANDER.]

Natatoria or Natatorium.—The ancient name for a baptismal font or baptistery.

Nativity of the Blessed Virgin.—One of the black letter days of the Church Calendar, Sept. 8th. The first record of its observance is in 687, when Pope Sergius I. placed the Nativity among the festivals kept in memory of the Blessed Virgin. It was afterwards put into the martyrologies, and into Gregory the Great's Sacramentary. The Greeks and Eastern Christians did not begin to keep it until the twelfth century, but now do so with great solemnity.

Natural Laws, or laws of Nature, are simply statements of the orderly condition of things in nature. They state what is found in nature by a sufficient number of competent observers. Thus it has been found that specimens of air in different parts of the world have possessed about the same weight: hence it is inferred that the air everywhere has weight, and this is called a law of nature. Again, Newton observed that bodies fall to the ground at a certain rate, and from this and many like observations flowed the great law of gravitation, another law of nature; and from this again three others, the three laws of motion. Sometimes the term Law of Nature is applied to the condition which is observed when several simple laws of nature act together; thus Darwin noticed that those species of plants and animals which could live and thrive on the plainest food, which could get their food most easily, and which could withstand the accidents of weather, and of the attacks of their neighbours, with the least the long run, overpower and hardy species, and this, the fittest," is sometimes called

As an illustration:—it has the common English fly, the thrifty and less dependent circumstances, will, in time, the great blue-bottle of New laws of nature, collectively, the fewest and simplest which being granted, the whole nature would result.

As scientific research is carried out, is this "reign of law" founded? At least we never look for any laws of nature: given certain conditions, we know that they will be maintained under other conditions; the cause, the latter, effect.

Of nature there are, in nature, apparently two great divisions—miracles and the results of laws. We are brought face to face with the question—Can we believe in laws which seem to contradict these? Can we believe that prayer will interfere with the regular course of nature, when everything is regulated by the Deist, who believes that the universe was arranged by God, and does not now interfere in it? We could say that the Laws of nature, as all them, are the expression of God's will, and that hence any interference with them, such as a miracle, is impossible. The world, like a clock, has been wound up, and will not show the slightest deviation from the course which is to be looked for. But in the case with those who believe in the direct rule of a Personal God, the question arises—are His works perfect? Is there any question of the credibility of miracles? (See the article on RESURRECTION.) In considering of miracles to the laws of nature, it must be remembered that sin is regarded as having brought misery into the fair order of nature, and that of nearly all the miracles recorded in the Bible was to relieve misery, or to restore some degree of order. Again, there are but extensions or intensifications of natural occurrences, e.g. some of the plagues of Egypt—the flies, the frogs, the locusts, even our Lord's miracles of healing, cannot, then, regard them as violations of the laws of nature. Perhaps the simplest way of regarding miracles is in regard to the power of modifying the effects of the laws of nature.

We cannot violate these, we cannot control, or alter the direction of the laws; many of them at pleasure; even a stone thrown into the air would, by the action of the law, fall to the earth, but we can catch the ball in our hands, and, against the same law, we can throw it up into the air again. No law has been "violated;" intelligent will has merely brought other forces into play, which have temporarily suspended the most conspicuous effect of the law of gravity. Much of our life, as animals, is consumed in struggling against and modifying laws of nature, which would, left to themselves, work our death. Thus, we clothe our bodies to prevent that continual radiation of heat which, in winter at least, would be fatal to life. Now, in our case the interference is exactly known; but if God should see fit to suspend or counteract laws of nature, though He might employ means or other laws in a similar way, the means being unknown to us, what we call miracles would be produced. Such considerations may prevent us from falling into the mistake of looking upon miracles as violent interruptions to the course of nature. But whether God actually has thus modified and controlled the laws of nature is, of course, a different inquiry, and in the present day the question of the reality of miracles practically centres in the greatest of them, the Resurrection of Christ. Accepting this, as the Church does, all the others naturally follow.

Similar remarks will apply in the case of Prayer, since answers to many prayers must be of a miraculous nature—special providences, as they are called. If we can so much control and modify the action of natural laws, why is it not possible to God? But the question is, Will God thus interfere at our request? Some reply, No. God has fore-ordained everything; and to suppose that He would make any change because we asked Him, would be to admit that His arrangements were faulty and needed amendment; prayer, therefore, can only be useful to the one who prays by making him dwell on the goodness of God, arousing his faith, etc. It may, however, be replied that although God foresees all things, He has yet given us free-will, and has made us responsible for the use of our wills, so that, in a manner never explained to us, we have the ordering of our lives and conduct largely in our own hands, and that hence there must be room for prayer in the providential arrangements of God. Besides this, the promises that prayer shall be heard and answered are so emphatic and so varied [Matt. vii. 7, 8; Jas. i. 5; 1 John v. 14, 15], that we cannot doubt that God desires us to pray in the full belief that, under the conditions He lays down, we shall obtain our requests. [PRAYER.] One condition of rightful prayer is that we should not put any hindrance in the way of its fulfilment; indeed, we ourselves are to further it as far as we can. It follows from this that we cannot expect an answer to our prayer if we are wilfully doing that which would make our desire impossible by a law of nature; for instance, natural laws tell us that a few grains of arsenic will destroy life: it would then be clearly useless to pray for deliverance from death if we deliberately took what we knew to be a fatal dose of the poison. Again, it would be improper, and probably useless, to pray for protection when amongst the sufferers in an epidemic of cholera, if, knowing and understanding the precautions to be used (i.e. the natural laws of the disease), we yet neglected them all when we might have observed them. God expects us to show our faith by using the reason He has given us, and conforming, as far as we know them, to the laws of nature, which are the general expression of His will, and therefore to be obeyed.

A very interesting question arises with regard to Natural Law: Have we any reason for supposing that laws of nature rule in the spiritual as well as in the natural world, or do they cease to have effect at the boundary line of Matter and Spirit? From time to time analogies have been traced between natural laws and spiritual laws, but Professor Drummond, in a remarkable book, Natural Law in the Spiritual World, takes up the position that spiritual laws are the same laws as natural laws; that the spiritual world is arranged on a like principle to the natural world, and that it is under a like governmental scheme. One example of Professor Drummond's method must suffice. Numerous and exact experiments have conclusively proved that life can only originate from pre-existing life; that under no conditions can particles of dead matter, whether organised or not, acquire life by themselves. This fact of life only from life is known as the Law of Biogenesis in the natural world. Professor Drummond maintains that the same law holds good in the spiritual world. Except a man be born again. . . . Except a man be born of water and of the Spirit, he cannot enter into the Kingdom of God. That which is born of the flesh is flesh, and that which is born of the Spirit is spirit [John iii. 3, 5, 6]. As in the natural, so in the spiritual world, there is life only from life. The general argument is very interesting, and the analogies suggested are in many points striking, and in some cases seem of real value; but as a whole the contention not only does not seem to be made out, but very weighty reasons have been advanced, both from science and theology, against Professor Drummond's cardinal conclusion.

Natural Theology.—The belief concerning the existence and the character of God which we derive from our observation of the phenomena of Nature. Thus Paley, in his work bearing this title, argues for the belief [1] in design, i.e. in an intelligent Creator; and [2] in the goodness of the Creator, judging from the arrangements observable in the Creation for promoting the happiness of the creatures. [God.]

Nave.—In modern churches, the central division of the body of the church, as distinguished from the aisles on either side. In ancient churches, the central portion as distinguished from the narthex or antechapel at the west end, and the bema or chancel at the east. It was occupied by those worshippers who were in full communion with the Church, and distinguished by the penitents of the third and fourth grades. In it stood the ambo, or reading desk.

Naylor, JAMES, was born in York. After serving as quartermaster for some time in Colonel Lambert's regiment, he quitted the army and embraced the principles of the Quakers, but became "exalted with strange imaginations." Thus he rode into Bristol in 1656, a man and a woman holding his horse by the reins, and some others following after and singing the Tersanctus. The magistrates of Bristol seized and sent him to the Parliament, who tried and condemned him, as a blasphemer and seducer of the people, to have his tongue bored with a hot iron, to be marked in the forehead with the letter B to signify a blasphemer, then to be carried back to Bristol, where he should make his entry on horseback with his face to the tail, and then to be cast into prison for the remainder of his days. The Quakers disowned him, and condemned his extravagances; but afterwards, on his making a public recantation, he was received again into their society, and having gained his freedom, he publicly preached among them in London and other parts of England until his death in 1660. Neal, DANIEL, a Dissenting minister and author, was born in London, Dec. 14th, 1688. He was educated at Merchant Taylors' School, and in 1700 went to Holland, where he studied at Utrecht and Leyden. On his return to England he became assistant to Dr. Singden, pastor of an Independent congregation in Aldersgate Street, whom he succeeded in 1706. He died at Bath in 1743.

Neal's first work was a History of Free England, which was very favourably received in America; but the book for which he is known is a History of the Puritans, published in 4 vols. 1732-8.

Neale, JOHN MASON, D.D., a learned ecclesiastical historian, and one of the best of English hymn writers [b. 1818, d. 1866.] He was educated at Cambridge, and ordained in 1841; a few years later he was appointed Warden of Sackville College, East Grinstead, and received no further preferment. He belonged to the Ritualist Party in the Church, and this brought him not only under popular dislike, but under the displeasure of the Bishop of Chichester, who for fourteen years would not allow him to officiate in the parish churches of his diocese. JOHANN AUGUST WILHELM, a al historian, was born at '89. He was the son of a nd bore the name of David other was a relative of the opher Mendelssohn. David's spent at Hamburg, to which ng been separated from her emoved. He entered the soon attracted notice by his lent, and the influence of friends that he made there inclined him towards Christianity. This inclination was greatly strengthened by the perusal of Schleiermacher's Discourses of Religion, first published in 1806, and in that year he was baptised by the name of Neander [Gr. "a new man"]. Just before his baptism he wrote an essay on religion, which, though rough and containing some errors, is characteristic of him, and declares his intention of consecrating himself to God. He removed to Halle, where he studied under Schleiermacher, to whom he afterwards acknowledged himself to be indebted, though they differed in some points, Neander being more positive and realistic in his views, and laying more stress upon the doctrine of sin as a free act and on the personality of God. After the French victory at Jena the University of Halle was shut up, and Neander arrived at Göttingen, where he studied under Planck and Heeren. It was here that he determined to become a Church historian. After a short stay in Hamburg he went to Heidelberg, where, in 1811, he took up his residence as a Privat Docent, and wrote a Curriculum Vitæ and De Fidei Gnostico- que Idea secundum Clem. Alex. On account of his monograph, The Emperor Julian and his Times, he was called to the newly-established University of Berlin as Professor of Church History, and worked there in conjunction with Schleiermacher, De Wette, Marheineke, and other famous men. He continued at Berlin lecturing and writing, and produced here his most famous works. Between 1818 and 1826 appeared works of his on the Gnostics, A Life of St. Chrysostom, Memorials of Christian Life in the Early and Middle Ages, Tertullian and his Writings, etc. But these were only preparatory works to his great history, which appeared in five volumes between 1825 and 1845, Universal History of the Christian Religion and Church. His Life of Jesus in its Historical Relations was written to refute the celebrated work of Strauss.

As a theological teacher Neander was faithful and efficient, and he was complete master of his subject. His theology cannot be called entirely orthodox, especially on the subjects of inspiration, the sanctification of the Lord's Day, and the Holy Trinity; but he was deeply pious and reverent. His merit as a Church historian is that he struck out in an entirely different line to his predecessors. They had belonged to the pragmatic school, who looked on Christianity as a system of doctrine; while he, in his very first work, instead of merely discussing facts, brought out the hidden life of Christianity, realising throughout the presence of its Master and Leader. His idea of Church history is ably put forth in the introduction. "We look upon Christianity not as a system born in the hidden depths of man's nature, but as a power which has come down from heaven, in that heaven which has opened itself to a hostile world—a world which in its essence, as well as in its origin, is exalted high above all that man can create with his own powers, and which was designed to impart to him new life, and transform him in his innermost nature."

He was also very apt in bringing out the individualities of those of whom he was writing and allowing them to speak for themselves, without mentioning his own feelings or opinions. This, however, sometimes led him into the error of dwelling too much on individual Christians instead of the whole Christian Church, of regarding Christianity as a succession of famous men. Another fault is in his style, which was too diffuse and monotonous, and his ignorance on political and æsthetic matters lessens the value of his discussions on Church government and sacred art. In his anxiety not to be too severe on heretics, he sometimes does injustice to the zealous opponents of sects. But in spite of these defects his work may be fairly called what he said Church history ought to be—"A living witness for the Divine power of Christianity, a school of Christian experience, a voice of edification, instruction, and warning, sounding through all ages, for all who are disposed to hear."

Necessary Doctrine and Erudition for any Christian Man.—A book which was published under the sanction of the King and Convocation in 1543. To distinguish it from its predecessor, the Institution of a Christian Man, which was commonly called "The Bishop's Book," it received the name of "The King's Book." Henry VIII. took a considerable part in the work of The Necessary Doctrine, which is full of traces of Gardiner's influence over him at the time of writing. For instance, the preface, which is probably the King's work, forbade any under the rank of the nobility and gentry to read the English Bible under penalty of a month's imprisonment for each offence.

Necessitarians or Necessarians [also termed Fatalists].—Those who believe that all things happen of necessity, or according to fixed laws. This doctrine of necessity is connected with that most profound mystery, the origin of evil, and hence deep thinkers in all ages have occupied their minds with this question. Necessitarians may be divided into:—[1] Those, like the Materialists and Positivists, who believe that in nature things could not possibly be otherwise than they are, and therefore that even the will of God is not free to alter or control them. [2] Those who hold that man's will is not free to control his actions, but that he chooses according to fixed laws of his Creator. The leading writer among modern Necessitarians was Hobbes, who argued that every act of man's choice is the result of a series of causes, God being the First Cause; and that if we could see the connection of these causes, we should, as God does, see and know that man, in everything, acts of necessity. Another writer of this school was Leibnitz, who grounded his optimist doctrine of Necessity on his theory of the perfection of the universe. Anthony Collins argued in favour of Necessity, on the ground that all our actions are controlled by some force external to ourselves. Locke also held similar opinions. But the two most widely read writers on Necessity were Dr. Priestley [b. 1733, d. 1804] and Jonathan Edwards [b. 1703, d. 1756], President of Princeton College, U.S. The latter, who was a Materialist, adopted the views of Spinoza, and concluded from them that motives act upon the mind as weights in the scale, and that under certain conditions men will always act in the same way, his mind being as incapable of overcoming the motives or inducements brought to bear upon it, as the scale has of resisting the effects of the weight cast into it. President Edwards wrote two treatises on this subject, entitled An Inquiry into the Freedom of the Will, and on The Doctrine of Original Sin. He argues that a man may resist a certain amount of opposition to his will, but that his power of resistance is limited, and that under certain conditions the will is powerless to resist. This he calls moral necessity. He argued, too, that God's foreknowledge is inconsistent with an absolute necessity in man's choice. The Unitarians and Rationalists are credited with extensively holding strong views in favour of Necessity.

Necrology [Gr. necros, "dead," and logos, "a discourse"].—A collection of accounts of the lives and deeds of deceased persons, published soon after their death. Also a list of the deceased members or benefactors of any religious community.

Necromancy [Gr. nekros, "dead," and manteia, "divination"].—The art of revealing future events by conversing with the dead. It originated in the East, and amongst the Greeks it was said to have been the invention of Orpheus. Thessaly was the chief place where it was practised, and it was connected there with many horrible rites. A distinct class of people called Psychagogoi, "evokers of spirits," made it their profession. Its practice is condemned in the Old Testament, where we have a singular instance of it in the story of the witch of Endor. With the establishment of Christianity by Constantine, necromancy was strictly forbidden. It is still practised by some of the negro tribes in Western Africa. Traces of it are to be found in Scandinavian and Teutonic poems. In our own days, some persons in the United States calling themselves spiritualists, pretend to hold table-turning and spirit-rapping to hold converse with the spirit-world.

Nectarius.—Successor of Gregory Nazianzen as Patriarch of Constantinople in 381.

decessor of St. Chrysostom. He led the Church with great piety and devotion. Since the Novatian heresies had been a special penitential priest to the confessions of those who had fallen deeply after baptism, but several had stepped in, and Nectarius abolished arius, Patriarch of Jerusalem from 328 to 336, wrote a preface to Mogila's Confession of 1662, a declaration against Rome, a Greek treatise against the theses on papal supremacy, published in Palestine to bring the Greeks to the Romish Church.

FELIX [b. 1798, d. 1829], was a Swiss, Geneva, who was trained as a soldier and was converted during the religious revival of his native city, and having been in London, in 1823, went to the Alps, where he preached to the masses, who had greatly degenerated in morals. His life was a very noble and sacrificing one, and his labours were blessed.

WILKINSON, ROBERT.—One of the large and best of English laymen who have done service to the Church by their example and writings. He was born in London, 1656, educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, and was elected a Fellow of the Royal Society.

He was intimate with Halley, with whom he travelled in France and Italy. He spent his life chiefly in writing. He refused to take the oaths of allegiance to King James II. and remained a Nonjuror till 1709.

He died at Kensington, Jan. 16th, 1715, leaving much money for the poor. His chief works are—Life of Bishop Bull; Practice of Piety; Companion for the Festivals and Fasts of the Church of England, which is still a standard book on the subject; The Life and Character of William Kettlewell; Letters to a Dissenter on the Trinity; and The Whole Duty of a Christian.

Neology. [RATIONALISM.]

Neonomians [Gr. neos, "new," and nomos, "law"].—The name applied to the views of the teachers at the end of the seventeenth century who asserted that the old Law was abolished, and that Christianity was a new Law which had taken its place. It was one of the many controversies in which the doctrine of Antinomianism were brought on against the doctrine of Legalism on the other. The Neonomians, while expressing their belief in the necessity of good works, added that "the very elect are not justified until they receive Christ, and are then condemned; that there is a full pardon and glory upon the terms of obedience to all who hear it, and that God requires them to comply with the law." The principal teacher to whom the name Neonomian was applied was DANIEL WATSON [q.v.].

CL—24

Neophytes [Gr. "newly planted"] was a term used in the primitive Church for converts who had been recently baptised. Neophytes could not hold any offices in the Church; but when any enter the Roman Church they sometimes do so under special privileges from the Pope. The name was also given to those who had been newly received amongst the clergy or into any religious order.

Neo-Platonism.—A system of philosophy which became prominent in Alexandria about the end of the second century. Ammonius Saccas [i.e. the sack-bearer], so-called from his having been in former years a carrier, was at that time the chief teacher of this school. But long before this, Philo Judæus, a contemporary of Christ, had prepared the way, and, by some, is regarded as the first of the Neo-Platonists. The chief aim of this school was to popularise and revive the doctrines of Plato, by showing that all that was true in current systems of philosophy was in harmony with Platonism. At Alexandria every system of philosophy and every religious sect had its representatives; Ammonius Saccas taught that all these were derived from one original and perfect standard of philosophy, which had been delivered to the Egyptians by Hermes, and had been preserved in its purity by Plato. The amalgamation of the mysticism of Egypt with the speculations of Plato formed the basis of Neo-Platonism; and with it were blended many of the doctrines of Aristotle and of the existing philosophies. Ammonius, who had been brought up as a Christian, held that Christ was a great and wise teacher; but that His followers were misled, and had corrupted His teaching by spurious additions, such as the Divinity of Christ and other doctrines.

Christ, he said, would be favourable to Neo-Platonism, for He came to check error, but not to abolish the true standard of philosophy. Hence Neo-Platonism as taught by Ammonius was hostile to, and became the powerful rival of, Christianity. Other prominent teachers in this school were Numenius, a Jew, Longinus, and Plotinus, and a powerful patron was found in Julian the Apostate. Plotinus consolidated Neo-Platonism, and reduced it to a definite system. The Supreme Being, according to this school, was a mystical Trinity, consisting of unity, or Primitive Light, the source of all things; intelligence; and soul, from which emanated all the souls of men and animals. The souls of men were considered to be kept in their bodies as in a prison, and hence self-denial and asceticism were enjoined as a means towards the release of the soul, and its rise above earthly things. The most distinguished pupil of Plotinus was Porphyry; in his time Neo-Platonism became strongly hostile to Christianity. Their last great teacher was Proclus, a man of great learning, who lived about 450. In 519 the Emperor Justinian arbitrarily closed their school at Alexandria, and dispersed their followers, and by about the middle of the century they had disappeared altogether. But their system has greatly influenced Christianity in all ages. Origen was a pupil of Ammonius Saccas. Clement of Alexandria, and other divines, may be styled Christian Neo-Platonists, in that they, like Ammonius, sought to find out what was true in Platonism, and in every philosophy; and then to show that it was in harmony with the Christian faith. Truth, it was recognised, was not confined to any one sect or system. Thus Clement, in his Strom. i. 7, writes: "By philosophy, I mean not Stoic, Platonic, Epicurean, or Peripatetic theories, but all sound teaching of the collective schools, all precepts of virtue that have connection with religious knowledge." At the Reformation, Neo-Platonism flourished for a time, especially in Florence.

Neot, St., was an Anglo-Saxon saint of great holiness and learning, who resided first at Glastonbury, and afterwards in Cornwall, on the spot where the present St. Neot's was afterwards erected. It is said that he had a great influence over King Alfred, to whom he was a kinsman. He died on July 31st, about 822.

Nepotism [Lat. nepos, "a nephew"].—The practice among ecclesiastics of conferring honours, titles, or privileges upon members of their family.

Neri, St. PHILIP, founder of the Oratorians, descended from two of the noblest families in Tuscany, was born at Florence in 1515. When he was eighteen he went to his uncle, who was a merchant living at St. Germans, near Mount Cassino. It was intended that Philip should become his heir, but the youth feared being led away to a love of dissipation, and went to Rome, where he became tutor in the family of Galeotto Gaccia. Here he continued his studies, and his fame for learning and for purity of life became very great. He ate only once a day, and his food was generally bread and water. He was the disciple and intimate friend of St. Charles Borromeo [BORROMEO], and under him did many works of charity. In 1548, with the assistance of his confessor Persiano Rosa, he founded the famous Confraternity of the Blessed Trinity in the Church of Our Saviour del Campo for the relief of the poor. In 1551 he was ordained priest, and joined the community of St. Jerome, which had received the name of "The Charity." In 1564 he formed those who had joined him in the care of the hospitals, and who numbered about twenty, into the Congregation of the Oratorians, so called because they assembled for prayers in the oratory or chapel every morning and evening. The society obtained the approbation of Pope Gregory XIII., who gave to them the church of "Our Lady of Vallicella," of which took possession in 1583. The Oratorians spread all over Italy, and were introduced into France in 1631. St. Philip died July 26th, 1595. He was canonised by Gregory X. in 1622.

The Oratorians were established in 1611, to the great disgust of the Pope. The Order increased, however, until the French Revolution, when it went down rapidly; but it was revived of late years. The first convent in England was established at Birmingham in 1847 by Dr. J. H. (since Cardinal) Newman, and in 1849 F. W. Faber set up a convent at Brompton. The church which has since been built on that site is one of the most magnificent in London.

Nero, PERSECUTION OF, took place in 64, in the tenth year of the Emperor Nero. In July of that year a fire broke out in Rome, on the south side of the Palatine Hill, and raged for some days, so that a great part of the city was burnt to ashes. It is believed that Nero himself was the cause of the fire, and, though there is no evidence to prove it, it is possible, from his cruelty of disposition and his increased magnificence in the last years of his reign, that he caused the fire. He endeavoured to allay the public mind by his kindness to all who suffered from the fire, and laid the blame on the Christians, caused to be persecuted with great severity. Some were torn asunder by wild beasts, others were crucified, and some were burnt with pitch or other inflammable materials. The Emperor set up on poles to light the garden of his palace. [PERSECUTIONS.]

Nestorians.—Followers of Nestorius, who was Bishop of Constantinople from 428 to 431. Formerly a monk of Antioch, he had gained some reputation as a theologian and orator, he was nominated to the see of Constantinople by the Emperor Theodosius II. and readily elected by the clergy as a means to put an end to the distractions caused by the claims of two rival Constantinian candidates—Proclus and Philip of Ispahan. Nestorius began his episcopal career by showing himself extremely zealous for the extirpation of heresy. After denouncing heretics on moderate terms in a sermon preached on the day of his installation, he proceeded to the persecution of the Arians and others, and prevailed on the Emperor to publish an edict against them. But it was before Nestorius himself was a heretic. His views concerning the nature of the Son of God were heretical views concerning the nature of the Lord. Many eminent divines, especially of the school of Alexandria, in opposition to Arianism, had been led strongly upon the Divine nature of Christ, as almost to exclude the idea of a human nature; and to assert of him as much as could strictly only be said of God. For example, God was said ave suffered, and died. This strongly condemned in a sermon in Constantinople by Anastasius, a Nestorius had brought with him. Anastasius particularly of the term Theotokos (Bearer, God), which had been applied to Mary by Athanasius and others, in general use. Nestorius supposed that Anastasius in numerous sermons, amongst other things, he had said it was not allowable to affirm that the Virgin Mary bore God, or that man may be worshipped, or that man may be worshipped to replace the word God, however, he admitted in a sermon that Christotokos, i.e. Mother of Christ, since both natures were united in Christ, this term would express all that the older term was meant to express. His sermons caused a great commotion in Constantinople. Proclus and others opposed Nestorius, some even threatened to throw him into prison, for his part, retaliated by punishing, or whipping such of his monks as were under his authority. The heresy spread, and soon reached a large number of monks adopted by Nestorius. Cyril of Alexandria, being the dispute, entered the lists against Nestorius, and the contest between the two Bishops, inflamed by rivalry of their Sees, assumed the complexion of a personal quarrel. Nestorius enlisted the aid of Celestine, Pope of Rome, and addressed several letters to him, the most important of which were anathemas, to which the Bishop of Constantinople was called upon to answer. Nestorius answered by sending counter-anathemas.

A General Council was called at Ephesus by Emperor Theodosius to settle the questions, A.D. 431. John of Ephesus was appointed, and the state of the roads. Nevertheless, Nestorians determined to attend, and a session was held under the presidency of Cyril. Nestorius was three times called to appear, but, with his suffragans, refused to obey in the absence of the Emperor. On the third citation the question was decided in his absence, and Nestorius was deposed "in the name of Jesus Christ whom he hath denied." The Emperor at first refused sentence, but extensive bribery was brought over to the side of Cyril, and he prevailed upon to confirm and consent to the consecration of a monk, to the bishopric of Ephesus.

Nestorius was banished to Emesa, Antioch, where he remained until he died in that year, the Emperor ordered the restoration of their leader, and the disturbance thus caused was so serious, that he was sentenced to be banished for life to the Great Oasis. Here he was taken captive by a wild people called the Blemmyæ, who devastated the Oasis. On being released by these captors, he gave himself up to an officer of the Emperor in Egypt, under whose treatment he died [about A.D. 440].

The followers of Nestorius, being driven from the empire, wandered eastward, and settled in Persia, Ceylon, and on the Malabar and other parts of the coast of India. In the sixth century Nestorianism became the established religion of Persia, and all other forms of Christianity were forbidden. The absence of continuous written history prevents us from knowing accurately the course of the Nestorian Church. That they existed in China in the 8th century is proved by the fact that the Jesuits in the 17th century found there a monument set up by them in 781. In 1258 twenty-five Metropolitans acknowledged the authority of the Nestorian Patriarch of Bagdad. In the primacy of Archbishop Tait, repeated applications having been made by the Nestorian Christians for instruction and help, under isolation and oppression, Dr. Cutts was sent out to report on their condition. They have had, at least, the courage of their faith, however ignorant they may have been. Education has been more than once offered them by other Churches which had a purpose behind—namely, to proselytise them to their own views—a somewhat ungenerous method, and one which they greatly resent. The wisest suggestion which appears to have been made with respect to them is, that means should be afforded of procuring their union with the Eastern Church, as represented by the orthodox Patriarchs. If Eastern Christians could be brought to understand one another better, and to see that their separation is largely owing to misrepresentations and misunderstandings, a great benefit would accrue to Christianity. It would present an unbroken front to the reviving fanaticism of Islam, which threatens even yet to disturb very seriously the course of civilisation. And it would be a blessing to the English Church to be privileged thus to be the peacemaker. A mission to them, set on foot by Archbishop Benson, has sent back a most interesting report, which will be found in the Guardian newspaper for Sept. 14th and 28th, 1886. The object of this mission was to exhibit the doctrine and ritual of the Church of England, and its harmony with the Catholic antiquity which they claim, combined with learning in the Scriptures. The mission, as the report shows, was received with the most hearty welcome.

Newcastle, BISHOPRIC OF.—This diocese was founded in May, 1882, its first bishop being the Right Rev. Ernest Roland Wilberforce. It was taken out of the Sees of Durham and Carlisle, and comprises the entire county of Northumberland, the town and county of Berwick-on-Tweed, and part of Cumberland. It has 171 benefices. The officials of the diocese are two archdeacons, the vicar of St. Nicholas Church, Newcastle, and seventeen minor canons. The income of the See is £3,500 a year.

The church of St. Nicholas, which supplies the place of a cathedral, was consecrated by Osmund, Bishop of Salisbury, in 1091. It was burned down in 1218, and there are traces of its first rebuilding; the present structure of the nave, however, dates from 1359, and portions of it were not built till 1474. The style is Decorated and Early Perpendicular. It contains nine side-chapels or chantries. It was restored by Sir Gilbert Scott between 1873 and 1877.

Newcome, WILLIAM, Archbishop of Armagh, was born in 1729. He was educated at Abingdon Grammar School, and thence went to Oxford in 1753. In 1765 he became a D.D. and Chaplain to the Earl of Hertford, who was made Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland. In the following year he was made Bishop of Dromore, whence he was successively preferred to Ossory in 1775, Waterford in 1779, and to Armagh in 1795. He died in 1800.

Archbishop Newcome was one of the eminent divines of the liberal school of the eighteenth century. He was an assiduous Biblical student, and wrote many valuable works, as Harmony of the Gospels, Observations on Our Lord's Conduct as a Divine Instructor and on the Excellence of His Moral Character, New Versions of the Twelve Minor Prophets and of Ezekiel, A Review of the Chief Difficulties in the Gospel History relating to Our Lord's Resurrection, and An Historical View of the English Biblical Translations from 1528-1776. The best of these is the Harmony of the Gospels, which contains much useful criticism and valuable information. It led to a controversy with Dr. Priestley on the duration of our Lord's ministry, Bishop Newcome arguing for three years, while Dr. Priestley limited the time to one year.

New Connexion Baptists. [BAPTISTS.]

New Connexion Methodists. [METHODISTS.]

New Jerusalem Church.—A society that was founded by the followers of SWENSON [q.v.], and so called because they hold that their Church is the "New Jerusalem" spoken of in the Apocalypse.

In December, 1783, five persons met together in London in answer to an advertisement for admirers of Swedenborg's writings, and these continued to meet at intervals, and by April, 1787, they had increased their number to thirty, and resolved to form a society. Amongst the first disciples were two laymen of the Church of England, Thomas Hartley and John Clowes, also two Wesleyan preachers. The following statement of the Articles of Faith held by the Church, not indeed written by Swedenborg but drawn up at the Annual Conference of Ministers and Laymen.

The Articles of Faith of the New Church signified by the New Jerusalem in the Revelation, are these:—

"1. That Jehovah God, the Creator and Father of heaven and earth, is Love Itself, and Wisdom Itself, or Good Itself and Truth Itself; that He is one, both in Essence and in Person, and nevertheless, is the Divine Trinity of Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, which are the essential Divine Humanity, and the Divine Providence answering to the soul, the body, and the spiritual energy in man. And that the Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ is that God.

"2. That Jehovah God himself descended from heaven as Divine Truth, which is the Word, and took upon Him Human nature for the purpose of removing from man the powers of hell, and raising to order all things in the Spiritual world, and all things in the Church. That He removed from man the powers of hell, by combating against victories over them, in which consisted the great work of Redemption. That by the same means were His temptations, the last of which was the Passion of the Cross, He united, in His Humanity, Divine truth to Divine good, or Divine wisdom to Divine love, and so returned into His Divine state, which He was from eternity, together with and in His Glorified Humanity, whence He forever banishes the infernal powers in subjection to Himself. And that all who believe in Him with the understanding from the heart, and live accordingly, will be saved.

"3. That the Sacred Scripture, or Word of God, is Divine Truth Itself containing a Spiritual sense heretofore unknown, whence it is Divinely inspired and sholy in every syllable, as well as a literal sense, which is the basis of its spiritual sense, and is visible. Divine Truth is in its fulness, its sanctity, and its power. Thus, that it is accommodated to the apprehension both of angels and men. That the spiritual and natural senses are united by correspondence, like soul and body, every natural expression having an image answering to, and including, a spiritual or Divine idea. And thus, that the Word is the medium of communication with heaven, and of conjunction with the Lord.

"4. That the government of the Lord's Divine Love and Wisdom is the Divine Providence, which is universal, exercised according to certain laws of order, and extending to the minutest particulars of the life of all men, both of the good and of the evil. That in all its operations it has respect to what is infinite and eternal, and makes no account of things transitory but as they are subordinated to eternal ends; thus, that it makes no account of man, in the connection of things temporal, with things eternal; for that the continual aim of the Lord, by His Divine Providence, is to put man to Himself, and Himself to man, that He may be able to give him the felicities of eternal life. And that the laws of permission are also the laws of the Divine Providence, since evil cannot be prevented without destroying the nature of man as an accountable agent; and because, also, it cannot be removed unless it be known, and cannot be known unless it appear. Thus, that no evil is permitted but to prevent a greater, and all is overruled by the Lord's Divine Providence for the greatest possible good.

"5. That man is not life, but only a recipient of life from the Lord, who, as He is Love Itself, and Wisdom Itself, is also Life Itself, which is communicated by influx to all in the spiritual world, whether belonging to heaven or to hell, or world; but is received differently according to his quality and reception.

ing his abode in the world, is, in the midst between heaven and influences from both, and thus spiritual equilibrium between the consequence of which he enjoys freedom of choice, in spiritual things and possesses the capacity of being to the Lord and His kingdom, away from the Lord, and continuing in the kingdom of darkness. If he had such freedom of choice, without use, the Church would be unable to possess anything by virtue of being conjoined to the Lord, and would be chargeable on God Himself.

This day is born into evil of all kinds towards it. That, therefore, entering the kingdom of heaven, is created or created anew; which is done in a progressive manner, by charity and faith as mediums of regeneration. That as all men are capable of being regenerated, and, every one according to his regeneration, a regenerated man is in the company of angels of heaven, and the unredeemed of hell. But that no one can inherit any further than is shown by actual life; whence all are saved, special means being used in the other life for that purpose.

This is the first beginning of the life that it consists in a man's growth in regard to his deeds and knowing and acknowledging his sins before the Lord, supplicating for a new life. That to this end, of affection, of thought, or of horror and shunned as sins, use they proceed from infernal aggregate are called the Devil's good affections, good thoughts, to be cherished and performed good and from God. That these are by man as of himself; nevertheless, knowledge and belief that God is operating in him and by him. Hence sins are as sins, so far they are not forgiven; so far also he is not himself, but from the Lord; for he loves truth, has faith, and hope. And that the Decalogue is the law of life.

Faith, and Good Works are the means of man's salvation; since charity is spiritual but natural; and faith is living but dead; and both charity and good works, are merely mental, because without use or fixedness of faith, of charity, or of hope, but that all is of the Lord, and He alone.

Baptism and the Holy Supper are the external institution, and are to be used; Baptism being an external entrance into the Church, and a sign of purification and regeneration; the Holy Supper being an external means to receive it worthily, of introduction into heaven, and of conjunction with the Lord, which also it is a sign and testament after death, which is only the material body, never to be re-created in a spiritual or substantial form; continues to live to eternity; and, according to his ruling affections, and thence his abode in heaven and in hell, if his ruling affections have been evil.

The time of the Second Advent is a coming, not in Person, but in the power and glory of His Holy Word. That it is attended, like His first coming, with the restoration to order of all things in the spiritual world, where the wonderful Divine operation, commonly expected under the name of the Last Judgment, has in consequence been performed; and with the preparing of the way for a New Church on the earth, the first Christian Church having spiritually come to its end of consummation, through evils of life and errors of doctrine, as foretold by the Lord in the Gospels. And that this New or Second Christian Church, which will be the Crown of all Churches, and will stand forever, is what was representatively seen by John, when he beheld the holy city, New Jerusalem, descending from God out of heaven, prepared as a bride adorned for her husband."

The general affairs of the New Church are administered by a conference of ministers and laymen. Its principal societies for spreading its doctrines are the "Swedenborg Printing Society," established in 1810, and the "Missionary and Tract Society," established in 1821. Its disciples are found now in all parts of Christendom; its first minister in America was ordained in 1798, since which time it has made great progress.

At the present time there are in England about seventy-five societies, twelve of which are in London or its neighbourhood; they are governed by a Conference, which meets annually, and is composed of ministers and representatives of the societies. In America, where there is a still greater number of societies, they have a general convention composed of eleven associations and six societies. They have also societies in Germany, Austria, France, Switzerland, Italy, Norway and Sweden, Australia, and Africa.

Newton, SIR ISAAC [b. at Woolsthorpe, Lincolnshire, 1642; d. in London, 1727].—The greatest mathematician England has produced. In spite of feeble health he made great progress in mechanics and mathematics; he entered Trinity College, Cambridge, in 1660, became a Fellow in 1667, and two years later was appointed Lucasian Professor of Mathematics. In 1699 he became Master of the Mint, and continued to hold the office till his death. The wonderful discoveries by which he has gained for himself lasting fame were chiefly made in the earlier part of his life: but it is not with these that we have to do. In religion he was deeply earnest, but displayed a tendency towards Arianism. He was devoted to Bible study, the results of which he published in his Chronology of Ancient Kingdoms Amended; Observations on the Prophecies of Daniel and the Apocalypse of St. John: and a Historical Account of Two Notable Corruptions of Scripture.

Newton, JOHN, one of the leaders of the Evangelical party, well known as the friend of William Cowper, was born in 1725. His mother, who was a Dissenter, had a great wish that her son should be brought up to be a minister, but she died when he was seven years old. This made a great change in Newton's life, for, though his father and stepmother were kind to him, they had no great love for him. At ten years old he left school, and went on several voyages with his father. He afterwards was for some years at Alicant, and when he was about eighteen a prospect was opened for him in the West Indies, but before starting he went to Kent on business, where he met and fell in love with Mary Catlett, who afterwards became his wife. He stayed there too long, and the ship sailed without him.

Through the teaching of his mother he had been seriously inclined in his youth; but he came across Shaftesbury's Characteristics, and the tendency to infidelity which they created in him was increased by an evil companion, and for a few years he lived in vice and profanity. He went to Guinea, where he had intended to make his fortune in the slave trade, but he mismanaged his affairs and fell into great poverty. After two years of misery he wrote home, and a ship was sent out to fetch him. On the way home came the turning-point of his life. There was a storm, the ship was wrecked, and the crew momentarily expected it to sink. Newton was frightened as his past life rose up before him, and made resolutions which he kept, in spite of one relapse when he was again in Africa, but a fever which he had there again convinced him of his sin. During his convalescence he studied the Bible, Divinity, and Latin. On his return to England he was married, early in 1750, to Mary Catlett, whom he had now loved for seven years. He used to say that the thought of her had some influence over him, even at the time of his greatest wickedness, and his married life, which lasted forty years, was very happy.

He would have liked now to give up his seafaring life, but there was no other way of earning a living open to him. It was some years before he decided on entering the ministry. He would have preferred that of the Dissenters, but his wife persuaded him to become a minister of the Church of England, when the Bishop of Lincoln, in 1764, consented to ordain him to the curacy of Olney. He only received £60 a year, so found it very difficult to live; but Mr. Thornton gave him £200 a year to enable him to do more good among the poor. He remained at Olney fifteen years, during which time a new gallery had to be added to the church to provide for the increasing congregation, and the number of communicants became very large. It was here that his friendship with Cowper began.

In 1779 he was opposed by a hostile party in the town, and at the same time the livings of St. Mary Woolnoth and St. Mary Woolchurch were offered him by Mr. Thornton, and he accepted them. There he preached assiduously, generally between three and six sermons a week, and his church was crowded. He had not a good delivery, but his illustrations were very apt, and his struck home to his hearers.

He died Dec. 21st, 1807, continuing work till the end. He wrote a good deal, the chief of his productions being the Argument or Defence of Conformity, the Memoirs of the Rev. J. Cowper, and of the Rev. Mr. Shaw, a collection of his letters (Cardiphonia), and the Olney Hymns, he composed in conjunction with his friend Cowper.

Newton, THOMAS, D.D., Dean of St. Paul's and Bishop of Bristol [b. 1687, d. 1768]. He was educated at Westminster School and then entered Trinity College, Cambridge, and was ordained in 1730. In 1761 he was appointed Bishop of Bristol, and in 1768 Dean of St. Paul's. His life and writings, forming six volumes, passed into two editions. The volumes are thus divided: 1, Life and Parliamentary Speeches; 2 and 3, Dissertations on the Old and New Testament and on Moral Subjects; 4, Sermons; 5 and 6, Dissertations on the Prophecies of the Old Testament, and five Charges on—[1] the state of the Church, [2] the increase of infidelity, [3] the licentiousness of the times, [4] late attempts against the Church, [5] dissuasive from schism. He also published in 1749 an edition of Milton's Paradise Lost [2 vols.], with critical notes, and a Life of the author.

New Year, CELEBRATION OF.—It has been the custom of most of the nations to mark the first day of the year with rejoicings, and we find tokens of this among the Chinese, Romans, Jews, Egyptians, etc. In the early days of Christianity the Fathers made a protest against the feasting and revellings that took place among the heathens on that day, and preached penitence sermons. When Dec. 25th was recognised as the day of our Lord's Nativity, Jan. 1st, as the eighth day after, became a festival, the day of Christ's Circumcision, and Dionysius Exiguus dates the year from the circumcision of the Lord. In many old documents the day goes by the name of "the octave of the Lord." When the day first began to be kept as a day it was some time before Christianity was introduced into it as the first day of the year; but it became a custom for the priests to deliver a New Year's oration, which habit was continued until the Reformation. In some churches it is now the custom to begin a service at 4 p.m. on New Year's Eve, and continue it till after midnight, while almost all the old year out and the new year in.

ia, COUNCIL OF.—This was the first in which East and West met to- nd hence it is the first of the four Councils of the Church. The peace urch had been greatly disturbed by the teaching of Arius and his followers concerning the Divinity of Christ, whereupon the Emperor Constantine, being anxious to see the Church united and at peace, summoned a General Council to meet at Nicæa in Bithynia, in June, 325, to settle the questions at issue. Nicæa was chosen as the place of assembly partly because of its healthy situation and partly on account of its nearness to the seat of government, Nicomedia, twenty miles distant.

The number of bishops who attended the Council has been generally received as 318; and each bishop had two presbyters and other attendants, so that the whole assembly numbered, according to some accounts, over 2,000. As Arianism was of Eastern growth, and unknown in the West, the great majority of the Council were Eastern bishops, only about ten coming from the West. The composition of the assembly was of a very mixed character. There were deputies from Egypt, headed by Alexander, the aged Bishop of Alexandria; in attendance upon him was a young deacon, twenty-five years of age, represented as small and insignificant, but who was none other than the great Athanasius, the champion of the orthodox; from Alexandria also came Arius, the leader of the opposite party. There were also bishops from Syria, including Eustathius of Antioch; Eusebius, the historian, of Cæsarea, who was suspected of being an Arian; one bishop came from Persia, another from Armenia others from Asia Minor, Greece, and Cyprus. Another conspicuous bishop was Eusebius, of Nicomedia, a strong Arian. It was from his hands that the Emperor Constantine, on his deathbed, received the rite of Baptism. Alexander, a presbyter, and Acesius the Novatian, represented Byzantium; and Marcellus, Bishop of Ancyra, was a prominent speaker on the orthodox side; all these came from the East. The West was represented by deputies from France, Calabria, Sicily, and Milan. Rome sent two presbyters, Victor and Vincentius, her Bishop, Sylvester, being too aged to be present. From Carthage came Cæcilian, and from Spain Hosius, Bishop of Cordova, who is represented as holding the chief place in the Council at the Emperor's right hand. The sight of these Fathers of the Church was rendered deeply impressive by the fact that the majority of them bore traces of the severe persecutions through which they had passed. They were truly an army of confessors; and for this reason they were peculiarly qualified to testify what was the true faith of the Church. Many heathen philosophers were attracted to Nicæa, and discussed with the bishops outside the Council.

On the arrival of Constantine, the Council was formally opened; first, an address to the Emperor was recited by Eusebius of Cæsarea, and a thanksgiving to God for the Emperor's victory over Licinius. Constantine from his throne in the midst of the Council, then addressed the assembled bishops, exhorting them to unity and concord; and then, in order to promote this desirable end, he openly in their presence burnt all the written complaints and accusations that various bishops had laid before him, adding these words: "It is the command of Christ that he who desires to be himself forgiven must first forgive his brother." Coming now to the main purpose for which the Council was assembled, viz. the determining of the faith which had been attacked by Arius, it seems certain that Arius was heard in defence of his opinions, and that he boldly adhered to them; whereupon the assembled bishops raised their hands and closed their ears in horror at such blasphemous words. Arius was expelled, and the Council set themselves to issue the result of their deliberations in the form of a creed, setting forth the true faith. First of all Eusebius of Cæsarea presented a creed which had been long in use in Cæsarea; the Arian bishops, about eighteen or twenty in number, were willing to sign it; but as this creed evaded the very points at issue, a very important phrase was inserted, viz. homoousion tō patri—"of one substance with the Father," and other alterations. The creed of Cæsarea was then adopted as the faith or creed of the Council of Nicæa. The Emperor acquiesced in the decisions of the Council, banished Arius and his followers, and ordered all the heretic's writings to be burnt. He further decreed to banish any who refused to subscribe the Nicene Creed. Theonas and Secundus were the only two bishops who persevered in refusing to subscribe to the Creed, and they were banished.

The following anathema was added to the Creed:—

"But those that say 'there was when He was not,' and 'before He was begotten He was not,' and that 'He came into existence from what was not,' or who profess that the Son of God is of a different 'person' or 'substance,' or that He was created, or changeable, or variable, the Catholic and Apostolic Church anathematizes them."

Another question was settled by this Council, viz. the date for keeping Easter. The Council decreed by common consent [i] to discard the custom of keeping the Christian Passover on the same day as the Jewish, viz. the 14th of Nisan, and [ii] to keep it on the Sunday that came next after the full moon of the vernal equinox.

The Council, before breaking up, passed twenty canons for the correction of abuses, and for regulating the discipline and government of the Church. Of these twenty Nicene canons, the 1st, 2nd, 3rd, and 17th refer to the morals and behaviour of the clergy; the 17th, forbidding usury; the other three restraining abuses now happily extinct. The 4th, 5th, 6th, 7th, 15th, 16th, and 18th refer to clerical discipline. The 4th is still observed throughout the greater part of Christendom, and orders three bishops at least to be present at the consecration of a bishop. The 5th limits the power of the bishop, by ordering a Synod to meet twice a year, in order to investigate the cases of those excommunicated. The 6th and 7th preserved to the Metropolitans of Alexandria, Antioch, and Cæsarea their ancient privileges. The 15th has been generally disregarded throughout the Church; it forbids the translation or promotion of ecclesiastics from one city to another. The 18th restrains the powers of deacons, who in that age practised a kind of tyranny, which has been imitated by the other orders of the ministry in later times. The 16th forbids bishops to ordain outside their own dioceses. Other canons refer to the cases of those who have "lapsed" in times of persecution, laying down on what conditions such are to be received back into the Church. The last canon, the 20th, directs prayers to be offered up, the people standing.

Another question, of local interest only, was settled, viz. the Melitian schism in the Church in Egypt.

The work of the Council was now completed. The Emperor, in a letter to the Churches throughout the empire, set forth the settlement of the Arian and Paschal controversies; and, having entertained the whole of the bishops present at the Council, dismissed them to their dioceses, exhorting them to prize concord above all things, and begging them to pray for him. The Council, which had commenced probably in June, closed with the banquet on July 25th.

Nicander, St., and Marcian, St.— Martyrs in the reign of Diocletian. They were soldiers in the Roman army until their conversion to Christianity. Being brought before the Governor Maximus, they were charged with disobedience to their prince and impiety to the gods of the empire. The imperial edict was read, which obliged all to sacrifice to the heathen deities, and they were accordingly required to comply with it immediately. Maximus, however, said he would make the matter as easy as he could, and not insist on any great and solemn sacrifice, but be satisfied with their throwing a little incense into the fire in honour of the gods. They persisted in their refusal to do this, and Daria, the wife of Nicander, urged her husband to remain steadfast in his faith, even begging that she might herself share his martyrdom, and she was consequently imprisoned, but afterwards released. Nicander and Marcian were beheaded, June 17th, about 303. The place of their martyrdom is supposed to be Mœsia, a province of Illyria; but some say that it was Venafra, in the kingdom of Naples, and that it was in the reign of Domitian.

Nicene Creed. [CREED, NICEÆ.]

phorus I., Emperor of Constantia originally Treasurer and Chancellor. In 802 he took possession of the banishing the Empress Irene to where she died shortly after. He is said as being of a licentious, rapacious, and cruel character. In his relations with the Church he heavily taxed Church property, persecuted the Iconoclasts and sects, especially Monophysites, and prohibited the Bishop of Constantinople from carrying on a correspondence with the Pope of Rome. He was d. 811, in a war with the Bulgarians.

phorus II. [PHOCAS] became Emperor in 963. He published a decree, prohibiting that no bishop should be installed without the consent of the Emperor, and appointing officers to the charge of vacant Sees, and ordering them to spend a limited amount for ecclesiastical purposes, and to pay the rest to the royal treasury. He was murdered by John Tzimiskes, who succeeded him.

phorus, St.—A martyr of Antioch during the persecution raised by the Emperor Valerian and Gallienus. He was a physician and was a great friend of one Sapphirus, a priest. But discord rose up between them and for a time they never met. At length Sapphirus attempted a reconciliation, but failed. The persecution breaking out, Sapphirus was seized for his religion, tried, and, after going through great torture, was condemned to be beheaded. Nicephorus, as he was called, was leading the priest to execution, but when he saw him and intreated to be forgiven, his request was refused by Sapphirus. Seeing the scaffold the priest renounced the Christian religion, and thus saved his life. Nicephorus did what he could to help him persevere, but to no purpose, and he died himself a Christian, and ready to die in the apostate's stead, and was martyred in 260.

St. Nicholas, Sr., Archbishop of Myra, in the middle of the third century, was born in Lycia, of Christian parents. He founded the Monastery of Sion, near Myra, and was noted for his charity and piety. One of the deeds ascribed to him is that of throwing three bags of gold into the house of a poor nobleman who was about to furnish a dowry for his three daughters, and was tempted to sell them to shame until Nicholas thus delivered them. This constituted him the patron saint of the poor. Soon after his return Nicholas was elected Archbishop of Myra. He is supposed to have died on Dec. 6th, 342.

The three balls, the attribute of St. Nicholas, and the three bags of gold before spoken of, and the three loaves of bread, an emblem of his charity.

The fact that the three balls are the attribute of pawnbrokers has a curious origin.

The three gold balls were a conspicuous object on the spire of St. Nicholas Church, Lombard Street, and as in the Middle Ages the money-brokers had their head-quarters in this street, it became the fashion for persons who set up as money-lenders to use the three balls of St. Nicholas as their trade mark. Nicholas is also the patron of thieves, because he forced them to return some property they had stolen; of sailors, because he stilled a storm when journeying to the Holy Land; and of children, because he is said to have restored to life three boys who had been murdered, dismembered, and put into a tub of wine. St. Nicholas is one of the most popular of saints, the chief patron of Russia and of Venice, Freiburg, and many other towns, chiefly seaports. There are said to be 372 churches dedicated to him in England.

Nicolaitanes.—A heretical sect, holding the doctrines of Antinomianism, and condemned in the Book of Revelations as holding "the doctrine of Balaam . . . to eat things sacrificed unto idols, and to commit fornication." Probably it was these whom St. Paul described as "glorying in their shame, mind- ing earthly things." The Nicolaitanes are thought by some to derive their name from Nicolas the proselyte; others believe that the name is only the Greek form of Balaam, "destroyer of the people," of whom they were supposed to be symbolical. They are spoken of by Irenæus, Tertullian, and Clement of Alexandria as being in existence in the second century; and Epiphanius says that the sect became merged in that of the Gnostics.

Nicole, PETER, was born at Chartres in 1625. He was a strong Jansenist, on which account he joined the Port Royalists, and became celebrated as a great preacher. He died in Paris, November, 1695.

Nicole assisted Arnaud in several works, as the Perpetuity of Faith and Logic of Port Royal. He translated Pascal's Provincial Letters into Latin, and wrote notes upon them. His chief original works are Essais de Morale, controversial tracts against Calvinism, a treatise of the unity of the Church, and a treatise concerning the Quietists.

Nicomedes, St.—This saint, during the Domitian persecution, attended the Christians while in prison, giving them all the assistance and comfort in his power. He also found means of giving their bodies a decent burial in spite of their persecutors, who would have interred them as public criminals. While burying the body of St. Felicitas, he was apprehended and beaten to death. He is commemorated on Sept. 15th.

Nihilists.—A sect that maintained that it was impossible for God to become man, inasmuch as God is unchangeable, therefore that Christ was not different after His Incarnation to what He was before. The Incarnation was a Theophany, and God suffered Himself to appear man. This theory, though not so strongly put, was started by Abelard at the beginning of the twelfth century, but greatly developed and brought into notice by Peter Lombard some years later. The sect was strongly opposed by John of Cornwall and Walter St. Victor, and finally condemned by the Lateran Council which met in 1179. In the course of the fourteenth century the name was applied to a German sect of a very short-lived existence, who declared that God, the devil, man, heaven, hell, good, and evil did not exist, only appeared to do so, that everything was nothing, in fact.

Nimbus or Aureole.—A circular disc surrounding the head of Christ, and of saints and angels, symbolising the light which was supposed to proceed from those filled with the Holy Spirit. It was used in very ancient times by the Egyptians, and the Romans adopted the symbol for the heads of those invested with power. The Christians adopted it in the fifth century, and applied it first to Christ, then to the angels, and finally to the saints. The nimbus round Christ's head was sometimes triangular, symbolising the Trinity.

Ninian, St.—The apostle of the Southern Picts, who lived in the fourth century. He was the son of a Cumbrian prince, and resided some time at Rome, where he was instructed in religion and then returned to his native town. He built a stone church, which the Britons, having never before seen a building of stone, named Candida casa, or White House, which was afterwards called Withern. Here he fixed his See, dedicating the church to St. Martin. Ninian converted the Cumbrians and Southern Picts as far as the Grampians, and his followers did great good through the whole land. He died Sept. 16th, 432.

Nitzsch, Karl Immanuel, one of the most distinguished of modern German theologians, was born at Borna, in Saxony, in 1787. His father was Professor of Theology at Wittenberg, an ardent follower of Kant. The son was also educated at Wittenberg, where his principal theological teacher was Reinhard, one of the last Supernaturalists; but his teaching was soon counteracted by the influence of Schleiermacher and Daub. In 1810 he became Assistant Pastor, and subsequently Parish Minister, at Wittenberg. His opinions soon made themselves felt, and he was considered one of that new school, of which Neander is the head, who endeavoured to reconcile faith and science, not by forced methods, but by showing in their own lives that union of reason and reverence for which they argued in their writings. In 1822 Nitzsch was called to Bonn as Professor of Theology and University Preacher, and laboured there for over twenty years, writing and busying himself in all matters concerning the Prussian Church. He wrote several treatises in favour of the union between the Lutheran and Reformed branches of the Church, and was one of the leaders of the General Synod which met on the subject at Berlin in 1846. In the following year he succeeded Marheineke at Berlin, where he became Professor of Theology, University Preacher, and Upper Consistorial Councillor, and in 1854 Provost of St. Nikolai Church. He died Aug. 21st, 1863.

Nitzsch and Twisten have been counted the principal followers of Schleiermacher's theology, though they differed in some points as in God's relation to the world, the Divine attributes, etc. He was also one of the founders of the German Evangelical Church Diet, which first met in 1848. His chief work is his System of Christian Doctrine, showing the moral bearing of all the articles of faith, and the doctrinal root of all the Christian virtues. He takes his material wholly from the Bible, and in a number of notes runs through later opinions and systems. Another important work is his Practical Theology. In 1828 appeared A Protestant Answer to Hilke's "Apokalyptik," and he also wrote against Roman Dogmatics. His other works consist chiefly of sermons, and of various articles which appeared in the theological journals.

Noailles, Lewis Anthony de, Cardinal, was born in 1651. He became Doctor of Divinity at Paris in 1676, Bishop of Chartres in 1679 and of Châlons upon the Marne in 1685, and Archbishop of Paris in 1695. He was strongly opposed to the Quietists, writing a treatise entitled A Pastoral Instruction touching Christian Perfection and the inward life, against the Delusions of the Pretended Spirit in 1697. In 1700 he became Cardinal with the title of St. Mary Minerva. He died May 4th, 1729.

Nocturns.—These were prayers said during the night. In the Roman Church the Psalter is divided into portions consisting each of nine psalms, each of which portion is called a nocturn. Nocturnal prayers are read on the vigils of feasts.

Nocturnal services seem to have been used in the earliest times of Christianity. During the persecutions, services were held at night to avoid detection, and, when all danger was over, the custom was still continued. Nocturnal services became very frequent when ecclesiastical or monastic life generally flourished.

His theory was adopted by many and elsewhere. [See —One of the parties into which men were divided in the Middle Ages was that of the general notions exist, and the sort of classification. Thus we distinguish between the real and the ideal. In the former, we form notions of doubt in the mind alone, here is a form or idea of what have been in the mind of general properties which are alike, and which we derive from the particular. These, were known by the realists. Thus we realise "whiteness," "truth," etc. The Schoolmen proceeded to the "universals" real existence were modes of intellectual have no real existence. What rights? The Nominalists held that genera, species, etc., are mere names. Thus the realists applied to everything that is a real name, but no independent existence corresponding to the nominalists held that the Trinity are the names of substances, and that the Trinity is a mere verbal ex-pression of thought is thus the realists [q.v.].

—The shades and degrees of Roscelin, the Canon of Compiègne, was compelled to retract his theories at the Council of Soissons. He was an Ultra-Nominalist, and his realities are individual and put up together by the aid of a pupil, Abelard, held the Sabellian doctrine concerning the Trinity. In the fourteenth century William of Occam, an English Franciscan friar and a pupil of Scotus, revived the Nominalist theory in modified form, which was maintained by many eminent men. The controversy subsided at the Reformation.

In more modern times the chief Nominalists have been Hobbes, Hume, and Dugald Stewart.

Nomination.—The act of appointing a person to any office; in the Church of England, the act of presenting a clergyman to any ecclesiastical preferment. Sometimes it may be distinguished from a presentation, as the lord of a manor may have the right of nominating a man to some benefice under his patronage, but can only refer him to the ordinary for presentation.

Nomocanon.—A Greek name for a collection of canons, with the addition of those civil laws to which they refer. The first collection of this kind was made by John of Antioch, Patriarch of Constantinople, about the year 554, and was divided into fifty titles. Photius of Constantinople made another nomocanon about the year 883, reducing the heads to fourteen. Balsamon wrote a commentary upon it, about 1180, showing what was, and what was not, in use in his time, etc. In 1256 Arsenius, monk of Mount Athos, wrote notes on it showing the conformity of the Imperial laws with the Patriarchal constitutions. The third collection was made by Matthæus Blastares, monk of the Order of St. Basilus, in 1335, and was named the Synagoge—that is, a collection of canons and laws relating to each other.

Non-Communicating Attendance.—The custom of remaining in church during the Holy Communion without receiving, usual in many Anglican churches at the present day, is the subject of much controversy. In the Roman Catholic Church it is, we need not say, a usual thing, inasmuch as every man is bound to be present at Mass on "days of obligation," but is not bound to communicate, in fact, cannot do so without previous confession. But non-communicating presence in the Church of England, whatever may have been the custom in Reformation times, had quite died out in the beginning of this century, but has been, as we have said, revived in some churches. It is said in defence of it that the Holy Communion, the chief of all Christian acts of worship, had come to be altogether neglected, except by a few; that this service, a preaching of Christ in act, a "showing forth of the Lord's death," which ought to be made the one characteristic service of the Lord's Day, was turned into a service to be observed by those who professed a higher holiness than the general, not into a worship which all believers in Christ might rejoice in. To this it was replied that the Lord's Supper is a Communion, a Feast to be partaken of, not a Sacrifice to be adored. It is obvious, then, that the question turns upon the deeper question: Is the Eucharist a sacrifice? This has been discussed elsewhere. We have here to inquire what was the intention of the compilers of the Liturgy. In the Convocation of 1563, the Puritan party proposed a Canon: "That no person abide in the church during the time of the Communion unless he do communicate; that is, they shall depart immediately after the exhortation be ended, and before the consecration of the communicants." This was opposed by the Catholic party, and rejected by the Convocation. [See Strype's Ann., vol. i. p. 340.] In accordance with this, the Convocation of 1604 passed the following Canon [xviii.]. After giving direction for proper reverence in church, it proceeds: "None, either man, woman, or child, of what calling soever, shall be otherwise, at such time, bused in the church, than in quiet attendance, to hear, read, mark, and understand that which is read, preached, or ministered, saying in their due place, audibly with the minister, the Confession, the Lord's Prayer, and the Creed; and making such other answer to the public prayers as are appointed in the Book of Common Prayer, neither shall they disturb the service or sermon by walking or talking, or any other way, nor depart out of the church during the time of service or sermon, without some reasonable or just cause."

There is added another Canon, directing the churchwardens to see that all stay to the end. First, they are to see that all parishioners resort to the parish church on Sundays and holidays, adding, "and there continue the whole time of Divine Service" [Canon xc.], "and if they do not obey, they are to be presented to the ordinary of the place."

It may be considered further that there is apparently no assumption that any person will withdraw during the service; there is no rubric directing a pause for the purpose, but the service goes straight on unbroken. Probably the rubric which directs that intending receivers shall give their names beforehand is intended that the minister may know for how many to prepare.

With regard to the practice of the early Church, Bingham (Ant. b. xviii. c. i. a. 6), shows that the Canons of the Council of Nicea [xi. and xii.] did not only allow, but required attendance without oral communion in certain cases. He remarks, "In all which we may remark, that the word 'communicating' does not always signify partaking of the Eucharist, but communicating in prayers only without the oblation, which is but an imperfect sort of Communion." The Council of Nicea calls this communicating with the people in prayers only. Of the order of penitents, the conversites were the fourth. They were so called, says Bingham, "in having liberty [after the other penitentes, and catechumens were to stand with the faithful at the agape join in the common prayer, and oblation offered; but yet they might make their own oblation, nor partake Eucharist with them."

Nonconformists.—This term in use, includes all who abstain from the worship of the Establishment of England on the ground of conscience. This sense is synonymous with the separatists [q. v.]. But in a stricter sense applied to those ministers who refused from their livings on their refusal to the Act of Uniformity passed by II. in 1662. The number of these was 2,000, and their burdens were increased by the passing of the Conventicle Act in 1669, which they were prohibited from exceeding any number greater than five, in a manner than was allowed by the discipline of the Church of England. This was followed in 1665 by the Five Mile Act, and in 1673 by the Test Act [q. v.]. The Act was intended to deprive them of civil power and religious influence. The ejected clergy were some of the most pious and learned divines of the day. Howe, Flavel, Philip Henry, etc., showed a decided disposition against the Nonconformists, as evidenced in the case of Baxter, but he afterwards relented, hoping to gain toleration for the Catholics, and published his Declaration of Liberty of Conscience. Soon after the accession of William III. the Toleration Act was passed, which granted to the Nonconformists a partial relief, and in the reign of George I. the laws against them were relaxed. The Bill of 1829 removed many of the disabilities, not only from the Nonconformists, but also from the Catholics.

Nonces. [CANONICAL HORNS]

Nonjurors.—Those clergy of England, about 400 in number, who refused to take the oath of allegiance to William and Mary at the Revolution, and were therefore deprived. Among them were the Primate (Archbishop of Canterbury) Ken, White, Frampton, Turnor. The deprived bishops refused that their successors were schismatics, and regarded themselves as holders of their See. Sancroft, himself bound to offer all legal aid, remained in his palace at Lambeth, which many who had taken the oath shared, that the schism might be avoided, and the Government had that the oath might yet be taken. rigid in their Anglicanism. In 1717 began the division on "Usages." The principal of these were those connected with the Eucharist, i.e. the mixed cup and the other uses of King Edward VI.'s First Book; the others, not so connected, as Trine Immersion at Baptism, were also all found in the book of 1549. These Collier and Brett, with Campbell and Gadderar, the Scotch bishops, wished to see restored. Howes, Spinckes, and Gandy, were for retaining the Anglican book of 1662. Much was written on both sides, and Collier published in 1718 Offices of Holy Communion, Baptism, Confirmation, and Visitation, which differed little from those of King Edward. This division also led to a further division, in that the "Non-Usagers" refused to join any longer in negotiations for a union with the Greek Church, which had already been begun, but fell through on the death, Feb. 8th, 1725, of Peter the Great of Russia. The divisions, however, on the Usages outlasted Collier's life. He died, April 26th, 1726, and was buried in St. Pancras Churchyard.

Before his death, fresh bishops had been consecrated by both parties (the Non-Usagers again obtaining the help of Scotch bishops); but afterwards, about 1730, the disputes subsided, and all the bishops joined in communion except one, John Blackburn, consecrated 1712, who still firmly adhered to the Anglican book. He, however, made no attempt to continue his own succession, and died 1741. In "the '45" none of the regular Nonjurors appear to have been involved; but some of the separatists, those who were in favour of the views of Collier and Brett, joined the rebels, and died as traitors. One of the separatists named Campbell desperately endeavoured to carry on the succession of his party. He was the last bishop left, and in defiance of canonical rule he alone consecrated a new bishop. Thus the line went on, the last being consecrated in 1795. One of these bishops, Cartwright, ended his life as a surgeon, practising at Shrewsbury, a legal subject of King George. The last of the bishops, Booth, died in 1805; but a Nonjuring clergyman was living in the West of England in 1815. They lingered there longer than in any part of England. Many of those who would not take the oaths were content to receive the Communion in the National Church as private individuals, and it is said that many purchased Church Prayer Books printed before the Revolution in order that they might ignore the reigning sovereign.

Many historians who differ from the Nonjurors altogether in their view, have yet acknowledged that they rendered important services to the religion and literature of the country. A Latitudinarian spirit came in with the Revolution, and many good men were strongly influenced by it. Against this the Nonjurors made a stand, and preserved the spirituality of the Church, which might otherwise have sunk into a mere State-establishment. Their example of conscientiousness, sacrificing station, influence, and worldly substance, was a lesson of self-sacrifice such as society is ever the richer for. Some of them wrote valuable books. Hicks, Williams, Law, Nelson, Charles Leslie, Jeremy Collier, are all honoured names in the great roll of English authors.

Non-Residence.—The absence of an incumbent from his parish or benefice for any length of time, while a substitute is entrusted with the discharge of his duties. At one time non-residence was very general in England, in consequence of the holding of pluralities, but it was forbidden by statutes passed in 1837-8. Under ordinary circumstances no incumbent may be absent from his benefice more than three months at a time, under penalty of losing part of his income. Exemption from this rule may be granted by the bishop of the diocese in cases of pluralities or pecuniary, and severe illness, for at most twenty years, has been held a valid excuse for non-residence.

Norbert, St., Archbishop of Magdeburg and founder of the Premonstratensian Order, was born at Xanten, in the Duchy of Cleves, 1080. His father, Heribert, Count of Gennep, was related to the Emperor Henry V., and his mother, Hedwig, was descended from the House of Lorraine. He spent some time at the Court of Frederick, Archbishop of Cologne, and then with the Emperor, Henry IV. He was a Prebendary of the Church of Xanten and Almoner to Henry IV., who offered him the Archbishopric of Cambray, but he refused, fearing that the higher orders would prove a restraint to him, for he gave way to all his passions and led a very dissolute life. This continued till he was thirty years old. One day he was riding, when he was suddenly overtaken by a thunderstorm, and a ball of fire fell at his horse's feet, which, in its terror, threw its rider. Norbert lay unconscious for some time, and on his recovery determined to give up his wicked life, and to work as a priest and missionary. He spent some time in preparation, and in 1118 sold his estate, which he gave to the poor, and resigned his preferments. He set out for Languedoc, where Pope Gelasius II. was at the time, from whom he gained permission to preach wherever he thought proper. He passed through all the northern provinces of France, preaching and imposing severe penances. His eloquence did much, but his example effected more. He fasted all through the year, eating only in the evening, except on Sundays. In 1119 Pope Calixtus II., who had succeeded Gelasius, held a Council at Rheims, at which Norbert was present and obtained a fresh grant. He here became acquainted with Bartholomew, Bishop of Leon, who prevailed upon the saint to accompany him to his diocese, and put him in possession of St. Martin's Church. Norbert was to reform the regular canons; but this was too strict for them, and he was appointed. The Bishop then, as Norbert wished for a solitary life, to give him any place he might desire, it is said that the Virgin Mary appeared to Norbert in a dream, pointed out a valley in the Forest of Courcy, and the name of Prémontré, and the dress which he was to adopt. Here and formed from the followers gathered round him the Order of the Strata, under the rule of St. Augustin. The order soon spread all over Europe. Norbert was called to Antwerp, of St. Michael's, in that city, and his life, which Tanchelm, a heretic, thus accounted by asserting that the whole was idle fiction, and that the Eastern service to salvation. He died in 1134, who, even after his death, in 1114, led the whole country with their tents. The monks of Antwerp applied for aid to the Bishop of Cambray, who implored St. Norbert to their assistance. He brought with him, and the clergy settled the church and revenues upon them, which gift was confirmed. After putting matters in good order, he turned to his first settlement, where the revenues had increased so much that in 1136 ten houses besides the original house were built. In 1127 as Norbert was passing through Germany, the Archbishop of Magdeburg died, and the saint was chosen to succeed him and was consecrated, though against his own wishes. He brought with him the forms, restored the revenues of the church which had been usurped by the secular clergy, and persuaded the clergy to reform. It is said that one of the clergy hired an assassin to murder the saint, but he was caught on Maundy Thursday. Norbert, knowing of the design, ordered a man to be searched, and the assassin was found upon him. After about ten years of patience and courage overcame his enemies, and he was allowed to regulate his life in peace. He still gave up some of his revenues to the Order, and also interested himself in the affairs of the Church. He died in 1134. Peter Leon, the Anti-Pope, was present at the Council of Rheims in 1131. St. Norbert died June 6th, 1134, and was canonised by Pope Gregory XII. At his death there were 1,200 monks in his community.

North Side.—The rubric directs the Communion Service to begin the Service at the east end of the Lord's Table. It is a matter of dispute whether by this is intended that the altar should be on the north side of the front, s, or at the north end, looking south. legal judgment left the matter to the discretion. [EASTWARD POSITION.]

rich, SEE OF.—This ancient See of Elmham has not taken so eminent a place, ally, as some of the others, owing to its situation, but it has many features of interest. It owes its foundation to Pope Honorius, who sent "Felix the Irishman" to be its first bishop at Dunwich.] On the resignation of the first bishop of the See, Bisi, Archdeacon Theodore established a second See at Herfast for the "North folk;" but the Danish invasion swept the board for a time. In the middle of the tenth century the bishopric of Elmham was restored. In 1075 it was transferred, to Herfast, to the stately minster town, then the second town in East Angles and possessing ten churches. In 1091 Abbot of Ramsey, in Cambridgeshire, obtained the See from Rufus by means which approached indeed to simony. Very miserable as he afterwards, he made his way to Rome to ask for absolution, in spite of a storm of wrath from the King. He was absolved and reinstated him on the See, and of his founding certain churches. He then removed the See in 1094 to Thetford "to the rich and populous town" and began the beautiful cathedral, to be a monastic institution on the model of Canterbury. It was dedicated in 1109, in the name of the Holy Trinity. Several other churches in his diocese, among them that at Yarmouth, which has since been added into the largest parish church in the diocese. He also established Cluniac the ex-cathedral of Thetford, and in Ely Abbey three years before it was made a cathedral at the translation of the body of St. Etheldreda. The cathedral nave added to its present length by his successor, again, deserves the name of the only bishop in England who had the courage to stand by Becket in his trial with the King. Glancing down the list of bishops, we note John of Oxford, a time-servant of Henry II.; John de Grey, a servile tool of King John, but whose episcopate lived the good name of Abbot of Bury, immortalised by his Past and Present; Pandulph, before whom England was abased by the wicked King John; Walter Calthorp, Bishop of Norwich whose saintly life was his chief characteristic," such as to the poor that he even sold his lands to feed them, the builder of the church of St. Giles, and beautifier of the church of Bateman, in whose episcopate the Black Death destroyed no less than 100,000 inhabitants in that one diocese; Nix, under whom Bilney, the Lollard, was burned, and under whom also the suppression of the monasteries began; Thirlby, under whom Kett's rebellion took place; Hopton, under whom nine Protestants were burned at Norwich; Parkhurst and Scambler, two disgraces to their office for their greed of money; Hall, in whose days the Puritan outrages were wrought upon the glorious cathedral; Reynolds, the author of the General Thanksgiving, loved by his people for his unbounded charity during the Great Plague; Bathurst, who lived till the age of ninety, and neglected his diocese shamefully; Stanley, who revived religious feeling when it was almost dead. We ought to mention Dean Prideaux, a good author and vigorous dean, who saw seven bishops of Norwich during his incumbency.

Notaries of Rome, since called Proto-notaries.—The office of notaries was instituted by St. Clement during the persecutions of the primitive Church, and seven were appointed to keep an account in writing of the imprisonment and death of the martyrs, each having charge of two wards of the city. St. Fabian appointed seven sub-deacons, whom he entrusted with the duty of seeing that the notaries carried out their work of preserving the records which they made. By this means histories of the martyrdom of St. Andrew, St. Polycarp, and many others were preserved, and the earliest collections of the lives of the saints were derived from these sources.

Nourry, NICHOLAS LE, was born at Dieppe in 1647, and eighteen years after became a Benedictine of the Congregation of St. Maur, where he devoted himself to literary work. He came from Rouen to Paris, where he assisted James de Friches in editing St. Ambrose's works, and he also worked with Bellaine and Duchesne. His most noted work is the Apparatus ad Bibliothecam Maximam, criticism of the lives, writings, and opinions of the authors in the Bibliotheca Patrum at Lyons. In 1710 he published Lucius Caelius de Mortibus Persecutorum, which he states is not, as was supposed, the work of Lactantius, and gives his reasons for that opinion. Nourry died at St. Germain-des-Prés in 1724.

Novalis.—The name assumed by Friedrich von Hardenberg, who was born at Wiedestadt, in Mansfeld, in 1772. His father and mother belonged to the Herrnhuters. He was educated at Jena, whence he passed to Leipzig and Wittenberg. He assisted his father for a time as auditor of the Saxon Saltworks, but was obliged to give up his post through ill-health, and devoted himself wholly to literature. He became acquainted with Schlegel and with Tieck, the Romantic writer, who wrote a biography of Novalis, and who seems to have had a great influence over him. He died in 1801.

Novalis's best works are his Spiritual Songs, which show a beautiful simplicity and pure spirit of devotion. His other works, Heinrich von Ofterdingen, The Pupils at Saas, and Hymns of the Night, are remarkable for the imagination and enthusiasm which they display.

Novatian, the founder of the Novatianist sect in the third century, was a man of learning and eloquence, but of ascetic tendency. Educated as a philosopher, he was baptised on a sick-bed, but omitted after his recovery to present himself to the bishop for the laying-on of hands. Notwithstanding this, and in the face of some opposition, he was ordained priest by Bishop Fabian of Rome, who wished to enlist his talents for the Church, and he acquired great influence at Rome. After the Decian persecution, a dispute arose as to the treatment of the lapsed. Novatian headed a party which maintained that the Church had no power to re-admit apostates, and that, by receiving such into communion, it would forfeit its Christian character. The lapsed, they said, must be left to the mercy of God. At the election of Cornelius, a man of milder views, as Fabian's successor, A.D. 251, Novatian, with his party, seceded from the Church, and three obscure bishops, obtained on false pretences, consecrated him to the See of Rome. Intimation of this consecration was sent to the great Churches, but these refused to acknowledge him, and many of his followers, alarmed at the schism, returned to orthodoxy. Nevertheless, the numbers of the sect increased, and the members swore, at the Novatus, sometimes called Novatian, was a priest of Carthage, and came noted for his malpractice and obedience to authority. In A.D. 195 he cited to appear before his Bishop, charged with ill-treating his wife, widows and orphans, appropriating of his church, allowing his father to starvation, and refusing even to bury but the outbreak of the Decian persecution saved him from punishment. After execution, Novatus allied himself with Irimus, a rich man for whom he received deacon's orders, and the two themselves to oppose Cyprian in every way, especially encouraging very views concerning the treatment of the lapsed. Visiting Rome, he joined the opposite of Novatian, and became as severe as the lapsed as he had formerly been lax, ~~as~~ it has been hinted, chiefly by his education to regular authority. Nowell, ALEXANDER, D.D., was divine of the reign of Queen Elizabeth. He was born at Road Hall in Lancashire, in 1567 or 1568, and died in London, Feb. 13th, 1602. He was near Manchester till he was thirteen, and entered Brasenose College, Oxford, became the intimate friend of Fox, a tyrologist, whose room he shared. He was made Bachelor of Arts in 1586, Master of Westminster School, and Canon of Westminster. Having embraced Lutheran doctrines, he was obliged to leave England on Queen Mary's accession.

word is derived by some as, "holy," but is probably nunna, "mother" (compare a familiar word used by ma). Women who seclude the world in religious com-vow of chastity, and spend yer and good works. Nuns early in the history of the Church, under the name of virgines Deo sacratæ, but they did not at first live together in convents; they remained at home, but were distinguished from the rest of their family by a peculiar dress, and the asceticism of their life. Seclusion began to be practised towards the end of the fourth century, but for some time the nuns still attended their parish church on Sundays and festivals, and were under the guidance of the parish priest. They received their rules from the bishop of the diocese. In the sixth century it became customary to have a church attached to each nunnery, which also had its own priest; by this means was secured absolute seclusion from the world. A mother-superior or abbess was placed at the head of the community.

Nuns of recent order in the Roman Church are generally under the jurisdiction of the bishop of the diocese, those of older foundation under that of regulars. A few are under a superior-general. They are allowed to take boarders to educate but under strict conditions. Their confessors are carefully selected, and in no case is a confessor allowed to hold office in the same establishment for more than three years. Nuns take their meals in one room, but each has her separate cell. There are a vast number of orders, but they are grouped under four principal classes—the followers of the rule of St. Basil (adopted by St. Teresa), of St. Austin (Ursulines and Dominicans), of St. Benedict (Fontevault, etc.), and St. Francis ("Poor Clares").

Nuptial Benediction.—Used by Jews and Christians after the marriage ceremony. It was pronounced by the Jews when the bride was brought home, by the chief of the ten elders, who were obliged by custom to be present. The custom is justified by the passage in the Book of Ruth where ten elders are said to have been present at the wedding of Boaz. In the Christian Churches marriages are consecrated by the benediction of the priest or minister, according to an injunction given by Tertullian in the first century. In early times marriages not followed by this benediction were declared to be illegal.

O

Oaths.—The custom of appealing to God to affirm the truth of statements, with an imprecation of His vengeance or a renunciation of His favour if they prove false, has been common to all nations. The Romans and Greeks used many forms of swearing, with ceremonies. The Jews at first used to swear by God only, but in later times they swore by Jerusalem, the Temple, the Altar, etc., and that it was against this that our Lord warns Christians, and not against swearing at all, appears from the fact that St. Paul calls

God to witness the truth of his affirmations several times. This view was taken by the early Christians, and in several passages in the Fathers and Councils it appears that swearing upon solemn occasions was held lawful. It then became a custom to lay their hands on the Gospels when they swore, and to conclude with "So help me, God, and the contents of this Book," to which in the Roman Church "all the saints" was sometimes added. These oaths were called corporal oaths. Others swore by some particular saint, relic, cross, or altar. In the Middle Ages an oath was frequently called a canonical purgation, to distinguish it from the other modes of declaring innocence, as duels, ordeals, etc. By the Council of Meaux the clergy were forbidden to take corporal oaths, it being held that all ought to trust their word.

Obeah.—The negroes of the West Indies practise a species of witchcraft, and the name Obeah-man, or Obeah-woman, is given to the persons who exercise this power. The derivation of the word is unknown.

Obedience.—The performance of the commands of a superior. Ecclesiastically, the word is used in somewhat different senses but all allied, as [1] the duty which all clergy owe to their immediate superiors in all things consistent with the law of God and the Church. [2] The submission which members of religious orders vow, on profession, to their own superiors and to the rules of the order. [3] A written command by which a superior of a religious order communicates some special order to a subject. [4] The term has also come to be used for a religious following or communion professing obedience to some head: e.g. the Roman obedience means the Church of Rome.

Obedience of Christ.—This is generally divided into active and passive. His active obedience implies what He did: His passive, what He suffered. Some divines distinguish between these, but the distinction is somewhat artificial. They refer our pardon to His passive, and our title to glory to His active obedience, but it cannot be clearly shown that there is such a thing as passive obedience; since it is clearly taught that our Lord's sufferings were an entirely voluntary obedience to the will of God. The Scriptures tell us much of the obedience of Christ, and show that it was voluntary [Ps. xl. 6], complete [1 Pet. ii. 22], wrought out in the stead of His people, and acceptable in the sight of God.

Oberammergau.—A village situated in the highlands of Bavaria, made famous by the Passion Play which is acted there every ten years. The following traditional account is given of its origin.—A plague broke out in the neighbourhood in 1633, which, in spite of all the efforts of the villagers, was introduced into Ammergau by a peasant, Caspar Schnuchle, who working at Eschelobe, one of the stricken villages, and wished to a family. In a day or two he within a month eighty-four persons perished. Then the villagers vowed that if God would take pestilence they would perform the Play every tenth year. From then one died of the plague. The play performed in 1834, and has been every tenth year since 1882. Tradition, but the play is of much. They now speak of it as something well known, and it is only the act tenth year that is new. The oldest of the play bears the date 1682, in a still older book. Since the the play has undergone many changes. There are five distinct places for the players:—The proscenium, for processions, etc.; the central stage, for tableaux vivants and the usual dramatic scenes; the palace of Pilate, the palace of the streets of Jerusalem. Attempts to introduce it in 1881-82 clearly show.

JOHN FREDERIC, Protestant minister of holiness and benevolence; Strassburg, Aug. 31st, 1767, inclined towards the military. His father's desire he pursued at Strassburg University, and in 1760. He was Tutor in the University of Göttingen till 1767, when he was called as Pastor of Ban-de-la-Weine, in Alsace, where he remained nine years. This valley, almost entirely inhabited by a people laid waste in the Thirty Years' War by Louis XIV. The minister, and the people almost averse to any improvement. Oberlin first went there in 1770, in danger. He set to work to improve their condition, both physically and morally. He helped them to make a better use of their land, and introduced manufactures, as straw-plaiting, etc. He also built many new schools. During the French Revolution his district was left unoccupied by his well-known character. He was able to give shelter to many persons. It is said that under his ministrations he received the Legion of Honour from Louis XVIII., and a gold medal and Central Agricultural Society. He was the first to found the London Bible Society. 1826.

Oblates.—A name given to several congregations, so-called because they “offer” themselves to God. The chief societies of Oblates are :—

Oblates of the Blessed Virgin and St. Ambrose.—A congregation of secular priests founded by St. Carlo Borromeo at Milan in 1578. There is a house of this Congregation at Bayswater, with branches in several other parts of London.

Oblates of St. Frances at Rome.—A community of women established in 1433.

Oblates of Italy.—A society of secular priests founded at Turin in 1816.

Oblates of Mary Immaculate.—An association of priests founded at Marseilles by Charles de Mazenod, the Bishop, in 1815. Several of their priests are employed in foreign missions. There are eight houses in England.

The name “oblates” was also given during the Middle Ages to secular persons who offered themselves and their property to some monastery, to which they were admitted as a kind of lay brothers. They wore a religious habit, but different from that of the monks.

Oblations.—By special usage this word signifies the bread and wine offered upon the altar for consecration at the Holy Eucharist, these being distinguished from the alms of the poor and other devotions of the people in the phrase, “alms and oblations.” It was an old custom for all communicants who could afford it to offer bread and wine, and sometimes other things, at the altar; out of which what was required was taken for the Eucharist, and the rest for a common meal. None were permitted to make these offerings but those who were also admissible as communicants; the offerings of the oppressors of the poor, of those living at variance, of idol makers and of abettors of heretics, even though they might be emperors, were sternly rejected. Oil for the lamps and incense—the first-fruits of grapes and corn—milk and honey for the newly baptised, were also offered at the altar, but always under conditions distinguishing them from the oblation of bread and wine.

From the oblation invariably accompanying the celebration of the Communion, the word was frequently used to denote the service of the Eucharist; as, e.g. in the phrases—“oblations for the dead,” “oblations for martyrs,” denoting the celebration of this sacrament at funerals or on the anniversaries of the day of death.

Occam or Ockham, WILLIAM OF.—One of the great Schoolmen, called Doctor singularis et invincibilis [b. at Ockham, Surrey, about 1270, d. at Munich, April 7th, 1347]. He was educated at Merton College, Oxford, but, having joined the Order of the Franciscans, went to France to study under Duns Scotus. He afterwards opposed the Realism of his teacher, and formed a sect of Occamists among his followers, holding the doctrine of Nominalism, of which he became the most vigorous and logical advocate. [NOMINALISTS.] He constituted himself defendant of Philippe le Bel of France when the latter was excommunicated by Pope Boniface VIII.; and some years later he attacked Pope John XXII., who had condemned one Berenger Talon for saying that ecclesiastical possessions were unlawful and contrary to the example of Christ and His disciples. For this William of Occam was imprisoned at Avignon, but escaped with one of his companions to the Mediterranean, and thence to Munich, where he spent the remainder of his life. He ranked high among the Schoolmen as a logician, and was engaged throughout his life in continual ecclesiastical controversies. Among his works may be mentioned Disputatio inter Clericum et Militem, Expositio aurea (containing a summary of his Nominalist views), Devisiones Octo Questionum de Potestate summi Pontificis (based on the Sententie of Peter the Lombard), and many other controversial works.

Occasional Prayers and Thanksgivings.—Those which are appointed to be read on special occasions. There were special prayers placed at the end of the mediæval litanies, and also special masses for fine weather, rain, plague, etc.; but those in our Prayer Book are mostly original. The prayers for rain and fine weather were inserted in 1549 at the end of the Communion Service; but, with those for "In the Time of Dearth and Famine," "of War and Tumults," and "of any Common Plague," were placed at the end of the Litany in 1552. All the thanksgivings, with the exception of that for peace at home and the "General Thanksgiving," were written in 1604. These, with the prayers for Parliament and for all conditions of men, were added in 1662, and they were all then placed in their present position.

Ochino Bernardino.—An Italian Reformer who was born at Siena in 1487. He became a Franciscan, and afterwards a Capuchin, and was much famed for his preaching, which was very earnest and eloquent. He went to Naples, where he became acquainted with Juan Valdes and Peter Martyr. In 1538 he was elected General of his Order. In 1540 he was accused of heresy, for preaching upon justification without referring to indulgences, etc. He was afterwards summoned to Rome, but escaped to Geneva, where he preached to the Italian Protestants. He was at first strongly Calvinistic, but later adopted Socinian views. In 1547 his liberty was threatened, but he escaped to England, where he remained till the accession of Queen Mary obliged him to leave and go to Zurich. Here he wrote several of his books:—On the Lord's Supper; a catechism on the work of the Messiah and the etc., which contained decidedly unorthodox views, and he was banished. He Cracow, but in 1564 had to leave on account of the decree banishing all foreigners who were not Catholics from Poland, and on the way to Germany. He has been regarded by some as the founder of Arianism. He wrote a work on which is considered to favour paganism against which Beza directed his Th. Polygenia.

Among Ochino's other works are volumes of Italian sermons written first sent to Geneva; a book published in London on the usurped primacy of the Pope of Rome; and Italian commentaries on the Epistles of Paul to the Romans and Galatians.

Octaves.—The octave is the eighth day after any principal festival of the Church. The custom of keeping octaves was borrowed from the Jews, and in former times eight days were observed. The special services for Christmas, Easter and Ascension Day are appointed to be read seven days after, and that for Whitsuntide six, as Whitsunday falls on the seventh day and has the preface of its own. The first two days of octaves of Easter and Whitsunday have special services, and it seems from the Liturgical, published in 1714, that in the church of St. Dunstan in the West the Communion was administered daily on the octaves of the three great festivals. The days of octaves in the Roman Church (there are many more than in the Anglican) are kept most strictly, and, as some other feasts are allowed to be kept within an octave. In the Anglican Church the octave of the dedication of a church is frequently kept. The octave of Easter is commonly called Low Sunday (q.v.).

Odenheimer, William Henry (b. 1879), Bishop of New Jersey, U.S.A. learned divine of the American Episcopal Church, and one of the most distinguished preachers. His sermons have been heard in England as well as in his own country; he won much love from Churchmen on his visits to the Lambeth Conference by his sunny and genial manner.

Odo, surnamed "the Severe," Archbishop of Canterbury, was born in East Angles in the ninth century, of Danish parents, who were Pagans. They gave Odo a liberal education and allowed him to mix with the Christians and be present at their instructions, without any fear that he might embrace their faith. His father, on finding that the boy pressed with the truths of Christianity, him to hold any further intercourse with Christians; but Odo had the courage to persevere, and was disinherited by his

his, he entered the service of a Christian, named Aldhelm, belonging to the court of Edward the Elder, who was so much with Odo's natural gifts that he had taught Latin and Greek, and when sufficiently instructed in the doctrines of Christianity, he was baptised, and soon after took holy orders, being made a Sub-deacon, and then a Priest, so well that he received Priest's orders before the age prescribed by the canons. He was employed at Court and became Confessor to King Aldhelm, who took him with him on his journey to Rome, and on his death he remained still at Court, till, in 924, he was summoned by Athelstan, who had succeeded Edgar, to the bishopric of Sherborne. It is said that Odo served in a campaign under Athelstan before taking holy orders, and after consecration he took the field with Athelstan against the Danes headed by Godwin and did good service in gaining the victory. Dean Milman says of him, "In him we see the conquering Dane and the stern warrior combined with the imperious Churchman." He was made Archbishop of Canterbury by King Edgar, on the death of Wulfhelm, and he maintained the dignity of the primacy as none of his predecessors had done, and induced Edmund to enact several laws for the security of religion and maintenance of ecclesiastical discipline in the kingdom. During the reign of Edred there was a great dispute between Odo and Eadwig concerning the Real Presence of the Body and Blood of Christ in the Eucharist—a question which the Archbishop is said to have decided by means of a miracle. It was at the suggestion of Odo that Dunstan committed the king to the royal authority at the death of King Edwy. It is certain that Odo made Edwy separate from Elgiva, and there is no proof that he was the author of the cruelties afterwards practised on her. He died the same year. He did much for the enlargement and improvement of the church of St. Augustine at Canter-

Lampadius, JOANNES [a translation of the German name Johann Hausschein].—A German of Germany who united with Zwingli in his work for the Reformation of Switzerland. He was born at Weinsberg, 1482, and died at the end of 1531, at Basel. He was intended for the profession of a lawyer, and studied law at Heidelberg and Bologna. Returning to Heidelberg he took up the study of theology, to perfect himself in which he held some advantageous posts which he held as tutor to the sons of the Elector of the Palatinate and preacher at Weinsberg. In 1515 he was induced by Capito, afterwards the minister of Strassburg, to become Preacher at Basel, and here he assisted Erasmus in the composition of his Annotations on the New Testament, of which Oecolampadius published the second edition. In 1516

he became Preacher of Augsburg, but after a short chaplaincy to Franz von Sickingen he returned to Basel in 1522, and his chief work was carried out between this year and that of his death. He supported Zwingli at the Marburg Conference in the dispute with Luther concerning the Eucharist, having previously published a treatise in 1525 setting forth his opinions in the matter. He was also employed to carry on disputes with Roman Catholics on theology. In preaching at Basel he had denounced the fallacies of many doctrines of the Roman Church, and had thereby made himself hated by Roman Catholics; he also held controversies with the Anabaptists. His chief works were commentaries on the Bible, and treatises De Ritu Paschali and Quod non sit onerosa Christianis Confessio. His views on the Eucharist were modified in later years. At one time he did not rise above the "memorial" view, but he afterwards emphatically declared the Sacrament a means of grace.

Oeconomi.—Stewards of church revenues, chosen by the clergy of each diocese out of their own number. Originally the distribution of the income of the Church, both among the clergy and among the poor, was entrusted to the bishop, who commonly associated his archdeacon with him in the work. But, as time went on, not only did the revenues of the Church increase, but also the number of converts, and with them came further demands upon the bishop's time, and more frequent calls for the discharge of the spiritual functions of his office. It was, consequently, deemed convenient to relieve him of the care of diocesan revenue by the appointment of the oekonomi.

Oecumenical Council [Gr. oikoumene, "the world"].—One gathered from all parts of the Church; as distinguished, therefore, from a diocesan or provincial synod. [COUNCILS.]

Oehler, GUSTAV FRIEDRICH.—An eminent German theologian of the orthodox school of Delitzsch [b. 1812, d. 1872]. A translation of his Theology of the Old Testament is published by Messrs. Clark, of Edinburgh, in 2 vols., and is valuable both for its depth of piety and also for its good Hebrew scholarship.

Oetinger, FRIEDRICH CHRISTOPHER [b. 1702, d. 1782].—A German theological writer of the Mystical school. His position in German theology is analogous to that of the Hutchinsonians with respect to the English Deists. He endeavoured to meet the Rationalism and Materialism of his country by philological investigations, by means of which he constructed a system of philosophy which was to unite subject and object, matter and spirit, in the living Christ. Much of his doctrine was derived from Swedenborg. His writings were voluminous and not without effect.

The PIETISTS [q.v.] set a large value upon them on account of the careful spirit of investigation and industry which they display. For though his mind was inclined to everything fanciful and mysterious, yet he was learned, and, moreover, practical and full of good sense; above all, he was earnest and pious, and the people of Berlin recognised in him a genuine desire to give the mysteries of God a bearing on their daily life.

Offertorium.—A book containing the offertory sentences sung at Holy Communion.

Offertory.—[1] The sentences said by the priest during the Communion while the offerings of the people are being collected. They all speak of the necessity of supporting the Church and relieving the poor. The custom of making oblations at the Communion is Apostolic [1 Cor. xvi. 2], and is referred to by Justin Martyr and Tertullian, thereby proving that it was in use in the second century. The offertory sentences were sung in the choir before the Reformation. Chaucer's Pardoner was especially successful in singing an offertory ("Prologue"), and in Marbecke's Prayer Book with music the offertory sentences are set to varied music. But the rubric as it stands in the Prayer Book directs that the sentences are to be said by the priest. In some churches the attempt is made to combine this old custom with the rubric by the priest first saying the sentence, and being followed by the choir responding it musically. [2] The oblation of bread and wine placed upon the Lord's Table along with the offerings made by the congregation. The rubric of the Prayer Book directs "When there is a Communion the Priest shall then place upon the Table so much Bread and Wine as he shall think sufficient." The doctrine of the Roman Church is thus expressed by Bossuet: "The Church does really offer bread and wine, but not absolutely and in themselves; for in the New Covenant no oblation is made of lifeless things: indeed no oblation is made other than Jesus Christ; wherefore the bread and wine are offered that He may make them His Body and Blood" [Explication des Prières de la Messe]. All the ancient Liturgies contain an oblation of the bread and wine [see Hammond's Ancient Liturgies. Clarendon Press], but the five prayers in the Roman Missal are of recent date. [OBLATIONS.]

Office.—The term in its ecclesiastical sense is applied to a devotional form of service not in the Prayer Book. Such as, for example, that used at the consecration of a church.

Office, CONGREGATION OF THE HOLY.—That department of the Papal Government which is charged with the government of the INQUISITION [q.v.].

Officers Ecclesiastical.—The term sometimes applied to the three orders of ministers in the Anglican Church—bishops, priests, and deacons. And as officers under authority, so we are taught derive their authority direct from Himself. It is sometimes applied in a superior sense to those who handle the affairs of the Church—such as church

Oil.—It is certain that blessing for holy uses is very ancient. St [Epistle 70, edit. Pamel] says this was used in the solemn administration of baptism. It was blessed on the same day which the Eucharist was consecrated. Basil the Great, in his Treatise of Spirit, c. 27, speaks of the blessing of the baptismal water as a practice established in the Apostolical times; Optatus of Milevis [67 "Of Schism"], that the oil consecrated in the church in the name of Christ was for that reason called chrism. In the four first centuries, it appears that this solemnity was not fixed to any particular day; and the Council of Toledo, in the canon already quoted, expressly says the bishops might perform it when they pleased; adding that each particular church in the diocese was to send a deacon or sub-deacon to the bishop for what they were to use at the approaching festival, i.e. at the solemn administration of baptism on Easter Eve. But the present practice of the Roman Church is to bless the holy oils once a year, and that on Maundy Thursday. The oils are immediately distributed to the pastors and used till the return of the same year.

The consecration of the holy oils consists in three solemn consecrations or formal dictions: the first was that of the Oil for the sick, employed in the sacrament of Extreme Unction; the second, of the chrism, used after baptism, confirmation, at the consecration of churches, and kings; the third, of the Oil of the Catechumens, so called because employed on the candidates for baptism before they were brought to the sacred font, which is also used at the coronation of sovereign princes on other occasions. This has been always considered as an episcopal function, and the Council of Toledo, in 400, Can. xx., expressly enjoined the priests to perform this ceremony, as peculiar to the bishops. [ANONIMO.]

Olaf, St., or Olaf Haraldson, the most noted of the early Norwegian kings, was born in 995. He was descended from the ancient royal line, but was educated in exile as a Christian. He was one of the first to bring Christianity to the North, and made his name feared throughout the coasts of Norway and Sweden by his fierce resistance to Canute. In 1015 he returned home, and, making good his claim, won the crown from the hands of Eric and Jarl. He at once turned his attention to evangelising his country, and gathered together a band of followers, put an end to the rule of the Swedes and Danes in Norway, and became overking. Olaf then, accompanied by another Sigurd, went against a powerful chief Gudbrand, who hearing of his arrival faith. They repaired to Breeden, Olaf and Sigurd were busy establishing and a battle was fought in which Olaf's son was taken prisoner by Olaf.

Olaf then decided to summon a Thing to determine whether there was any truth in the story, and having by chosen signs determined that Thor was powerless to defend his son, Gudbrand was forced to acknowledge the Christian God, and forthwith he and his present were baptised; Olaf sent them back to their country, and Gudbrand himself built a church. These scenes were constantly enacted in different parts, and Olaf even extended his rule to Greenland, the Orkney Islands, and Iceland. He set a good example to his subjects by his own observance of the ordinances of the Church, going every morning to hear mass and then to the Thing to decide all matters of religion, together with Bishop and other learned clergy. But when met with opposition the means used were so cruel that many fled to Canute.
In 1028 the Danish King entered Denmark with a large army, most of Olaf's people fled before him, and he fled to Russia, where he died. He was buried with an army of 4,000 men, which he returned; but was slain at Sigtuna on July 29th, 1030. Soon, however, a reaction set in, partly because the people were tired of their ruler, Canute's son, and also because it was said that miracles were performed at the place where Olaf had been buried, so the people assembled in 1031 and Olaf was buried with great state in the Uppsala Cathedral. The fame of the king reached far and wide, pilgrims came from all parts of Scandinavia, and a book, written in the twelfth century, on his death and miracles, served to increase his fame. He is considered a saint, and though he was not canonised in the usual way, Rome never denied his saintship, and he became the patron saint of Norway. In 1847 the order of Olaf was created by King Oscar I. of Sweden and Norway.

Old Catholics.—The Old Catholic movement arose out of the dissatisfaction caused by the decrees of the Vatican Council of 1870.
Symptoms of dissatisfaction and a desire for reforms had appeared from time to time within the Church of Rome, but had been sternly repressed by the ruling powers. This dissatisfaction, however, developed into open rebellion when it was sought to enforce submission to the dogma of Papal Infallibility.
The opposition to this dogma was specially strong throughout Germany, where over forty University professors, headed by Dr. Döllinger, the learned Professor of Theology at Munich,
and Professor Friedrich, issued a joint declaration against it. In April, 1871, Professors Döllinger and Friedrich were excommunicated by the Archbishop of Munich for their refusal to submit. Dr. Döllinger's answer was "As a Christian, as a theologian, as an historian,
as a citizen, I cannot accept this doctrine."
In September, 1871, the first congress of the Old Catholics was held at Munich, when the decrees were again denounced, and arrangements were made to organise congregations throughout Germany and Switzerland. They took the name of Old Catholics, to signify that they held fast to the Catholic faith as it had been handed down from the earliest Christian times, before it had been corrupted by the new doctrines imposed by the Papal power.
At starting, the movement met with enthusiastic support, and its prospects seemed most encouraging. It became necessary to provide an episcopate, and this was obtained from the Old Catholic, or Jansenist Church of Holland. On Aug. 11th, 1873, Dr. Joseph Hubert Reinkens was consecrated by the Bishop of Deventer as the first Old Catholic Bishop for Germany. Dr. Reinkens had been suspended from his Professorship at Nuremberg, and subsequently excommunicated for his opposition to Papal Infallibility. The movement was now organised as an independent branch of the Church. Difficulties of a serious character began to arise when the work of revising the service books was taken in hand. Many were very jealous of any material changes being made, others were anxious for a very thorough revision. The result was that many adherents reverted to the Church of Rome.
The chief alterations adopted were—the translation of the Mass into the language of the country, the omission of the Invocation of Saints, and a great reduction in the number of saints' days. In order to strengthen the position of the Old Catholics in their opposition to Rome, Dr. Döllinger arranged Reunion Conferences to be held at Bonn in 1874 and 1875. Divines from Germany, Switzerland,

France, Denmark, Russia, Greece, England, and America attended. Among those who came from England were Dr. Harold Browne, Bishop of Winchester; Canon Liddon, of St. Paul's; and Dean Howson, of Chester. From America came, among others, the Bishop of Pittsburgh, and Dr. Nevin, American Chaplain at Rome. The questions which divided these branches of the Church were discussed, and formulæ of agreement were adopted by the Conference. These formulæ, however, were not received with favour either by the Eastern Church or by the Church of England. Dr. Pusey, in particular, expressed his disapproval of them. The question, however, which caused the greatest trouble to the Old Catholic community was the celibacy of the clergy; great differences of opinion prevailed on the subject. Finally, at a Synod held in 1878 at Bonn, it was decreed that the Old Catholic clergy were free to marry. This was followed immediately by the withdrawal from active co-operation of the greater part of the leaders, including Dr. Döllinger himself. Bishop Reinkens, although he disapproved of the decree, still retained his post as bishop. A great reduction also took place in the number of adherents, several congregations resigning in a body. The Old Catholics in Bavaria cut themselves off from all communion with the Church under the rule of Bishop Reinkens. In the last few years some of the lost ground has been regained, but the numbers on the whole remain very nearly stationary. At the present time there are computed to be about 70,000 in Germany and 80,000 in Switzerland. In Baden greater progress has been made than in other parts of Germany; thus, in 1873 there were 2,286 heads of households who registered themselves as Old Catholics, and in 1884 there were 7,118. In addition to these there are doubtless many adherents who have not ventured to risk persecution from Ultramontanes by openly registering themselves as Old Catholics. The Government, too, is by no means friendly to the community.

In Switzerland the first meeting of Old Catholics was held at Solothurn in 1871; but it was not till 1876 that Dr. Herzog was consecrated as their first Bishop by Bishop Reinkens. At the outset rapid progress was made; but, among other causes, the question of clerical celibacy caused the loss of "thousands," as Bishop Herzog testifies. There was less difficulty, however, in revising the ritual and services of the Church here than in Germany. A yearly synod of clergy and laity has been established, and in the University at Berne an Old Catholic Faculty of Theology was instituted in 1874.

Old Catholicism has established itself in every Roman Catholic country except Belgium, but at present only to a small extent. Thus the movement, although not answering the expectations that were first formed of it, yet has surmounted its early difficulties and steadily maintains itself.

Oldcastle, Sir John, more known as Lord Cobham, which assumed on his marriage with the heiress of that nobleman, was born close of the reign of Edward III. once an author, wit, warrior, and, although little or nothing is known of his early life, is supposed to have been the bosom friend and wild comrade of "Madcap Harry," afterwards King. Many believe that he is the Shakespeare. Be that as it may, he was very intimate with the young Prince of Wales, whatever his youthful excesses may have been, like his royal comrade he was reformed in later life.

In 1407, in conjunction with the Duke of Burgundy, he raised the siege of Rochester, having received the command as to his services to Henry IV. About 1410 he met with the writings of Wickliffe, and took a firm hold upon his intellect; he did not know how soon he declared his opinions; but after the death of Archbishop Salisbury, the leader of the Lollards, killed during a revolt against the King, a vacant place was offered to him as the greatest warrior of the day. He accepted it, and generously threw open his castle of Cobham in Kent, to this persecuted sect, who made it their base of operations. Henry IV., worn out by a turbulent reign, died without attempting to confront him; but his son, after trying to convert him to no purpose, was so irritated by his obstinacy that he gave him up to the clergy. The unfortunate noble was besieged in his own castle, and dragged off as a prisoner to the Tower. Before he died, however, he managed to escape to Westminster. Soon news was brought to the King that he had collected together twenty thousand men in St. Giles's Fields, and had formed a plan to destroy the royal family and most of the "spiritual and temporal lords." The report was probably false, for the King merely surprised a handful of men at a prayer meeting. Many of these were destroyed by the royal troops, while the others were tortured until they confessed a plot, and pointed out Oldcastle as the ringleader. The King, believing it, offered 1,000 marks upon his head, and offered a pardon to any borough which should betray him.

After escaping detection for four years, which were blackened by the execution of thirty-nine prominent Lollards, Oldcastle himself was at last captured in the year 1413. His old comrade had no mercy for him; after a mock trial, in which he refused to recant, he was suspended from a gallows by his chains, and there burnt by a slow fire beneath him, while a mob of jeering people surrounded him, to prevent any expression of sympathy.

[DIVINATION.] There are numerous instances in history of events looked on at the time as good or bad omens, not only amongst the Romans, but also in our own and other countries. Archbishop Laud was a believer in omens ; in the library of Lambeth Palace is preserved a piece of glass on which Laud wrote with a diamond recording the destruc- tion of a church by lightning, and speaking of it as a sad omen. The Rev. A. M. TOPLADY [q.v.], also a believer, thus writes :—" Though it be true that all omens are not worthy of observa- tion, and though they should never be so re- garded as to shock our fortitude, or diminish our confidence in God, still they are not to be constantly despised. Small incidents have sometimes been prelusive to great events, nor is there any superstition in noticing these apparent prognostications, though there may be much superstition in being either too in- discriminately or too deeply swayed by them."

Onderdonk, HENRY USTI [b. 1789, d. 1858].—An American bishop. He was edu- cated as a doctor, but afterwards went into the ministry, became Assistant Bishop of Penn- sylvania, and in 1827 succeeded Bishop White in the See. He was the author of Episcopacy Examined and Re-Examined, and of some hymns which he contributed to the Hymn- book of the Protestant Episcopal Church of America, of which he was one of the com- pilers.

Onkelos.—The author of the most cele- brated of the Targums, or Chaldee translations of the Old Testament. According to the Babylonian Talmud, he was contemporary with Gamaliel, and from the purity of his Chaldee, which greatly resembles that of Ezra and Daniel, may have been a native of Babylon. It was the first work of its kind, and keeps very closely to the original, except in the case of anthropomorphisms or anthro- popathies which might appear derogatory to God. This Targum has frequently been pub- lished, as in the Antwerp Polyglots, Buxtorf's Hebrew Bible, etc., but a critical edition has never been attempted.

Oosterzee, JAN YAKOB VAN.—One of the greatest theologians of his day, of the Dutch Evangelical School. He was born at Rotterdam in 1817. He studied at Utrecht, and became, in 1840, Pastor of Kemmes-Bin- nendijk, and four years after of Rotterdam. In 1862 he was called to Utrecht University, where he lectured first on theology and homi- letics, and afterwards on doctrinal history and the philosophy of religion. He died at Wies- baden in 1882. Oosterzee's Life of Christ, Christology, Theology of the New Testament, Dogmatics, Year of Salvation, Moses, and Practical Theology, have all been translated into English. He also contributed St. Luke, the Pastoral Epistles, and St. James to Lange's Commentaries.

Ophites.—An obscure sect, first heard of in Egypt in the second century. Origen denies that they were Christians, and although they professed to have received their philosophy from James, the brother of our Lord, their views were to the highest degree heretical. Their name [from ophis, "a serpent"] was given them on account of the honour they gave to the serpent who tempted Eve, and was therefore the cause, they argued, of the world's gaining a knowledge of good and evil. They maintained that Jesus and Christ were two distinct persons—Jesus, who was born of the Virgin Mary; Christ, the serpent, whose spirit was afterwards caused to descend upon Jesus. Their deity they named Jaldabaoth, who, after he had created man, was jealous of his perfection, so gave him a strict command, and then sent the serpent to persuade man to break it. Accounts of them and their extraordinarily profane creed are given in the writings of several early Christian writers, and in the code formed by the Emperor Justinian there are some laws against them. Another name for the sect is Serpentinians.

Optatus, St., Bishop of Milevum, lived in the fourth century. He was an African, and was brought up as a heathen, but was converted to Christianity, and became a noted champion of the Church. He was made Bishop of Milevum, in Numidia, and was one of the opposers of the Donatists, writing, about 370, six books against Parmenian, the Donatist Bishop of Carthage, to which Pope Siricius added a seventh in 385. Little is known of the life of St. Optatus, but he is mentioned in terms of high praise by St. Augustine, St. Jerome, and Fulgentius. His book was edited by Du Pin in 1700 with the different readings from several editions, notes, and a life of the author. The saint is supposed to have died subsequently to 384, and is commemorated in the Roman Martyrology on June 4th.

Optimism.—This theory, although it exists to a great extent in most books on Christian philosophy, was first designated by the name "optimism" to describe the teaching of Leibnitz in the eighteenth century. Its chief point is that the world as it is, is as good as it possibly can be, seeing that God is a perfect Being, and that therefore His creations must be to a certain extent perfect too. But there are difficulties in the way of this theory. If God wished the world and mankind to be absolutely perfect, why does He not make them so? This is a question which has been eagerly asked age after age, and no answer is forthcoming which settles it. Pope's Essay on Man sums up the Optimist theory in that famous line in the first book, "Whatever is is right;" but in the face of the sorrow and sin which we are compelled to witness, we feel that an epigram like Pope's does not settle the question. Epigrams take hold of the memory, but they do not convince. Physical suffering, indeed, can be shown in many cases to result in good, and to conduce to the general welfare of man, but the conscience pronounces sin essentially evil. The Scripture points to a true Optimism when it points to a world to come where there shall be "no more curse," and where God "shall wipe away all tears."

Option [from the Lat. optare, "to choose"] is the right enabling ecclesiastics to choose certain benefices. Thus, when any of the free prebends fall vacant, the prebendary next in age may, if he likes, take it by option instead of his own. Formerly an archbishop, after confirming a bishop, had the option of appointing an incumbent to the next benefice which fell vacant belonging to the See; which options were only binding on the bishops themselves who granted them, and not on their successors. The law was done away with by Sec. 42 of 3 and 4 Victoria, cap. 113.

Opus operatum ["the work wrought"]—A term used to denote the nature of the power of the Sacraments as opposed to Opus operantis ["the work of the worker"]. The latter expresses the doctrine of some extreme Protestants, that the Sacraments are used as signs of faith in obedience to our Lord's injunctions, and that they assist the mind in its approach to God, though the power of the work rests with the individual who makes use of the Sacrament. The Roman Catholic Church and the Church of England, on the other hand, hold that the Sacraments are the instruments through which God bestows His grace and power on the recipient, and that through them such grace is always bestowed, so long as there is faith and consent with God's will. The absence of faith is the only barrier, and only in so far as the recipient has this faith is there the question Opus operantis. The term was employed by the Council of Trent, and much used in the Middle Ages in controversy on this point.

Oracle, among the heathens, was the answer which the gods were supposed to give to those who consulted them upon any matter of importance. It is also used for the person who was thought to give the answer, and for the place where the answer was given. The origin of oracles is attributed to Egypt, where the principal oracles were those of Theban Jupiter, Hercules, Minerva, Diana, Apollo, and Mars, and especially of Leto. In Greece, the oldest oracle was that of Zeus at Dodona, but the most famous was that of Apollo at Delphi; there were many others, but of less repute. The responses of oracles were given in various ways: at Dodona they issued from an oak; at Delphi the priestess swears in hexameter verse; at the desert of Libya, the priests hem. In other places, the given in such ambiguous terms fitted of altogether contradictory; sometimes they came in the ter; and sometimes dice with letters engraved on them were lots, and these characters were read from an explanatory table. Oracles, etc., were also supposed to be the will of the gods. The Romans, although they believed in oracles, had none of their own, but usually consulted Greece.

They have been much divided as to these oracles; some suppose that the invention of priests, others conceive there was a supernatural agency in the business. There are several leading to the former hypothesis as the gloomy solemnity with which they were delivered in subterranean places, the numerous and disagreeable enjoined, as sleeping in the temples, and expensive sacrifices, the priests, speaking images, vocal oracles look very much like the contrived priests to disguise their villainy. On the other hand, if we may credit the accounts of ancient writers, both among

Christians, this hypothesis will not hold for many of the instances and since it cannot be proved probable or unscriptural, it seems at least that God might sometimes peruse with spirits, overruling, in every other circumstance to the cessation of these oracles, on a variety of opinions. It has been said that oracles ceased at the moment of the birth of Jesus Christ. History, however, mentions the publication of several laws by the Emperor Theodosius, Gratianian, to punish persons who consulted oracles, so that it would appear that oracles were occasionally consulted as late as A.D. 358; but about that time they entirely ceased, and for several centuries before they had sunk very low in the estimation of the people. Towards this there can be no doubt that the advancement of Christianity contributed.

Among the Jews there were several sorts of oracles, God's spoken words face to face with the prophets, such as that of the Urim and Thummim, sent to prophets in an extraordinary brightness made use of by the high priest, as in the case of Jehoiada. This manner of oracles of the Lord was often made use of from the time of the erection of the temple in Jerusalem. After that time they usually consulted the prophets, who were frequent in the kingdoms of Judah and Israel. After the death of Malachi they appear only to have expected immediate Divine direction through what was called the Bath Kol, or Daughter of the Voice, which was a supernatural manifestation of the will of God, either by a strong inspiration or internal voice, or else by a sensible and external voice, which was heard by a number of persons sufficient to bear testimony to it. Such was the voice heard at the baptism of Christ [Matt. iii. 17].

The Scripture gives us also examples of profane oracles. Balaam, at the instigation of his own spirit, and urged on by his avarice, suggests to Balak a diabolical expedient of making the Israelites fall into idolatry [Numb. xxiv. 14, xxxi. 16], by which he promises him a considerable advantage, if not victory, over the people of God. Micaiah, the son of Imlah [1 Kings xxii. 20, etc.], says that he saw the Almighty, sitting on His throne, with all the host of heaven round Him, and asking "Who shall tempt Ahab?" etc. Then Satan offers himself to be a lying spirit in the mouth of God's prophets, and God accepts his offer. The dialogue clearly proves two things: [1] That the devil could do nothing by his own power; [2] that with the permission of God, he could inspire the false prophets, sorcerers, and magicians, and make them deliver false oracles.

Orarium.—A stole worn in the Eastern Church by priests on both shoulders; by deacons, on the left only.

Orate, fratres, etc.—The opening words of the address said at the beginning of the Canon of the Mass after the "Lavabo." Originally the priest said merely "Orate" or "Orate pro me;" but the other words, "ut meum ac vestrum pariter sacrificium acceptum sit Domino," were added by Remi of Auxerre in 880.

Oratorio.—A sacred drama, sung by solo voices and choruses, and accompanied by an orchestra, but differing from the opera in not requiring scenery, stage-costumes, or action. This distinction was not always made in the case of the earliest oratorios, and most of those produced in Italy in the Middle Ages were performed in churches on stages erected for the purpose. The subjects of oratorios have been taken, almost without exception, from the Bible, and probably originated, like the old mystery plays, in an attempt to impress sacred events more strongly on the minds of the people. The first oratorios, in the present sense of the term, were held by Filippo de Neri [b. 1515, d. 1595], the founder of the Congregation of Oratorians, in the oratory of his church, and hence the name, "oratorio," was given. After his time the oratorio was developed in successive stages by Emilio del Cavaliere, Carissimi, Scarlatti, and Stradella; but the greatest step in its growth was in the works of Handel [b. 1685, d. 1759] and Bach [b. 1685, d. 1750], who changed its form from the Italian to the Anglo-Germanic. The chief difference between the treatment used by these two composers is that Bach's oratorios were still designed for use in churches, while those of Handel were somewhat secularised. With them the oratorio reached its highest standard, though in technical details it has been developed by Schütz and Sebastiani, and still more by Mendelssohn and Haydn.

Oratories.—Churches were so called as being houses of prayer, but the name is now applied only to private and domestic chapels in distinction to the parish church.

Oratory, PRIESTS OF THE.—There were formerly two religious Orders of this name—one in Italy, the other in France.

The Italian Order was founded by St. Philip Neri, under whose name will be found an account of the Order. [PHILIP NERI, St.] After Neri's death the congregation continued to increase in Italy, and has produced many eminent writers, as Baronius, Rainaldi, etc. It was introduced into England by Cardinal Newman in 1847. The first house was at Mary Vale, and was transferred to Alcester Street, Birmingham, in 1849. In 1850 a house was opened in London, which was released from obedience to Birmingham in October of that year, and was transferred to Brompton, where a large domed church has been erected. It is said to be the largest religious Order now in England.

The French Order was founded in 1613 upon the model of the preceding by Cardinal Bérault, a native of Champagne, who wished to deepen devotion and to revive the splendour of the ecclesiastical state. He assembled a community of ecclesiastics in the suburb of St. Jacques, and formed the Order, which consisted of two sorts of persons—incorporated and associates. The former governed the houses while the latter gave themselves to the life and manners of ecclesiastics. The fathers of this French Order did not, like those of the Italian Order, distinguish themselves by their researches in ecclesiastical history, but devoted themselves to all branches of training, both secular and sacred. They belonged to the secular clergy and did not keep the canonical hours. They received the name of Fathers of the Oratory because they had no churches in which the sacraments were administered, but only chapels or oratories in which they read prayers and preached. The Order was approved by Pope Paul V. in 1613 under the title of Congregation of the Oratory of our Lord Jesus Christ in France. The founder's favourite work was the institution of seminaries for the training of priests, of which, on his death in 1629, there were six. There were altogether fifty seminaries, colleges, and houses of retreat. At the beginning of the eighteenth century several members of the society were inclined to Jansenism; but in 1746, after a hard struggle, they accepted the Bull Unigenitus. The society was broken up at the Revolution by the Civil Constitution of the Clergy; but the Oratory of the Immaculate Conception, founded in Paris in 1852, adopted the ancient rule. Among famous Oratorians we may mention Lejeune, Malebranche, Thomassin, Massillon, Jean Morin, La Harpe, and Lami.

Ordeal.—The old English word [from Anglo-Saxon or, "out," and deal or deol, "judgment"] for the JUDICIUM DEI [q.v.].

Orders, HOLY.—The estates of bishops, priests, and deacons, conferred by the imposition of hands of lawfully ordained bishops, and termed "holy orders." These orders are designated "holy" in distinction to IRREGULAR or MINOR ORDERS [q.v.], because of the special grace of God for the work of each several office given by the laying on of hands of the bishop, qualified thereto by virtue of Apostolical succession.

Orders, INFERIOR or MINOR.—Offices in the Church, to fill which, men are set apart by solemn commission from the bishop, but which have not the same spiritual character as the offices of bishop, priest, or deacon. They originated in the need of lightening the duties which accumulated upon those higher officers of the Church, and were designed to relieve them of the more secular portion of their services. Their numbers varied according to the requirements of the Church. Among them were the orders of sub-deacons (reckoned by some among the superior orders), acolytes, exorcists, lectors or readers, porters (the above are recognised in the Roman Church now), singers, fasciarii, who are charged with the care of the dead and the conduct of funerals, paralytici, attendants on the sick. They were admitted to their offices without imposition of hands, and were allowed to follow secular occupations as a means of livelihood. In the Anglican Church the vicars choral and choristers, the sacristan or sexton, and the vergers, answer to some of the above. The newly-revived order of lay-readers corresponds to that of the lectors. Judging from the tenor of recent discussions, the speedy revival of the subdiaconate in the Church of England at no distant day may be regarded as at least probable.

Orders, RELIGIOUS. [MONASTIC] MENDICANT FRIARS; FRANCISCANS; MURRIAN ORDERS, etc.]

Ordinary is the name given to one who exercises ordinary or immediate jurisdiction in ecclesiastical affairs. An ordinary performs all his functions in his own right while lower orders perform them in the right delegated to them from the bishop. The name is given properly only to a who has original jurisdiction, but in sense it is used for all commissaries bishop who have judicial power. In the 138th Canon of the English it is written, "That no bishop or con, or their vicars or officials, or inferior ordinaries, shall depute or have paritors to serve."
